It has been said that as section 54 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, was repealed by section 11 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858, and that the later Act contains no reference to appeals, therefore the jurisdiction of appeal disappeared. It appears to me, however, more reasonable to suggest that the two Acts of 1857 and 1858 must be read together. The only reason for making this point is that if it were correct, then the appeal must have been under the County Courts Act, 1888, section 120 of which requires that a note shall be taken of the question of law raised at the trial; but though I am not sure that this appeal is not under the Probate Acts, I am satisfied, in any event, that the point was sufficiently taken in the court below to comply with the requirements of the County Courts Act, 1888; and, being satisfied that the judge below was wrong, it remains to decide what ought to be done. No valid ground of defence to this action was suggested in the defence or in the cross-examination of the witnesses, or even by counsel now; it would therefore be a waste of time and money to send the case down for rehearing. In my opinion the judgment in the court below must be reversed, the letters of administration revoked, and a grant made to the husband.

As to the costs, the only ground suggested for depriving the plaintiff of them is the husband's delay for four years. If there had been any administration during these four years that might have been some ground; but the grant was made in 1881, and the administration must have been completed long before the husband knew of his wife's death. Therefore there is no ground for depriving the plaintiff of his costs.

BARNES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed, with costs of appeal and in the court below.

Solicitors for the appellant, Burton & Stanley.

Solicitors for the respondents, Prior, Church, & Adams.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). May 31, 1892.

GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY v. STYLES. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Life assurance—Profits or gains—Deductions for annuities paid—Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, Case 1, r. 4; s. 102.

One branch of a life assurance society's business consisted in the sale of annuities to the public. A lump sum was paid down in the case of an immediate annuity, and for a deferred or contingent annuity either a lump sum or a series of periodical payments. In making up the balance-sheet for three years for the purpose of ascertaining the profits and gains on which income tax was to be assessed under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts, the society deducted from its gross income the sum paid in discharge of its annuity contracts. The assessment was for the year 1885-6.*

* By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 34 (3), other provisions are made for cases similar to the above.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the society was not liable to be assessed for the amount paid by it for these annuities.

Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, 11 Q. B. D. 174, 31 W. R. Dig. 90, distinguished.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (38 W. R. 696, 25 Q. B. D. 351) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), 38 W. R. 696, 25 Q. B. D. 351, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division, reported 38 W. R. 480, 24 Q. B. D. 500, upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Income Tax under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59.

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the court of first instance, and shortly in some of their lordships' judgments, where the arguments used, sufficiently appear.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Lumley Smith, Q.C. (W. Fooks with them), for the appellants.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Danckwerts (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), for the respondent.

Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, 11 Q. B. D. 174, 31 W. R. Dig. 90; Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 34 W. R. 233, 10 App. Cas. 438; Mersey Loan and Discount Co. v. Wootton, 2 Tax Cases, 316; Trustees of Psalms and Hymns v. Whitwell, 3 Tax Cases, 7, were referred to.

The House took time for consideration.

May 31.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The commercial concern in respect of which the question arises here, consists of a business which is carried on by receiving a sum of money as the purchase-money for the granting of annual sums. The sum so granted is certainly an annuity and an annual payment, and I believe it is the fortuitous use of those words under circumstances that I shall presently discuss which has given rise to what seems to me an erroneous construction of the statute.

The question arises under the Income Tax Acts, and the Act itself, like all the Acts of the same class, purports to be "an Act for granting to her Majesty duties on profits arising from property, profession, trades, and offices."

Now, I leave out for the moment the question of land, and, the object being to tax profits, certain rules have been inserted in the statute which have become and are made, in truth, parts of the Act itself. But the rules are, as they themselves import, rules for ascertaining the duties. "The amount of the profits and gains" was the expression all through the earlier legislation on the subject down to the Act of 1805. In that year the expression was altered, as is pointed out by Mr. Dowell in his valuable book on the Income Tax Acts (p. 114), and the observation appears to be well founded that the alteration of the language pointed rather to a more careful return or statement of income, an account in a debtor and creditor form, and intended to prevent deductions, which possibly had been up to that time claimed, being permitted to reduce the amount of the profit which the debtor and creditor account ought to show. But, except as indicating the form rather than the substance of what should be shown in the return as the balance of profits and gains, I am in the condition of Lord Blackburn, who said, in the case of Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 134, that he had been unable to discover any difference in the meaning of the two phrases.

Now if I understood the contention before your lordships aright, it rested on the fourth rule relating to assessment under Schedule D, which prohibited any deduction being made on account of any annual interest or any annuity or any other annual payment, and as those sums were annuities or annual payments it was said that they were not to be deducted in estimating the amount of the profits and gains arising as aforesaid. And if the rule had stopped at the point up to which I have quoted I should have concurred with the contention of the surveyor. But the rule does not stop there. In order to be a prohibited reduction it must be sought to be made on an annuity or other annual payment payable "out of such profits or gains."

Now to my mind it is very clear what is the intuitus both of the enactment and of the rules under which the duties are to be ascertained. The thing to be taxed is the amount of profits and gains. The word "profits," I think, is to be understood in its natural and proper sense—in a sense which no commercial man would misunderstand. But when once an individual or a company has in that proper sense ascertained what are the profits of his business or his trade, the destination of those profits, or the charge which has been made on those profits by previous agreement or otherwise, is perfectly immaterial. The tax is payable upon the profits realized, and the meaning, to my mind, is rendered plain by the words "payable out of profits."

It would be an extraordinary thing to suggest that where a business consists of granting annuities it is to be taxed upon a different principle from any other commercial concern, and no one, I suppose, could doubt that in any other commercial concern the cost of the thing sold to the trader is one of the expenses incident to the carrying on of the trade.

If an annuity seller is to be treated differently from a seller of any ordinary article of commerce—coals or corn or the like—one would have expected to find some words in the statute rendering him obnoxious to a different system of taxation and enforcing a different mode of ascertaining profit, whereas it seems to me that the application of the general words "profits and gains" or "balance of profits and gains" are equally applicable whatever the commercial concern carried on may be.

I think one gets a very fair notion of what was in the mind of the Legislature by a variety of cases put in the course of the argument which it is not necessary to repeat here.

The Court of Appeal seems to have been impressed by the decision in the Alexandria Water Co. (Limited) v. Musgrave. With the decision in that case I am not disposed to disagree, though I am not quite certain I am able to adopt the reasoning, which to some extent appears to depend upon a distinction between the words "gains" and "profits," a distinction which I cannot assent to; but upon the facts I think I should have come to the same conclusion, since, to put it very plainly, in that case it was a claim to deduct the company's debts for borrowed capital and diminish the amount of the profits of the trading.

The whole point seems to me to depend upon the words "out of profits and gains." Profits and gains must be ascertained on ordinary principles of commercial trading, and I cannot think that the framers of the Act could be guilty of such confusion of thought as to assume that the cost of the article sold to the trader, which he in turn makes his profit by selling, was not to be taken into account before you arrived at what was intended to be the taxable profit.

As I have said, the confusion has arisen from the use of the words "annuity or annual sums payable," without considering that this particular commercial adventure consists in selling annuities, and that which they pay, therefore, is to them the cost of the article supplied. You can no more refuse to take that cost into your consideration when ascertaining the balance of profits and gains, than you could the cost of the coals or the corn to the coal merchant and to the corn merchant, in ascertaining what are the profits from his trade.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord WATSON.—The business carried on by the appellant society is that of life insurance, and one branch of it consists in the sale of annuities to the public. The consideration for an immediate annuity is a lump sum instantly paid, and, for a deferred or contingent annuity, may either be a lump sum or a series of periodical payments. The question raised for decision in this appeal relates to an assessment, under Schedule D, in respect of the annual profits and gains arising from the appellants' business for the fiscal year ending April 5th, 1886.

In accordance with the provisions of section 100, Case First, rule 1, of the Act of 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), the amount upon which the appellants became liable to pay income tax for the year in question was one-third of the assessable profits or gains which had accrued to them during the three years immediately preceding the 30th of June, 1885, the date at which their books were last balanced. The appellants had, in the course of these three years, paid upwards of £250,000 in discharge of their contract obligations to their annuitants. The respondent, in estimating the triennial average, included all these payments in the balance of assessable profits or gains, disregarding the contention of the appellants that they ought to be treated as items of debit, for the purpose of ascertaining the balance. On appeal, the Commissioners for General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London confirmed the assessment, and stated a special case, in terms of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59. The decision of the commissioners has been upheld by a divisional court and also by the Court of Appeal.

Rule 1 of section 100, Case First, prescribes that the duty to be charged shall be computed on a sum not less than "the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern." It plainly contemplates the preparation of a balance-sheet, in which proper trading disbursements and liabilities are to be set against trade assets, so that the surplus of the latter, if any, will represent the assessable profits or gains of the concern. All the other rules applicable to Schedule D. are framed upon the same footing. Rule 3 of Case First specifies various items which a trader might naturally enough, for his own private purposes, insert on the debit side of the sheet; and enacts that these shall not be allowed as deductions in estimating his profits for the purposes of the income tax. Rule 4 of Case First provides that "in estimating the amount of the profits and gains arising as aforesaid, no deduction shall be made on account of any annual interest, or any annuity or other annual payment, payable out of such profits or gains."

The first of the rules applicable to Cases 1 and 2 of section 100 provides that, in estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either case, no sum shall be set against or deducted from such profits or gains for "any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern." It seems tolerably clear, and it was hardly disputed by the respondent, that all payments made by the appellants on account of the annuities which they have contracted to pay are, in the strictest sense of the words, disbursements made wholly and exclusively for the purposes of their business. The appellants trade in annuities, and these disbursements are the consideration, or part of the consideration, which they are bound to give in return for the annuitants' purchase-money already received by them and carried to their credit in the balance-sheet. Unless the statute forbids it, the appellants must have the same right to deduct such payments, in estimating their assessable profits, as a grocer has to deduct the price paid by him for the tea or sugar which he retails. If there be one point free from obscurity in the Act of 1842, it is this, that the Legislature intended all traders, whether in groceries, annuities, or other articles of commerce, to be assessed upon the same footing.

The learned counsel for the respondent were constrained to admit that, were it not for the terms of rule 4 of Case First, the appellants would be entitled to the deductions which they claim. But they argued that the expression "profits and gains," which occurs twice in that rule, in each instance signifies the gross receipts of the trader, or, in other words, the whole items standing on the credit side of the balance-sheet. Upon that construction of the rule, no deduction could be allowed, in estimating profits, of "any annual interest, or any annuity or annual payment"; and one of many startling results would be that the yearly rent and taxes paid by a trader for his business premises, and yearly wages paid to his servants, would not be dealt with as payments out of trading capital, but would be included in the profits upon which he pays income duty.

Although it appears to have been accepted by both courts below, I cannot assent to the construction put upon rule 4 by the respondent, which is, in my opinion, at variance with its context. The rule begins thus: "In estimating the amount of the profits and gains arising as aforesaid." Does that mean: "In estimating the amount of the trader's assets?" I venture to think not. I think the words refer, not to total assets, but to the balance of profits and gains, to be ascertained by virtue of the preceding rules for the purpose of being charged with income duty. The rule then goes on to prescribe that there shall be no deduction made on account of any annual interest, or any annuity, or other annual payment "payable out of such profits or gains." These last words refer back to profits and gains as described in the commencement of the rule, and must, therefore, be taken to mean, not gross receipts, but profits and gains, the amount of which is to be estimated for the purposes of the Act. Had it been the intention of the Legislature to enact that no annual interest, annuity, or other annual payment should be inserted on the debit side of the balance-sheet, it appears to me that rule 4 would have been expressed in very different terms. The rule, as it stands, merely enacts that no annual payment which falls to be paid out of profits shall be deducted from profits in assessing for income tax.

The respondent relied in argument upon section 102, which directly charges with duty all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments, whether such payments shall be payable within or out of Great Britain. That enactment is qualified by the proviso that no charge shall be made upon the person entitled to such payments, in the case where the same shall be "payable out of profits or gains brought into charge by this Act." In that case the trader must pay upon the whole profits or gains brought into charge, but is authorized to deduct income tax in settling with the person entitled. These provisions do not appear to me to throw any light upon the question, because, in order to ascertain what profits or gains are brought into charge by the Act, it is necessary to go back to the rules of Case First of section 100.

Section 40 of the Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), which was also referred to in the course of the argument, has really no bearing upon the present question. It empowers persons who are liable to the payment of any rent, or any yearly interest of money, or any annuity or other annual payment, on making such payment, to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of income duty payable at the time; but it has no application to annual payments payable out of profits or gains. Section 24 (3) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, for the first time made it compulsory upon the persons liable in payment to retain income tax, upon their making payment out of the capital which they employ in trade, of any interest of money or annuities charged with the tax under Schedule D, and not payable or wholly payable out of profits brought into charge to such tax. Had that enactment been in force in the year 1885-6 the present controversy would never have arisen.

The only point which remains for consideration is this, whether the annuities paid by the appellants are payable, within the meaning of rule 4, out of profits and gains? In order to bring annuities or other annual payments within the scope of the rule they must, in my opinion, either be directly charged upon profits or be in themselves of such a character that they form a proper charge upon profits. Now I cannot understand in what sense the annuities in question can be said to be properly chargeable to profits. An annuity to the widow of a deceased partner, interest on capital advanced by a partner, or upon money borrowed for the purposes of the business, are truly payable out of profits earned, and, therefore, ought not to be deducted in estimating the income yielded by the business. On that ground I agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, although I am unable to concur in all the reasons which were assigned for it. But the business of the appellants consists in employing their trading capital to pay annuities, as the counterpart of the consideration given by the annuitant, and the annuities are payable out of stock, and not out of business profits. On these grounds I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The appellant society, as part of the business which it carries on, sells or grants annuities in consideration of a premium or lump sum paid down in the case of an immediate annuity, and of a similar payment or of periodical premiums in the case of a deferred or contingent annuity. In making up the balance-sheet, showing the amount of its profits and gains for three years, the society put on the one side of the account the consideration money received for annuities granted, on the other side was put the sum paid in discharge of its annuity contracts. The surveyor of taxes contended that the latter sum ought not to have entered into the account for the purpose of ascertaining the profits and gains on which income tax was to be assessed under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts.

This contention was based upon the fourth rule relating to assessment under Schedule D, which is in the following terms:—"In estimating the amount of the profits and gains arising as aforesaid no deduction shall be made on account of any annual interest, or any annuity or other annual payment, payable out of such profits and gains." It was said that this expressly prohibited any deduction in respect of the annuities paid by the society; that the income tax must be paid upon the basis that the entire sum received by the society as the consideration for its undertaking to pay annuities was to be assessed as profits and gains, and that the society would have a right to deduct income tax when paying the annuities to those who had purchased them. The contention of the surveyor of taxes has been sustained by the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal. The learned judges in the Court of Appeal founded their judgment mainly upon a prior decision of that court in the case of The Alexandria Waterworks Co. v. Musgrave, which I shall have to consider presently.

It cannot, of course, be denied that, as a matter of business, profits are ascertained by setting against the income earned the cost of earning it, nor that, as a general rule, for the purpose of assessment to the income tax, profits are to be ascertained in the same way. "Money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purpose of a trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern," may, by the first of the "rules applying to both the preceding cases," be taken into account in estimating the balance of profits and gains to be charged. It seems to me beyond question that the payments made by the society to its annuitants are within these words. And those carrying on the business of selling annuities would be assessed on quite a different principle to those carrying on other businesses if their gross receipts were to be treated as profits, without regard to the payments to which, in consideration of those receipts, they had bound themselves.

But it is said, and truly, that the Income Tax Acts have laid down certain rules to be applied in determining how the tax is to be assessed; and that, even if the result should be to tax as profits and gains what cannot properly be so called, the requirements of the Acts must nevertheless be complied with. The controversy mainly turns upon the construction to be put upon the fourth rule, which I have already quoted, but the 102nd section of the Act must be read in connection with it. That section, after enacting that income tax, shall be charged upon all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payment, provides that "in every case where the same shall be payable out of profits or gains brought into charge by virtue of this Act no assessment shall be made upon the person entitled to such annuity, interest, or other annual payment, but the whole of such profits or gains shall be charged with duty on the person liable to such annual payment without distinguishing such annual payment, and the person so liable to make such annual payment out of the profits or gains charged with duty" shall be entitled to deduct the income tax from the annual payment, and the person to whom payment is made is to allow such deduction. It was admitted that, reading this enactment in conjunction with the fourth rule, the prohibition contained in that rule only applied when the annuity was payable out of profits and gains brought into charge by virtue of the Act. What is the meaning of "profits and gains," as found in the concluding words of the fourth rule? Unless the context requires a different meaning, or the words appear to be used throughout the Act in another sense, I think they must be construed according to their ordinary signification. When we speak of the profits or gains of a trader we mean that which he has made by his trading. Whether there be such a thing as profit or gain can only be ascertained by setting against the receipts the expenditure or obligations to which they have given rise.

In the taxing provision of the Income Tax Acts the tax is imposed in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person from any trade, "to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits or gains." Here it cannot be doubted, I think, the words "profits or gains" are used in the sense I have indicated. There is nothing in any part of the Act to show the contrary. Indeed, when the rules are considered they confirm the view that this meaning is to be attributed to the words. Their general purpose is to prohibit certain matters being taken into account which ought not to be set against the receipts when profits are being ascertained. But the scheme of the Act obviously is to tax not receipts but profits properly so called.

The 100th section prescribes that the duties under Schedule D. shall be assessed and charged under certain rules. The first of these is, that the duty shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of the trade, &c., upon a fair and just average of three years. The expression "balance of the profits or gains" is not a happy one, but the meaning obviously is, the balance arrived at by setting against the receipts the expenditure necessary to earn them.

When we come to the third rule, and the first of the rules "applying to both the preceding cases," it must be admitted that the words "profits or gains" are not always used in their proper or ordinary sense. The third rule, for example, provides that, in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, "no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains," on account of any sum expended for the repairs of trade purposes, or for the supply, repairs, or alterations of trade implements beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes on an average of three years. Here it is obvious that the "profits or gains," against which the cost of repairs is not to be set, or from which it is not to be deducted, cannot be the profits or gains of the business, properly so called. The subject-matter necessitates the conclusion that language is being employed loosely and inaccurately. The rule contemplates the making up of a balance-sheet, and deals with what may be put on the debit side of it. And the first rule "applying to both the preceding cases," which commences with the same words as the rule I have just referred to, evidently requires a similar construction.

But in the fourth rule, which your lordships have specially to construe, the language employed is very different. I can find nothing to show that the words "profits and gains" were intended to be understood otherwise than in their proper sense. The rule prescribes that, in estimating the amount of the profits and gains "arising as aforesaid," no deduction shall be made, &c. This seems to refer back to the charging provision which I have quoted, and I have already pointed out the meaning which must be there attributed to "profits and gains." And when read in connection with section 102, the rule clearly relates only to annuities payable out of profits and gains "brought into charge" by virtue of the Act, and to cases in which the trader is liable to make the annual payment out of the profits or gains charged with duty.

I have pointed out that in the charging provision it is the profits and gains properly so called, not the gross receipts, which are brought into charge. If these do not exceed the expenses, nothing is payable by way of income tax. In the fourth rule there is no mention of a balance, nor is it said, as in the other rules, that no sum shall be set against the profits "on account of any sum expended" in the payment of annuities. I can see no reason why, if the intention was that contended for by the Crown, these words should not have been inserted in the third rule, instead of a fourth rule, with altered language being added. The expression in this rule is altogether changed; the deduction prohibited is confined to annuities "payable out of" the profits and gains. This implies that the profits and gains out of which the annuity is payable are already ascertained. In the other rule there is no reference to the fund out of which the moneys expended are payable; the only thing regarded is the fact of the expenditure and the purpose for which it has been incurred. It would be a strange use of language to speak of the annuities as "payable out of" the gross receipts of a trader merely because he is under liability to provide for them.

I think the fourth rule was primarily designed to meet such a case as that in which a trader had contracted to make an annual payment out of his profits; as, for example, when he had agreed to make such a payment to a former partner, or to a person who had made a loan on the terms of receiving such payment. But for the rule it might plausibly have been contended that in such a case a trader was only to return as his profits what remained after making such payment. It is unnecessary to define the limits within which the rule applies, but I am unable to agree with the court below that it is applicable to the present case. The annuities are not, in my opinion, payable out of the profits and gains of the society; until the payments which they necessitate have been taken into account it cannot be ascertained whether there are any profits and gains or not.

I do not think this view conflicts with the decision in the case of Alexandria Waterworks v. Musgrave. The payments of interest to the debenture-holders were made out of the profits. These were ascertained by deducting from the moneys earned the expenses incurred in earning them, and of these expenses the payments to the debenture-holders formed no part. A portion of the capital was raised by shares, and another portion by debentures. There was no more reason why interest on the debenture capital should be deducted from the profits than interest on the share capital. Supposing the whole capital had been raised by shares, there would have been no pretence for making any such deduction, and the profits earned by the adventure could not be different, according as the capital was raised wholly by shares, or partly by shares and partly by debentures. It is by no means clear that the case was not within the prohibition of the third rule.

Although it does not appear to me that the view of the present case which I have placed before your lordships is inconsistent with the decision in Alexandria Waterworks Co. v. Musgrave, I think it is in conflict with Mersey Loan Co. v. Wootton, but the reasoning which has led me to my present conclusion applies equally to the facts of that case.

Lord FIELD.—I have been asked by my noble and learned friend Lord Morris to express his entire concurrence in the judgment which has been moved, and I have no difficulty whatever in adding my own.

Order appealed from reversed, with costs here and below; cause remitted to the Queen's Bench Division.

Solicitor for the appellants, R. L. Devonshire.

Solicitor for the respondent, Sir W. H. Melvill, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.)
[and Q. B. Div.]
(Day and Collins, JJ.)

Feb. 6.

COBB v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Negligence—Breach of duty to passenger — Theft by fellow-passenger — Liability of company.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that he had suffered damage through being robbed while a passenger on the defendants' railway, and through the refusal of the defendants' servants to afford him facilities for arresting the persons who had robbed him, and for recovering the stolen property.

Held, that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

Question of law raised on the plaintiff's statement of claim.

The plaintiff by his writ claimed damages for loss sustained by him while a passenger on the defendants' railway by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

The statement of claim alleged that on the 6th of May, 1892, the plaintiff travelled on the defendants' railway from Shrewsbury to Birmingham; that the train in the course of the journey stopped at Wellington, and that the plaintiff was there, while in the defendants' railway carriage, robbed by a gang of sixteen men of the sum of £89 1s. which the plaintiff was then carrying in his pocket; that the plaintiff forthwith complained to the defendants' stationmaster; that the stationmaster refused to detain the train to permit the plaintiff to give the said men into custody and have them searched; that the stationmaster, immediately on the plaintiff's complaint being made to him, negligently, and in breach of the duty owed by the defendants to the plaintiff as a passenger on their line, to protect him in person and property, and to oppose no obstacle to his recovering the property whereof he had while on the defendants' line been wrongfully deprived, gave the signal for the said train to leave, and it left accordingly, and that the plaintiff was thereby prevented from having the said men searched, and his property, which was still in the carriage, recovered; that there was in and about the said station at the time of the robbery, as the stationmaster well knew, a large force of police ready and willing to effect the said arrest for the plaintiff and to search those arrested, but they were prevented from doing so by the action of the defendant company's servant in immediately starting the said train; that the defendants negligently permitted the carriage to be overcrowded, and so facilitated the hustling and robbing of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff had, by reason of the negligence of the defendants, lost £89 1s., and the plaintiff claimed that sum as damages.

The master ordered the question whether the statement of claim disclosed any cause of action to be disposed of before the trial of the action.

R. W. Harper, for the plaintiff, contended that the allegations in the statement of claim disclosed a cause of action—namely, a breach of duty by the defendants through the negligence of their servant.

He cited Pounder v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 40 W. R. 189, [1892] 1 Q. B. 385; Great Western Railway Co. v. Bunch, 36 W. R. 785, 13 App. Cas. 31; Bergheim v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 26 W. R. 301, 3 C. P. D. 221.

Lyttelton, for the defendants, was not called upon.

THE COURT (DAY and COLLINS, JJ.) held that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action; that there was no connection between the overcrowding of the carriage and the robbing of the plaintiff, and that there was no duty on the defendant company to give facilities for the arrest of the thief.

The plaintiff appealed.

R. W. Harper, for the appellant.—The stationmaster ought to have detained the train in order to have the passengers in the same carriage as the plaintiff arrested and searched, as the company was bound to reasonably protect both person and property. The fact that the compartment was overcrowded facilitated the pocket-picking.

He cited, in addition to the authorities in the court below, New Orleans, St. Louis, and Chicago Railroad Co. v. Burke, Law Magazine and Review, Nov., 1892, p. 72; 24 Amer. Rep. 689.

Lyttelton, for the defendant company, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The judgment must be affirmed on the ground that under neither head is there any obligation thrown on the company. Whilst the plaintiff was a passenger on the railway he was robbed. It is not alleged in that part of the case that it was by reason of any negligence of the company at all. The claim says that the plaintiff arrived at a railway station when the alleged robbers were in the train. A body of police happened to be at the station. The statement of claim then alleges that the plaintiff asked the stationmaster to detain the train whilst the persons who took the property were searched. Under what head of law can that claim be brought? The railway company undertook to carry the plaintiff safely, so that his safety should not be affected by any negligence of theirs. They did that. They carried him without any negligence on their part. As to the carrying of him, it is not alleged that he was being ill-used, and that his being ill-used was made known to the servants of the company. The robbery was done and over. There was nothing that the railway company could do to prevent the robbery. The stationmaster was not asked even to search the carriage. He was asked to detain the train and all the other passengers whilst the complaint of the plaintiff was being inquired into by the police. Is that any part of the contract? It has nothing to do with the duty of carriage, therefore there was no duty imposed on the stationmaster as servant of the company, and therefore no duty on the company. Therefore, if there is no duty which they broke, there cannot be a cause of action. Therefore, as to the first part of the case, there is no cause of action.

As to the second part, there was a breach of duty; but of itself that was no cause of action. There must be damage resulting from it. When it is alleged that damage is the result of the breach of duty, it must be shown that the damage is the ordinary result of the breach of duty. It cannot be said that the natural result of the overcrowding is, that some of the other passengers should be thieves; therefore that damage is too remote; therefore there is no cause of action. This is equivalent to a demurrer. Therefore the opinion of the court upon this statement of claim, as it is written, is that it is bad.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two points have been argued. First, it is said that what happened after the robbery showed a neglect of duty on the part of the railway company. The statement of claim is rather vague. There is a mere allegation that "the stationmaster refused to detain the train to permit the plaintiff to give the said men into custody and have them searched." This means that he refused to detain the train in order to let the plaintiff have the opportunity of applying to the police. There is no such obligation on the part of a railway company. They may do it if they like, but they are not bound to stop the train. The statement of claim does not contain a specific allegation that the plaintiff was prevented by the action of the stationmaster from giving the men into custody. As to the second point, it is said that the overcrowding conduced to the robbery. According to English law the damage must flow from the breach of duty in the usual course of things. You cannot get damages except such as are immediately and usually caused. It is impossible to hold that the robbery was in the usual course of things caused by the overcrowding.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS and F. O. ROBINSON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not want to add anything on the first point. As to the second point, the damage is too remote. One thing in no way results from the other. The picking pockets is not the natural result of the overcrowding.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Steadman, Van Praagh, & Sims, for Welmshurst, Huddersfield.

Solicitor for the defendants, R. R. Nelson.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith, L.J.) — Jan. 20.

In re POLLITT.
Ex parte MINOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Solicitor—Costs—Payment by debtor to solicitor for future services in preparing balance-sheet and calling meeting of creditors—Execution of deed of assignment by debtor—Services rendered after act of bankruptcy—Right of trustee in bankruptcy to repayment—Set-off—Mutual credit.

The debtor, who was then indebted to his solicitor in the sum of £40, consulted his solicitor as to his position, with the result that it was resolved that a balance-sheet should be prepared and a meeting of creditors called. The solicitor declined to act for the debtor on credit, and a sum of £15 was accordingly paid by the debtor to the solicitor to secure his services in the matter. After services to the amount of about £3 had been rendered, the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy by executing a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and, on the application of the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy, the county court judge refused to allow the solicitor to retain the balance of £12 in respect of services rendered after such act of bankruptcy, and directed him to hand it over to the trustee.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 89), that, the title of the trustee under the bankruptcy relating back to the act of bankruptcy, whereby the solicitor's authority to act for the debtor, and consequently the specific purpose for which the £15 was paid, was determined, the balance of that sum appropriated to costs incurred after the act of bankruptcy was repayable to the trustee; that there was no such necessity for the employment of the solicitor after the act of bankruptcy as brought the case within the principle of In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, which must not be extended; and, further, that the solicitor was not entitled to set off the balance in respect of the outstanding debt of £40.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, reported ante, p. 89.

The appellant, Mr. P. S. Minor, a solicitor in practice at Manchester, had acted in that capacity for the debtor, Pollitt, for some time previous to December, 1891; Pollitt being at that time was indebted to him in a sum of over £40 for costs. On the 11th of December the appellant was consulted by the debtor with reference to the state of his affairs, and it was arranged that a balance-sheet should be prepared and a meeting of his creditors called. The appellant, however, declined to act unless a sum to cover his costs in the matter was secured to him, and a sum of £15 was accordingly handed to him by the debtor on the 12th of December for that purpose. On that day the debtor executed a deed of assignment in favour of his creditors, which had been prepared by the appellant, which was the act of bankruptcy alleged against him. In the consequent bankruptcy proceedings, on the application of the official receiver, the county court judge directed the appellant to pay over the sum of £12 3s. 4d., the amount of his costs incurred since the act of bankruptcy. That decision was affirmed by the Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.), and the solicitor appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Montague Shearman, for the appellant.—There are two grounds for this appeal. First, the circumstances of the case rendered it necessary that the debtor should have assistance in arranging his affairs and in calling his creditors together. It would be a very great hardship if a man, finding himself in difficulties, was unable to obtain professional advice and assistance. Here, at any rate, the principles of humanity ought to apply to the services rendered in calling the creditors together, for although that was after the act of bankruptcy, the object of it was, if possible, to prevent bankruptcy. We ask the court, if necessary, to disagree with the opinions expressed by the Master of the Rolls and Cave, J., in the case of In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, 2 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 255. The costs here were almost entirely incurred in calling the meeting of creditors, and that having taken place after the act of bankruptcy, they would not be provable under the bankruptcy, and the result, therefore, would be, if the appeal failed, that the solicitor would receive nothing. Secondly, the appellant is entitled to a set-off on account of the debt of £40 for past services which was owing to him. The bankruptcy, if a revocation of his authority as solicitor, entitled the appellant to apply the money in his hands to that debt. And a set-off against the bankrupt would apply equally as against the trustee. The business between them was really conducted upon mutual credit.

They cited Hill v. Smith, 12 M. & W. 618; Stamore v. Campbell, 40 W. R. 101, [1892] 1 Q. B. 314.

Sir C. Russell, A.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the bankrupt, before he committed the act of bankruptcy, had requested a solicitor to do some work for him. The solicitor had previously been employed by the bankrupt, but had not been paid for his services. He therefore declined to do any further work unless a sum of £15 was paid to him to cover his costs. That amount was then handed to him for that special purpose.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The solicitor then acted for the bankrupt, and prepared a deed of assignment, and up to that point he was perfectly entitled to pay himself out of the £15. But then the deed was executed, and that, as the solicitor of course, must know, was an act of bankruptcy, and when it was afterwards followed by the bankruptcy, the bankruptcy related back to the execution of the deed of assignment, and we have, therefore, to treat the debtor as bankrupt as from that moment. All his money from that time, and all that was owing to him, became distributable amongst his creditors. But some of his money was left in the hands of the solicitor; but, as the act of bankruptcy put an end to the authority of the solicitor to do work for him, what is the result? Why, money which was paid to the solicitor for a specific purpose, which was legally and properly put an end to, must clearly be paid over to the trustee in bankruptcy. There was clearly no option in the matter, he was bound to refund it.

But it was said that the advice for which the money was given him was to prevent the debtor becoming bankrupt. But anything that the solicitor did after the bankruptcy, which, as I have said, began by relation back after the execution of the deed of assignment, could not be to prevent his becoming bankrupt, neither can it be put upon the trustee.

This case is not within In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, and I quite agree that that case must not be extended beyond what is really necessary and humane. With regard to the contention that there was here a mutual credit, and that the solicitor was entitled to a set-off in respect of his work previous to the bankruptcy; this money was given for a specific purpose, and the principle of set-off does not apply; moreover, the one sum was due by the bankrupt to the solicitor, while the other was due by the solicitor to the trustee.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a rather hard case upon the solicitor, and I was in hopes that I could have seen my way to assist him. But if Mr. Shearman could not convince us in a question of bankruptcy law, I am afraid that the case is too strong against him.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Nicholson & Crouch, for P. S. Minor, Manchester.

Solicitor for the official receiver, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

From L.JJ. in Lunacy. (Lord Halsbury, Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Nov. 22-26, 28; Dec. 13.

In re CATHCART. (a.)

Lunacy—Inquiry—Verdict of sanity—Costs—Discretion of judge in lunacy—Appeal—Order charging costs on stock belonging to alleged lunatic—Power to order sale or transfer of stock—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 109—Ord. 46, r. 1—Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 18 (5), 49—Judicature Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 61), s. 14.

Where the result of a lunacy inquiry is that the person who was alleged to be a lunatic is found to be of sound mind, the judge in lunacy, in exercising his discretion over the costs of the inquiry under section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, may, if the application for the inquiry seems to him to have been prompted by a desire to protect the person and property of the alleged lunatic, and to have been made on reasonable grounds and in a reasonable manner, order the costs of the applicant to be paid by the person who was alleged to be a lunatic.

If an order made under this section charges the amount of such costs on stock standing in the name of the alleged lunatic, this does not constitute a charging order within the meaning of ord. 46, r. 1; and therefore the procedure laid down in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 is not applicable. Such order may further direct the alleged lunatic to transfer an amount of such stock sufficient to satisfy the said costs. If the alleged lunatic fails to comply with this direction, an order may be made, under section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, directing the official solicitor to make the necessary transfer.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from an order of the Lords Justices dealing with the costs of a lunacy inquiry under section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

Judgment of Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ. (40 W. R. 257), affirmed.

Appeal from an order made by Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ., and two further orders made by Lindley, L.J., dealing with the costs of lunacy proceedings instituted by Mr. J. T. Cathcart against his wife, Mrs. Cathcart.

Mrs. Cathcart was in 1887 an unmarried lady over forty years of age living with her mother, Mrs. Unwin, her father being dead. She was possessed of considerable property, including a mansion and estate at Wootton, in Staffordshire, another estate at Stourbridge, in Worcestershire, and certain personal property. Her net income was stated to be about £4,000 a year.

Mr. Cathcart was about twelve years younger than Miss Unwin, and his means consisted of an annual allowance of £300, and a reversionary interest in certain lands in Scotland expectant on the death of his father. He was a distant cousin of Miss Unwin's, and at the beginning of 1887 he applied for and obtained the position of agent to her estate at a salary of £200 a year.

Shortly afterwards Mr. Cathcart proposed to Miss Unwin that she should marry him, and they became engaged, notwithstanding the strong opposition of Mrs. Unwin. After the engagement Mr. Cathcart wrote letters to Miss Unwin in which he expressed a very hostile feeling towards her mother. The marriage took place on the 22nd of July, 1887. Miss Unwin's real and personal property were settled upon her by two deeds.

Shortly after the marriage Mrs. Cathcart suspected her husband of infidelity, and on the 23rd of September, 1887, she left him of her own accord, and had not since cohabited with him.

Mr. Cathcart, in his evidence, stated that until after his wife had left him he had not the slightest idea that she was not perfectly compos mentis. After leaving him she travelled about to various places, and consulted, among other doctors, Dr. Dale, of Scarborough, who wrote to her uncle a letter, which was shown to her husband, in which he stated that she was suffering from nervous excitement and hallucinations, and ought to be for six months under medical care. In July, 1888, she received a letter from her husband's solicitors announcing his intention to commence an action for restitution of conjugal rights. When she received her bill of costs in respect of the marriage settlements, her attention was called to certains powers which had been thereby given to her husband over the property. She was very indignant at learning this, and after writing angry letters to the trustees of the settlement, one of whom was her uncle, she applied to two magistrates at Skipton for a warrant against the trustees for fraud. The magistrates thought her insane, and one of them wrote to her friends suggesting that she should be put under control. This letter was seen by her husband.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

During the same year, 1888, she commenced to make serious accusations against Mr. Henry Matthews, who was then Home Secretary, and who had some years before been counsel for her in a case tried at Stafford Assizes. She accused Mr. Matthews not only of having neglected her interests, but also of having employed persons to poison her. These accusations were contained chiefly in a long series of letters written by her to the secretary of the Derby Liberal Association. This correspondence, however, was not known to her husband till after he had presented his petition into her state of mind. She also accused her mother of having attempted to poison her and other atrocious acts.

In August, 1888, Mr. Cathcart saw her at an hotel and in lodgings in London, and endeavoured to induce her to put herself under medical care, which she refused. On the 13th of August he wrote to her saying that the last thing he should wish would be to have her shut up in a lunatic asylum, and begging her to join him at Wootton. This letter never reached her, as she was on a visit in Devonshire. On the 15th of August she wrote a letter to the gardener at Wootton, in which she referred to alleged attempts to poison her. In the meantime her husband prepared to received her by engaging a male attendant from a private asylum to act as butler, and two nurses. On the 21st of August she drove up to Wootton, but on finding that her husband was there she immediately drove away again to Ashbourne, where she put up at an inn and retired to bed at about eleven o'clock. Her husband, with a nurse and the lunatic attendant, followed her, and compelled her to get up at midnight and dress, and drove her back to Wootton, where he induced her to sign orders (which, however, she countermanded) to her bankers and tenants to enable him to deal with her banking account and receive her rents. He then went away to Scotland for a few days, leaving her at Wootton with the attendant and nurses. On his return he was told by a medical man, who had seen her during his absence, that restraint was unnecessary for her. He thereupon dismissed the attendant and nurses, and himself went away, leaving Mrs. Cathcart free and uncontrolled. On the 14th of September, 1888, she commenced an action for divorce, but this was dismissed at the hearing on the 5th of June, 1889. On the 23rd of June, 1889, Mr. Cathcart commenced an action in the Chancery Division to restrain his wife from dealing with a sum of £10,000, which had been left out of settlement, and in which he claimed to have an interest under Scotch law. On the 29th of May, 1890, his solicitors wrote a letter to Mrs. Cathcart proposing that the settlements should be modified by arrangement. To this letter she did not give any answer. During this time she was living at various hotels in London, often changing from one to another, and continually complaining that attempts were being made to poison her. She issued and distributed a large number of placards, in which she complained that certain witnesses had been got out of the way. For doing this her husband gave her notice that an application would be made to commit her for contempt of court.

On the 24th of February, 1891, as Mrs. Cathcart was engaged in some litigation in the Royal Courts of Justice, a medical man, Dr. Bond, who had never before seen her, sat down by her side and entered into conversation with her, and after about twenty minutes left her and signed a certificate to accompany an urgency order under section 11 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Such an order having been made, she was on the same day seized as she was leaving the Law Courts and conveyed to the Priory, a private asylum at Roehampton. A reception order was made subsequently. At the asylum she was seen by several doctors who considered her to be of unsound mind.

Upon the petition of Mr. Cathcart the usual order was made for an inquiry into Mrs. Cathcart's state of mind. In the course of the proceedings he made a proposal in writing that if she were found lunatic she should be placed under his care at Wootton, and that she should be allowed an income out of her property to make a home for her there, and also £2,000 of her money for the repair and furnishing of the house.

The inquiry took place before Master Bulwer and a special jury of seventeen persons; and after a hearing lasting seventeen days Mrs. Cathcart was found by a large majority of the jury to be of sound mind.

On the 16th of December, 1891, Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ., sitting in lunacy, made an order on the application of Mr. Cathcart, under section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, directing that two-thirds of his costs of the petition, and of the inquiry, and of that application, should be paid out of a capital sum of £10,000 Consols standing in Mrs. Cathcart's name: 40 W. R. 259, [1892] 1 Ch. 549.

On the 3rd of August, 1892, Lindley, L.J., made an order declaring the above costs to be a charge on the £10,000 Consols, and directing payment thereout, and further directing Mrs. Cathcart to transfer a sufficient amount thereof to satisfy such costs.

On the 31st of October, 1892, Lindley, L.J., made a further order, under section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, directing the official solicitor to execute a transfer of a sufficient amount of the Consols to satisfy the above costs and the costs of the various applications.

From these three orders Mrs. Cathcart appealed.

A preliminary objection was taken on behalf of Mr. Cathcart that no appeal lay, the orders of the Lords Justices being as to costs only.

The court decided not to determine this point until the appeal had been heard.

R. O. B. Lane, Q.C., and R. F. Norton (J. W. Manning with them), for the appellant.—The Judicature Act, 1873, by section 18, sub-section 5, allows an appeal to the Court of Appeal from any order in lunacy. Such an order is not an order of the High Court, and is not governed by section 49, which disallows an appeal from an order of the High Court as to costs where costs are discretionary. Neither is that section rendered applicable by the last words of section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, "and every such order shall have the effect of an order of the High Court." The finality of an order is not part of its effect. The Lords Justices had no jurisdiction to make the order directing Mrs. Cathcart to pay Mr. Cathcart's costs. Section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, cannot be construed to mean that where a petition is instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether a person is a lunatic, and he is found to be of sound mind, he can then be ordered to pay the costs of the petitioner. The section empowers the judge in lunacy to order the costs to be paid "by the lunatic or alleged lunatic." That cannot apply to a person who at the time when the order is made, has been found to be of sound mind. Even if such an order could in any case be made, the Lords Justices exercised their discretion wrongly in this particular case. Mr. Cathcart's conduct has been such that he is not entitled to be allowed his costs. In a sense, no doubt, he believed his wife was insane. But his behaviour towards her must have had the effect of fostering and increasing the delusions from which she suffered. The treatment she received at Ashbourne and Wootton was such that she naturally suspected an intention on his part to place her in an asylum, and this would inevitably have a harmful effect on her. It is clear that he did not believe her to be a lunatic within the meaning of the lunacy law, that is, "of unsound mind and incapable of managing herself and her affairs": section 90 of the Lunacy Act. His procuring orders from her as to the disposition of her property, his application for her committal for contempt, his negotiations with her as to reforming the settlements, all show that he believed her to be responsible for her actions. The court below did not give sufficient consideration to the question whether Mr. Cathcart's conduct had contributed to his wife's delusions, or to the question whether, at the time of the making of the urgency order, he had reasonable ground for believing that she was incapable of managing herself and her affairs. There is no evidence that at that time he knew anything of the letters she had written to Derby, or of her wandering about from hotel to hotel. As to the order of the 3rd of August, there is no power to order the sale of stock or shares comprised in a charging order except in a separate action instituted for that purpose: Leggott v. Western, 12 Q. B. D. 287. The machinery provided by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, must be adopted in every case where an order is made charging stock or shares: see ord. 46, r. 1. The Court of Chancery never exercised the power of sale except in an action which claimed it. The words in section 109 of the Lunacy Act, "and every such order shall have the effect of an order of the High Court," involve that the practice of the Court of Chancery and the procedure laid down by ord. 46, r. 1, shall be followed. They met the difficulty suggested by James, L.J., in the case of In re C——, 23 W. R. 377, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 75. Moreover, a charge on these Consols might have been given previously by Mrs. Cathcart to some third party; and in such case questions would arise as to the rights of that third party, which could only be settled in a fresh action. As to the order of the 31st of October, no doubt if Lindley, L.J., had jurisdiction to order Mrs. Cathcart to make a transfer he had also jurisdiction to make an order, under section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, directing the official solicitor to make the transfer. But this particular order was bad for including costs, the amount of which had not been ascertained: Widgery v. Tepper, 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 364.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., English Harrison, and P. S Stokes, for the respondent.—The order of the Lords Justices being an order as to costs only, there is no appeal. The words at the end of section 109 of the Lunacy Act mean that an order made under that section is to be treated as an order of the High Court, and therefore section 49 of the Judicature Act applies. Even if that is not so, there is nothing in section 109 to show an intention on the part of the Legislature to limit the discretionary power over costs which was possessed by the judge in lunacy. As to the exercise of discretion, there is no evidence that Mr. Cathcart acted otherwise than bonâ fide. He never wished to put his wife into an asylum. His only object was to put her under medical restraint and proper care. What he did at Wootton was for the purpose of preventing her being sent to an asylum. It was only when he was advised that the only way of getting her to submit to medical examination was to put her under restraint that he assented to the making of an urgency order, so that when she found herself under restraint she might voluntarily submit to be medically examined. He wished to remove her from her fugitive life to a position in which she could receive proper treatment. Moreover, the evidence showed sufficient insanity to justify an inquiry quite apart from anything which might possibly be attributed to the fear of being placed in an asylum. The proper questions for the judges in lunacy to consider when they are exercising their discretion as to costs under section 109 of the Lunacy Act are whether the petitioner had reasonable and probable cause for instituting the inquiry, and whether the inquiry was for the benefit of the alleged lunatic. Any misconduct on the part of the petitioner prior to the lunacy proceedings ought not to be taken into consideration at all, though, no doubt, misconduct in the course of the proceedings might be a proper matter for consideration. The section is intended to be a provision in the interest of the alleged lunatic. Suppose, to take an extreme instance—a husband had by his brutal conduct produced his wife's insanity: if he knew that such conduct would prevent his getting his costs out of his wife's estate, the result would probably be that he would sit still and do nothing. And that would be contrary to the interest of the lunatic. Wherever a person manifests such delusions as to cause a reasonable suspicion that he is insane, and incapable of managing himself and his affairs, and refuses to submit to medical care, it is to his interest that the lunacy law should be put into operation and an inquiry held into the state of his mind, rather than that he should be left to his own resources: In re Windham, 10 W. R. 499, 4 De G. F. & J. 56; In re F——, 2 De G. J. & S. 89, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 59. The section is not intended to be punitive against the petitioner. But if it is said, You would have had your costs if you not treated your wife badly, but you shall not have them because you did so treat her, surely that is punitive. The discretion of the Lords Justices ought not to be overruled on a question of costs unless there has been some manifest disregard of principle or misapprehension of facts: In re Gilbert, 33 W. R. 832, 28 Ch. D. 549. As to the order of the 3rd of August, Lindley, L.J., clearly had jurisdiction. Section 109 of the Lunacy Act is a positive enactment giving power to the judge in lunacy to make such an order. The last words of the section cannot have been intended to limit the power so given by reference to ord. 46, r. 1, which merely deals with execution. The order of Lindley, L.J., was not a charging order under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, but an order made in the exercise of the jurisdiction given by the Lunacy Act, 1890. It follows that the Lord Justice also had jurisdiction to make the order of the 31st of October, and both orders were rightly made.

December 13.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord HALSBURY, Lord ESHER, M.R., and LOPES and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) was read by Lord HALSBURY.—This is an appeal from an order made by Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ., sitting as judges in lunacy, and the first question raised is whether the order is subject to an appeal to the Court of Appeal.

By section 18, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, "all jurisdiction vested in or capable of being exercised by her Majesty in Council or the Judicial Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council upon appeal (inter alia) from any order in lunacy made by the Lord Chancellor or any other person having jurisdiction in lunacy," is given to the Court of Appeal. That there was an appeal from an order of the Lord Chancellor exercising jurisdiction in lunacy is certain. On the 14th of February, 1726, it was determined by the House of Lords after debate, and partly in view of the statute 17 Edw. 2, De prerogativa Regis, that no appeal from such an order lay to the House of Lords, because the appeal must be made to the Crown itself in Council. In consequence of this resolution of the Lords the appeal then in question was brought before the King in Council, the jurisdiction was debated and affirmed on the 15th of May, 1728, and the matter of the appeal determined: 3 Peere Williams, 107 n. That determination was repeatedly recognized afterwards as a governing authority, and it was hardly questioned here that, unless a rule made under the rule-making power created by the Judicature Act has taken away the appeal, the right of appeal still exists.

But it is said that the nature of this order is such that it is not subject to appeal. That question depends on the true construction of section 109 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as affected by section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873. The words, so far as they are material to the present question, are, that the order for costs "shall have the effect of an order of the High Court." The section does not make it an order of the High Court. It does not enact that it shall be deemed an order of the High Court, or use any equivalent phrase which would invest the order when made with all the incidents and qualities of an order of the High Court. The effect of the order is, I think, its operative power as an order, and if it had been intended to attach to an order made under section 109 all the provisions which are made with reference to orders made by the High Court, I cannot but think that something more than one compendious phrase (which, however, as I have said, will not, in my opinion, bear that meaning), would have been used when the Legislature were dealing with the very peculiar jurisdiction exercised over the person and property of a lunatic.

It may well be, as was said by Lord Selborne in the House of Lords in Metropolitan Asylum District Board v. Hill, 28 W. R. 663, 5 App. Cas. 582, that "when the merits of a question have been determined, and when a court has thought fit to give or refuse costs, in the exercise of its discretion, and in the absence of any settled principle on the subject, the Courts of Appeal must give so much credit to the exercise of that discretion as not to allow the merits, when they are no longer in controversy, to be again gone over with great expenditure, not only of money, but also of judicial time, for the mere purpose of reviewing that discretion." It would, however, be, in my view, a total misapprehension of the phrase "the merits of the question" to apply it to the inquiries directed on behalf of a person alleged to be a lunatic. A question such as the present must be treated rather as a question in some respects as to the proper expenditure of money on behalf of the lunatic; the merits do not depend on the result of the inquiry at all. Sir Henry James very truly said that the question of the propriety or impropriety of the inquiry and facts relevant to that question might be wholly irrelevant to the issue which the jury were called upon to determine. I think there is no true analogy between proceedings of the character now in question, and proceedings between hostile litigants or even claims against an estate or a fund wherein claimants in their own interest are endeavouring by legal process to get something for themselves.

The theory upon which proceedings in lunacy are taken is that the proceedings are for the benefit and protection of the persons who are believed to be incapable by reason of mental infirmity of protecting themselves and their property. The principle, therefore, applicable to a litigant who has failed in his litigation is not even primâ facie applicable to a petitioner who asks for the protection of the law in favour of one requiring the law's protection. Turner, L.J. (in In re Windham), replying to the argument that the jury had found the alleged lunatic to be of sound mind, and that, therefore, the costs ought to be paid by the persons originating the inquiry, said that upon that ground alone he would not give the costs or any part of them. "The Crown," he said, "has the care and custody of the persons and estates of lunatics as parens patriæ. It exercises its parental powers at the instance of the relations or friends of the alleged lunatics who apply to it on their behalf, and nothing, in my opinion, could be more prejudicial to the welfare of the unfortunate persons on whose behalf such applications are made than to give any countenance to the notion that the applications will of necessity subject the persons by whom they are made to the payment, not merely of their own costs, but of all the costs which may be incurred, if in the result the verdict of a jury should establish that the applications cannot be supported. To lay down any such doctrine would, in many cases at least, go far to paralyze the power of the Crown and to deprive those who may unhappily be visited with mental disease of the care and protection which by virtue of that power is thrown around them in the exercise of the jurisdiction in lunacy." In re Windham the Lords Justices were doubtless there dealing with an application by the alleged lunatic that the persons engaged in asking for the inquiry should be ordered to pay all the costs of the proceedings, but the principles upon which the learned judge founds his judgment have a wider application than the circumstances of the particular case.

It seems to me that if the demand for an inquiry is really prompted by a desire to protect the person and property of the alleged lunatic, and is presented on reasonable grounds and in a reasonable manner, the expense of such a proceeding ought not to fall upon the person so invoking the aid of the law to protect those in need of protection. It is significant that in the case just quoted the doubt was expressed whether in the then state of the law it was competent in the court to order the costs of the lunatic or alleged lunatic to be paid by the petitioner. Section 109 appears to have been framed in the widest possible terms to give complete jurisdiction to the court to award the costs in accordance with what may appear to be right.

In saying what I have said as to the apparent policy of the law I have to some extent anticipated what I have to say with respect to the principle which should guide the court in deciding this particular appeal. I am reluctant to indicate any difference of opinion from that given by Lindley, L.J., in his most valuable analysis of the considerations by which a court should be guided in exercising the discretion as to costs given by the statute, and certainly as to the first four heads I am heartily in agreement; but I fear I cannot concur in considering the means of the respective parties as a topic that ought to enter into the question, though as to the latter part of the fifth head of the learned judge's analysis I entirely concur. It is quite true that either party may by his conduct render an inquiry much more expensive than it might otherwise have been, and, undoubtedly, had there in this case been a cross appeal that consideration might have been a very serious one indeed.

It is necessary very shortly to glance at the facts. Now whatever may have been the real state of Mrs. Cathcart's mind in September, 1887, she certainly by her conduct gave rise to a reasonable suspicion that she was not completely of sound mind. No explanation has ever been given of her accusations against her husband, admitted now by everyone to be unjust, but recurred to over and over again with persistent pertinacity, and acted upon by Mrs. Cathcart, so that within a short time of her marriage she separated from her husband, and never willingly associated with him again.

Again, she had, or supposed she had, some complaint to make as to settlements. I will assume, in favour of her sanity, that her complaint was well founded, though it is only for the sake of argument I assume it. It is impossible to believe in a sound state of mind in a person who, upon the assumption I have made, accuses every person engaged in the arrangement of the settlement, of fraud and mixes up the supposed fraud with persons and things ridiculous in their absurd incongruity. Most unfortunately, as I think, the husband was badly advised. The letters of October, 1889, are not written as if by a considerate husband, conscious of his wife's mental weakness, but rather by a hostile litigant threatening proceedings, and, not for the only time in this narrative, giving rise to the accusation that the motive which actuated him was not conjugal tenderness, but involved some considerations of self-interest. The same may be said of the negotiations in the following March. They partake more of threat than persuasion, and they seem to have had the effect of arousing Mrs. Cathcart's suspicions that she was to be treated as a lunatic.

Then came the application to the Skipton magistrates, an application which showed an intention to treat everyone who had anything to do with the settlements as guilty of some criminal offence, and I must say that if the husband had proceeded after the receipt of Mr. Preston's letter and enclosure to apply to the court, I do not think anyone could have objected to the proceeding as hasty and uncalled for. Unfortunately Mr. Cathcart took the matter into his own hands. The letter written to his wife was, I fear, not a candid one. I cannot doubt that he did intend to get his wife into an asylum. In some parts of this case I am quite willing to make allowance for a layman to some extent in the hands of those who ought to have known better, when he took wrong forms of procedure; but I cannot think the proceedings at Ashbourne admit of any such palliation. It did not require a lawyer to inform him that it was neither kind nor considerate to force himself into his wife's room where she was quietly asleep and take her by force after twelve o'clock at night, probably much later, and drive away with her a distance of seven or eight miles. I do not believe that there was no intention to place Mrs. Cathcart in an asylum. The two nurses, the attendant from the Stafford Asylum, the midnight visit to the doctor at Ashbourne, form such a combination of facts that I come to the conclusion very firmly that, notwithstanding the not very creditable letter written by Mr. Cathcart, his object was to place her in an asylum; and if the costs now in question were applicable to any part of this transaction, I should certainly not be a party to relieving Mr. Cathcart from the payment of them. The procuring of Mrs. Cathcart's signature to the authority to deal with the local banking account and the rent of Wootton forms part apparently of the same scheme, and appears to me as part of the same scheme to be equally indefensible.

But the costs now in question have no relation to the transactions I have been describing. The costs are applicable to the inquiry requested by a petition dated the 8th of April, 1891, praying for an inquiry into the alleged lunacy of Mrs. Mary Cathcart, and if they were only such costs as were rendered a necessary expenditure by the petition in question, I do not think that under the circumstances of Mrs. Cathcart's then mental condition, and her uncontrollable disposition, the question could have been plausibly argued. Unfortunately for Mr. Cathcart, he was here again, as it seems to me, very badly advised; but what I have said before about his proceedings at Ashbourne is no longer applicable. He might, I think, without any personal default, be under the impression that he was justified in proceeding under an urgency order because he was so advised. I cannot myself too earnestly deprecate such an application of the power given under the statute. An urgency order is what its very name indicates. The safeguards for personal freedom which the Legislature had provided were obviously considered inappropriate to cases where instant intervention was required, either for the sake of the alleged lunatic or for the sake of the public, and, accordingly, exceptional provisions were made for such a contingency; but to suggest that they could be resorted to because there were no other means of getting evidence is so strange and perverse a view that I was much surprised to hear it gravely put forward. It is enough, however, at present to say that there is no foundation whatever for such a contention. In respect, however, of Mr. Cathcart's responsibility for such a course of procedure, it would be a very harsh judgment to attribute to him the grave error that, in my view, was committed, and which had the effect, not unnaturally, of raising prejudices against the husband which he has had to regret all through the litigation.

But the broad question before Mr. Cathcart was whether his wife required, and by some sort of procedure ought to receive, care and attention. To that question what answer can be reasonably given but one? She was under a constant belief that she was being poisoned. She was under a constant belief that judges and relatives, including her own mother, were in a conspiracy to poison her, that her mother had procured the murder of her father by bribing a groom to put a wrong bit in the mouth of a vicious horse, and that then a woman was employed to frighten the horse; that she was drugged within three months of her marriage to prevent her having an heir; that her husband was guilty of the grossest immorality with servants, and that her own mother was a party to unlawful operations upon the victims of his profligacy—and all this without a scintilla of fact to justify such atrocious accusations. If she was not mad in making them, she certainly could not be heard to complain that her own conduct and statements gave a not unreasonable belief in her insanity. These statements were brought to the knowledge of her husband's advisers long before the 8th of April, 1891. It is obvious to ask what was a husband to do under such circumstances. Was he to fold his hands in indifference to such a state of things? If he did act at all, it was most certainly the right course in such a case as his to invoke the protection of the lunacy laws, and those laws, if properly appealed to, involve neither oppression nor cruelty.

I do not desire to say anything of the verdict of the jury. It was a verdict of the majority, and they had the advantage of seeing and conversing with Mrs. Cathcart. It may be that, upon the issue with which they had to deal—namely, whether at the time of inquisition found, Mrs. Cathcart was capable of managing herself and her property—the jury were right, but that does not decide the question whether for months and years before that time her conduct and demeanour had been such as to lead to the reasonable belief that she required to be put under some restraint. I think it unquestionably was so, and I have no doubt, therefore, that the order under appeal should be affirmed and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

There remains the other appeal as to the form of the order ably and plausibly attacked by the learned counsel Mr. Norton, but I have come to the conclusion that the order is right.

It is true that the R. S. C., 1875, dealt with charging orders, and dealt with them in such a way that for such orders no other course of procedure was permitted than that pointed out, and it is clear that in this case that form of procedure has not been followed. But the argument fails, I think, in this, that the order now under appeal is not a charging order within the meaning of ord. 46, r. 1. It is true it may operate as a charging order, but it is obviously not the thing therein referred to. Section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, is quite wide in its terms, and I think it clear that the order originally made by the Lords Justices was within their jurisdiction to make, and equally clear that they had power to enforce it by the section in question, passed nine years after the rules and orders of 1875, which are relied on as restricting the power of enforcing anything which may operate as a charge. I think, therefore, this appeal also should be dismissed, with costs, and the other appeal which is brought as a separate appeal must share the same fate.

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Hood, Barrs, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Crawley, Arnold, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } North, J. } Nov. 2.

In re GODDEN.
TRAGUE v. FOX. (a.)

Tenant for life and remainderman—Income and capital—Apportionment—Mortgage—Mortgagees in possession—Will—Conversion clause.

A testator at the date of his death was in possession of a colliery as mortgagee, and there were considerable sums owing to his estate under the mortgage. After his death a receiver was put to work the colliery by the trustees of his will, and the trustees finally foreclosed the mortgage. Under his will the testator had given his trustees power to postpone the conversion of any part of real and personal estate. Prior to the date of the foreclosure decree the receiver had paid into court to the credit of the foreclosure action considerable sums of money, representing the net profits of working the colliery, which sums had been increased by accumulations of interest. This fund had been transferred to the credit of an action for the administration of the testator's estate. The tenants for life claimed the whole fund as income.

Held, that the accumulations of interest were income, and belonged to the tenants for life; that until the date of foreclosure absolute the mine was not a part of the testator's estate affected by the conversion clause, but only a security for money advanced, and that the profits arising from the working of the mine previous to that date must be apportioned between the tenants for life and remaindermen, on the principle that the tenants for life were entitled to the difference between the sum transferred into court and the sum which, with interest at four per cent. from the date of the testator's death to the date of the transfer to the credit of this action, would amount to the sum transferred into court; and that the sum so calculated belonged to the estate as capital.

In re Earl of Chesterfield's Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643, followed.

(a.) Reported by G. B. M. COORE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. E. Godden, at his decease, on the 6th of January, 1887, was mortgagee in possession of the Anan Hill Colliery, and there was due to his estate for principal and interest under the mortgage the sum of £13,515 6s. 2d. After his death the trustees of his will put in a receiver, and subsequently commenced a foreclosure action. The mortgage was foreclosed on the 18th of December, 1891, and subsequently the receiver was continued as receiver in an administration action—In re Godden (deceased). Large net profits were made from time to time in the working of the colliery and paid into court by the receiver in the mortgage action, which were subsequently transferred to the credit of the administration action. There was now in court a sum of £5,689 14s. New Consols, representing the profits derived from the colliery with accumulated interest down to the date of the foreclosure decree. Further sums had been paid into court subsequent to the foreclosure decree, but concerning these no question arose.

The tenants for life under the will of the testator, made subsequent to his entrance as mortgagee (which, so far as it concerns the point at issue, is set out in the judgment), claimed the whole sum as income, and one of them took out a summons for payment to them of the fund in equal shares.

At the date of the summons there was due to the testator's estate the sum of £16,233 0s. 1d. under the mortgage security for principal and interest.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Stock, for the plaintiff.—The testator has given his trustees power to postpone conversion of any part of his real and personal estate. The sums paid into court by the receiver are income, and must go to the tenants for life.

Badcock, Willis Bund, and Vernon R. Smith, for the other tenants for life.

Methold and Clydesdale, for the persons interested in remainder.—The fund must be apportioned between the tenants for life and the remaindermen, on the principle laid down in In re Earl Chesterfield's Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643.

They also cited In re Foster, 39 W. R. 31, 45 Ch. D. 629; In re Ancketill, 27 L. R. Ir. 331, 39 W. R. Dig. 9; Cox v. Cox, 17 W. R. 790, L. R. 8 Eq. 343.

Ingle Joyce, for the trustees.

Hall, Q.C., in reply.—The cases cited differ from the present case. This testator's will gave no direction as to income, which must go, therefore, to the tenants for life. In this case, also, there was an ascertained loss between income and capital which it was necessary to make up. In this case, as the mine has not yet been realized, it cannot be said for certain whether there is any loss at all. The decision in Re Chancellor, 32 W. R. 465, 26 Ch. D. 42, is applicable here.

NORTH, J., after stating that as the different parties had taken the view that all other questions as to income were adjusted except as to the share of the tenants for life in this fund, and he was prepared on this footing to make an order in respect to it as if it were a separate fund, continued:—This is an application by the tenants for life to have the whole fund. This is what they ask, and nothing else. That seems out of the question. The facts are these: The testator, before the date of his will, became mortgagee in possession of a certain mining property. The mortgage had been made some time before, but he did not enter into possession till some months before the date of his will; he remained in possession till his death; and for some time after his death his trustees remained in possession until a time was reached when they absolutely foreclosed the mortgagor, and from that time forward the mine itself became part of the testator's estate as distinguished from what had been part of his estate before, namely, the debt due from the mortgagor to the testator as mortgagee. Before the foreclosure decree, the trustees of the estate had a charge on the mine by way of security, but the fact of this charge on the mine existing, did not make the mine itself part of the testator's estate.

The question arises as to the money received by the receiver down to the time of absolute foreclosure, and does not include any money received by him in respect of proceeds or profits of working after that date. There are also some accumulations of interest on the sums paid in. The question is in what way these must be applied. The interest is to some extent in arrears, but the tenants for life say that under a clause in the testator's will they are entitled to have the whole of the profits arising from the working of the mine as part of the income of the testator's estate. In my opinion it is not so at all.

I will read the clause first. It is: "The trustees or trustee may postpone, during such period as they or he may deem expedient, the sale, collection, and conversion of all or any part of my real and personal estate, including any leasehold or other property of a perishable or terminable nature, or any policy of assurance or reversionary interest or shares in any mining or other company or adventure or partnership business." In my opinion he does not in any of these words refer to a sale of the mine or a postponement of the sale of the mine for this reason: He was mortgagee, and that to which he was entitled was the debt due from the mortgagor to whom the mine belonged, and the mine was merely held as security, and the thing to which the clause did apply was the debt due from the owners of the mine to him. It is express as to that. They might postpone the collection or conversion of any part of his personal estate; they might refrain from realizing the mortgage, and that they did; and it was only afterwards the foreclosure took place. The words are, "the income to arise from such part of my real or personal estate as shall for the time being remain unconverted," that is, under the power to leave it unconverted, "shall be applied and dealt with in manner hereinbefore directed with regard to the income of the moneys produced by such sale, collection and conversion." The debt due on the mortgage security did not produce any income, and they cannot, therefore, under that clause be entitled to anything in the shape of income. But, inasmuch as they are tenants for life of the testator's estate, and what was due on the mortgage forms part of the testator's estate, they are entitled to have some allowance in respect of interest at four per cent. on the calculated amount of what the testator's property is. I think, therefore, this clause does not help them in the least. But, there being this property which is realizable by the testator's executors, they are entitled to have the income upon it.

First of all, though it is really last of all in point of date, there have been certain sums in court arising from the income of the fund invested. These sums belong to the tenants for life. They are income arising from the accumulations in court of the sums paid into court. As to the rest of the fund, it must be divided between the tenants for life and the remaindermen on the principle laid down in the cases cited by Mr. Methold. It will be necessary to inquire what sum, with interest at four per cent. from the date of the testator's death to the date of the transfer to the credit of this action, would amount to the sum transferred, and the tenants for life will be entitled to the difference between the amount so paid into court and the amount so found, and this last amount will belong to the estate as capital. Mr. Hall attempts to distinguish these cases from the present case on the ground that they were cases in which the whole fund had been realized and was going to be distributed and there was a deficiency, whereas in the present case the mine has not yet been realized, and it is as yet impossible to say whether when realized it will turn out to be insufficient to satisfy all that is due in respect of it. I do not think that that criticism is accurate if applied to all the cases that have been cited; but even if it were accurate it makes no difference, because we have to deal with the fund now available, and that fund is admittedly insufficient to provide in full in respect of the claims of capital and income, and as it is insufficient to provide for the whole, all we can do is to divide it as far as it will go in the same way as the whole fund would now have been divided if it had been sufficient. If it turns out hereafter that there is sufficient to pay the parties in full there is no reason why the distribution of the present fund should be postponed. If there is not sufficient, the reason for postponing it is itself displaced.

Solicitors, Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton, for Chilcott & Son, Truro; Crowder & Vizard; Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for A. H. Jenkyn, Penrhyn; W. E. Aldis; J. G. Fox & Co.

(1893) 1 Ch. 548.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } Dec. 20; Jan. 12.

DAY v. LONGHURST. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Injunction to restrain negotiation—Bearer—Holder—Delivery without indorsement—Subsequent indorsement—Solicitor—Contempt of court—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 2, 31, sub-sections 1, 3, 4.

L. was, in July, 1892, restrained by injunction from "negotiating, pledging, or disposing of" certain bills of exchange, which were payable to order. He had, previously to that date, deposited with his solicitor, Y., the bills in question to secure a debt, and in October, 1892, while the injunction was still in force, he, at the request of Y., indorsed one of the bills. On a motion to commit L. and Y. for contempt of court, on the ground that the bill had been negotiated contrary to the injunction,

Held, that, by the indorsement in October, 1892, Y., who up to that time had been merely the transferee of the bill, became the "holder" of it within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, and the bill was for the first time "negotiated" within the meaning of section 31, sub-section 1, and that there had been a contempt of court.

Motion.

This was a motion to commit the defendant Longhurst and his solicitor, Young, for contempt of court.

On the 1st of July, 1892, an order was made in this action restraining the defendant over the 8th of July from "negotiating, pledging, or disposing of" certain bills of exchange. This interim order was from time to time continued down to the 22nd of November, 1892. Previously to the commencement of the action the bills in question (which were payable to the defendant's order) had been deposited by him with Young by way of security for a debt, but had not been indorsed, and they had since continued in Young's possession. On the 5th of October, 1892, while the interim order was in force, the defendant, at the request of Young, indorsed one of them; and the motion to commit the defendant and his solicitor for contempt of court was thereupon made.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provides, as follows:—

Section 2.—"Bearer" means the person in possession of a bill or note which is payable to bearer. "Holder" means the payee or indorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof.

Section 31 (1).—A bill is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such a manner as to constitute the transferee the holder of the bill. Sub-section (3).—A bill payable to order is negotiated by the indorsement of the holder completed by delivery. Sub-section (4).—Where the holder of a bill payable to his order transfers it for value without indorsing it, the transfer gives the transferee such title as the transferor had in the bill, and the transferee, in addition, acquires the right to have the indorsement of the transferor.

Hastings, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiff.—The bill has been negotiated by the defendant. Until the bill was indorsed Young had no better title than the defendant. When, however, the indorsement was subsequently obtained, the transfer took effect as a negotiation from the time of such indorsement: Chalmers on Bills of Exchange, 4th ed., p. 104, note on Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 31 (4), where he quotes from the judgment of Willes, J., in Whistler v. Forster, 11 W. R. 649, 14 C. B. N. S. 257-9. The defendant has consequently been guilty of contempt of court. Young also, as an officer of the court, has been guilty of breach of duty and gross contempt in acting as he has done: Ex parte Hayward, In re Plant, 45 L. T. N. S. 326, 30 W. R. Dig. 49.

Buckley, Q.C., and Lewis Edmunds, for the respondents.—There has been no contempt of court. Negotiation was complete as soon as the bill was delivered. Negotiation means the transfer of the interest so that some other person becomes the owner of the debt represented by the bill. The right to have the indorsement is not part of the negotiation. When the bill is transferred, section 31, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882 gives a right to an indorsement, which is not a mere voluntary indorsement. Young therefore had a right to compel the defendant to indorse the bill.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., after referring to the definition of "bearer" and "holder" in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 2, continued:—Previously to the 5th of October, 1892, Young was neither "bearer" nor "holder" of the bills in question. The former term applies only to the person in possession of a bill or note payable to bearer, which this was not, and the latter to a payee or indorsee of a bill or note, which Young was not. [His lordship then read section 31, sub-sections 1 and 3, and said:—] Previously to the 5th of October, 1892, the bill had not been transferred to Young so as to constitute him the holder of the bill, for he was not "payee" or "indorsee," therefore the bill was not up to that date negotiated. On the 5th of October, 1892, the bill, being in the possession of Young, was for the first time indorsed by the defendant. Young, who up to that time had been merely the transferee of the bill, now for the first time became the "holder" of it within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, and the bill was for the first time "negotiated" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 31; consequently the defendant by his act on the 5th of October, 1892, converted Young from a mere transferee into a holder of the bill, and, in my opinion, negotiated the bill, contrary to the interim order which had been made.

On behalf of the respondents reliance was placed on sub-section 4 of section 31. No doubt that sub-section shows that Young had, prior to the 5th of October, 1892, the right to have the indorsement of the defendant, and, consequently, to sue the defendant if he refused to indorse the bill. That, however, did not justify the defendant in violating the order of the court. If proceedings were taken or threatened by Young, the defendant ought to have applied either that the injunction might be removed, so as to enable him to give effect to Young's rights, or else to have Young made a party to the action. The latter alternative, however, the defendant actually declined, in the course of the hearing of the motion. In my opinion the defendant has violated the order of the court. I do not, however, regard the case as one of serious contempt, and as regards costs I think justice well be met if I order the defendant to pay those of the applicant and leave Young to pay his own.

Motion dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Satchell & Chapple.

Solicitors for the respondents, Coburn & Young.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Charles, J.) — Jan. 27.

HENNELL v. DAVIS AND AUSTIN. (a.)

County court—Practice—Payment into court without denial of liability—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1)—Forms 103, 104A.

The plaintiff brought an action in the High Court for work and labour as an engineer, and the particulars of his claim consisted of various items. The action having been remitted to the county court, the defendants paid £10 into the county court under the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1), without denying liability, and without specifying any items as being those in respect of which the payment was made.

Held, that, by the payment into the county court, a cause of action was admitted, but not that something was due on every item of the account.

Steavenson v. Corporation of Berwick, 1 Q. B. 154, followed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of C. E. Lloyd, Esq., deputy judge sitting at the County Court of Kent holden at Gravesend.

The plaintiff, Thomas Hennell, claimed £27 1s. for work done as a civil engineer, and the indorsement upon the writ which was issued in the High Court, was as follows:—

"STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

"The plaintiff's claim is £27 1s. for work done as a civil engineer.

"PARTICULARS.

"1891 "February "to March	"Making survey of tunnel, "roads, and property adjoining at Northfleet as "instructed	6	6	0
"1892	"Railway fare and expenses	0	16	0
	"To perusing, settling, and "swearing affidavit . .	1	1	0
	"Drawing plans of tunnels, "and preparing evidence "for use in court . . .	9	9	0

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Two copies of drawings .	4	4	0
"Attending court two days	6	6	0
	£28	2	0
"Less amount received for "subpœna	1	1	0
	£27	1	0"

The action was remitted to the county court, and the defendants paid £10 into the county court under County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1), without denying liability, and without specifying any items as being those in respect of which the payment was made.

The deputy county court judge held that this payment into court operated as an admission by the defendants, not merely of a cause of action, but also that something was due from them on each separate item of the claim; that the defendants, therefore, were not entitled to dispute their liability for something in respect of any item; and that the only question they could raise was whether each item respectively was reasonable in amount.

The defendants appealed.

Muir, for the appellants.—[CHARLES, J.—It does not follow because you pay money into court that you admit liability on every item.]

Garrett, for the respondent.—The question really was whether the defendants could deny the plaintiff's retainer as to some of the items. If the defendants had paid the £10 in under form 104A they would have been bound to specify the items in respect of which the payment was made; but they deliberately pay it in under form 103 in respect of the whole cause of action, so that when the plaintiff comes to trial he does not know what items the defendants dispute. Unless an allocation is made to the different items, the admission of liability comes to nothing; it merely says, "I admit you did some work for me." [CHARLES, J.—That is all it ever did.] [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The payment admits that they owe you some amount on some contract. His lordship referred to Steavenson v. Corporation of Berwick, 1 Q. B. 154.]

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case must go back for a new trial. The point of law is against the respondent. The payment into court had not the effect the county court judge thought it had. There must be a new trial.

CHARLES, J.—There must be a new trial. The action was for work and labour. The defendants paid money into court. The county court judge held that that admitted that something was due on every item for work and labour. The case of Steavenson v. Corporation of Berwick, cited by my lord, shows that it is not so. By the payment into court a cause of action is admitted; but not every item of the account.

New trial ordered.

Solicitors for the appellants, Sismey & Sismey, for Tolhurst, Lovell, & Clinch, Gravesend.

Solicitors for the respondent, Waller & Sons.

Q. B. Div. (Day and Collins, JJ.) — Jan. 18.

DANDO v. BODEN. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Specially-indorsed writ—Claim for "bank charges"—Liquidated demand—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 57—Ord. 3, r. 6—Ord. 14, r. 1.

In an action on a bill of exchange the writ was specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6, with a claim for the amount of the bill, and also 2*s.* 9*d.* "bank charges."

Held, that by the expression "bank charges" expenses of noting were referred to, and that as expenses of noting are made liquidated damages by section 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, this was a good special indorsement.

Appeal of the plaintiff from an order of Kennedy, J., in chambers, setting aside a judgment.

The action was brought on a bill of exchange, and by the writ, which was specially indorsed, the sum of £25 2s. 9d. was claimed. The particulars on the writ showed that that sum was made up of £25, the amount of the bill, and 2s. 9d. for "bank charges."

The defendant failed to enter appearance and the plaintiff signed judgment. The defendant then applied to the district registrar to set aside the judgment, but failed in his application. He appealed to the judge in chambers, who set aside the judgment on the ground that the claim for "bank charges" was a claim for unliquidated damages, and that the indorsement on the writ was not a good special indorsement.

The plaintiff appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, for the plaintiff.—This is a good special indorsement. "Bank charges" is merely another term for "expenses of noting," which by section 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, are liquidated damages, and can therefore be the subject of a specially-indorsed writ.

Jelf, Q.C., and Lyttelton, for the defendant.—It is incumbent on the plaintiff to show affirmatively on the face of the writ that "bank charges" mean nothing more than expenses of noting. He cannot do so, and therefore the judge in chambers was right in holding that he had no jurisdiction to order judgment for the plaintiff: Gold Ores Reduction Co. v. Parr, 40 W. R. 526, [1892] 2 Q. B. 14; Sheba Gold Mining Co. v. Trubshawe, 40 W. R. 381, [1892] 1 Q. B. 674; Wilks v. Wood, 40 W. R. 418, [1892] 1 Q. B. 684.

DAY, J.—I am of opinion that this is a frivolous objection. The Bills of Exchange Act enables a person to recover the expenses of noting. In this case the writ is indorsed with the amount of the bill and bank charges. It has been argued that bank charges cannot cover the expenses of noting, but it is quite clear that in this case they did, and it is not suggested that they covered anything more. The mere fact that the identical words of the Act have not been used is immaterial. The appeal will be allowed.

COLLINS, J.—I agree. It is said on behalf of the defendant that, owing to the nature of this indorsement, there is no jurisdiction to deal with this writ as a specially-indorsed writ. Although that is a purely technical objection, the defendant is perfectly entitled to take it, because the construction of order 14 is a very technical matter. In my opinion, however, the authorities dealing with order 14 do not oblige us, in this case, to depart from the canons of common sense. The argument for the defendant would prevail if it could be shown that the claim for bank charges was a claim for damages which were not liquidated damages under the act; but if the claim is primâ facie a claim for something which has been made liquidated damages, then the argument fails. In my opinion the expression bankers' charges is a good way of describing expenses of noting, and is quite consistent with meaning nothing but expenses of noting.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Stokes & Hooper, Dudley.

Solicitors for the defendant, G. Warmington, for Plant, Dudley.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — Feb. 9.

In re VANSITTART.
Ex parte BROWN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Avoidance of voluntary settlement—Pledge of settled property by donee to third parties before settlement declared void—Title of trustee in bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47—Construction of statute.

The operation of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is confined to the person who claims under the voluntary settlement as donee, and does not extend to a purchaser for valuable consideration in good faith from such donee, at any rate where such purchaser had no notice of the settlement.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order against the respondents, Messrs. Hirsch & Co., to deliver up certain jewellery.

The case was consequent on the decision of the court in the case of In re Vansittart, Ex parte Brown, ante, p. 32, by which it was held that a present of diamond jewellery by the bankrupt to his wife within two years of the bankruptcy was a voluntary "settlement" within the meaning of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and was void against the trustee.

It now appeared that previous to the receiving order being made a large portion of the jewellery in question had been deposited by Mrs. Vansittart with Messrs. Hirsch & Co., who were a firm of stockbrokers, in order to assist her husband by inducing them to withdraw a bankruptcy notice, and to forbear proceeding against him in respect of a judgment which they had obtained for £524.

The trustee now applied for an order against Messrs. Hirsch & Co. to deliver up the jewellery.

Witt, Q.C., and Germaine, for the trustee, referred to Curtis v. Price, 12 Ves., at p. 103; Ex parte Bell, 1 Gl. & J. 283; In re Briggs & Spicer, 39 W. R. 377, [1891] 2 Ch. 127.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Abrahams, for the respondents, referred to George v. Milbanke, 9 Ves. 190; May's Bankruptcy, 2nd ed., p. 315; Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 626; Morewood v. South Yorkshire Railway, 28 L. J. Ex. 114, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 14; Hance v. Harding, 36 W. R. 629, 20 Q. B. D. 732; Halifax Banking Co. v. Gledhill, 39 W. R. 104, [1891] 1 Ch. 31.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question I have to decide is really the true construction of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The facts which make it necessary for me to construe that section are shortly these: The bankrupt made a settlement on his wife of certain jewellery. I have held that that settlement is a void settlement by reason of the provisions of section 47. Before it was known or decided that that settlement was a void settlement, that is to say, before the bankruptcy occurred at all, and before, therefore, the settlement could be declared void, Mrs. Vansittart, the beneficiary under the settlement, pledged the jewellery, the subject-matter of the settlement, with the respondents, Messrs. Hirsch & Co., and the trustee in the bankruptcy comes now and says that inasmuch as it is provided by section 47 that such a settlement is void, and the word used is void and not voidable, it follows that the settlement is void altogether and for all purposes, and that, therefore, the persons who claim under Mrs. Vansittart, namely, Messrs. Hirsch & Co., the respondents, cannot set up any title as against the trustee under this void conveyance. Of course this question could not arise unless I was of opinion that Messrs. Hirsch & Co. were persons who were claiming under this settlement in good faith and for valuable consideration. But I am of opinion that Messrs. Hirsch & Co. are claiming in good faith and for valuble consideration. I have not here to take into consideration what their conduct was as between themselves and the bankrupt, or as between themselves and the creditors. In determining the question of bona fides under the section, I have merely to consider whether or not at the time when Messrs. Hirsch & Co. accepted from Mrs. Vansittart this pledge of the jewellery they honestly believed her to be entitled to the jewellery which she was pledging to them, and had no knowledge or reason to believe that she was claiming under a document which would be impeachable as against creditors. That is all I have to consider in determining whether Messrs. Hirsch & Co. took the deposit in good faith and for valuable consideration; and I am of opinion that Messrs. Hirsch & Co. did take the deposit in good faith and for valuable consideration.

In the course of Mr. Witt's argument I suggested to him that all that an order under section 47 does is to prevent anyone claiming under the settlement, and that the order did not establish any title necessarily in the trustee; and I suggested, further, that it might very well be that although Messrs. Hirsch & Co. might be debarred from claiming under the settlement, possibly they might have a good title dehors the settlement, because either the transaction might have to be considered as a transaction by the husband himself, or a transaction in which the husband would be estopped from denying the validity of the pledge. But although I am distinctly of opinion that the effect of the order is only what I have said—namely, is only to prevent Messrs. Hirsch & Co., or anyone claiming under the settlement, from relying on it as against the trustee; although it may be, under those circumstances, the trustee would have to make a title against Messrs. Hirsch & Co., yet I cannot say that I am satisfied myself that Messrs. Hirsch & Co. would have any answer, by reason either of the husband being principal in the transaction or being estopped, to the primâ facie title which would arise in favour of the trustee, immediately on the displacement of the settlement, by reason of the antecedent title of the grantor of the settlement.

Under those circumstances I do not propose to decide this case on that ground. It has been suggested that I might decide the case on another ground—namely, that the transaction falls within the terms of the protecting section—section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—and the case of Hance v.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Harding was cited as an authority for that proposition. But I am afraid I cannot get any assistance from that case, because it is obvious that that was only a decision that a transaction, although it fell within section 47, might be a protected transaction by virtue of section 49. That means a protected transaction as between the original parties to it. There is nothing to suggest that the protection afforded is a protection which will enure for the protection of a transferee from the person who could not claim the protection of the section. The object of the protecting section is to save persons dealing with the bankrupt between the date of the act of bankruptcy and the receiving order from being too hardly pressed by the doctrine of relation. I doubt whether I could apply the section in favour of Messrs. Hirsch & Co., because they could only claim through Mrs. Vansittart, and, therefore, I do not think the protecting section was available for Messrs. Hirsch & Co. here.

Now before I state what my decision in this case is I want to dispose of one argument put forward by Mr. Witt. He said that I could not decide against the trustee unless I introduced into section 47 a saving proviso which is not there, and he pointed out that in section 48 there is a saving proviso, and he said that it would be a very strong thing to read in such a clause into section 47 when I must suppose that the Legislature had in their minds the necessity of such a clause because they put it into section 48. The answer to that is that in section 48 there is a reason for such a clause, and that is that the act of fraudulent preference by the bankrupt is an act of bankruptcy, and as it is an act of bankruptcy, unless you introduce a saving clause, the transferee from the person preferred might be very unjustly dealt with. The transaction in section 47 is not an act of bankruptcy at all, but a mere isolated transaction; and under those circumstances the Legislature might very well have thought that the necessity of introducing such a clause in section 48 did not apply to section 47.

Still I have now to construe this section and speaking for myself, I should for various reasons have very little hesitation in so construing the section as really to prevent its operation extending to bonâ fide purchasers for value under those who claim as beneficiaries under the settlement, because there are a multitude of reasons to lead one to such a construction. In the first place, speaking generically, it belongs to a class of legislation in favour of creditors and under those circumstances you should always apply the same reasoning to such legislation, and again and again it has been held that where consideration is given subsequently to the original settlement, that consideration enures to prevent the transaction being considered as a voluntary transaction so as to injuriously affect the person who has given the valuable consideration. Moreover, one cannot forget the history of the section, which is in substance the same as has appeared in successive Bankruptcy Acts down to 1869, when the words were slightly altered, and it was never contended that the section had any application to bind purchasers for value from those who claimed under the settlement. One must look carefully at the words of the Act of Parliament to see whether any alteration was intended to be made. I think that if the whole terms of the section are looked at it is only intended to bind those who claim under the settlement. Of course I know that a person who purchases from a person claiming under the settlement also claims under the settlement. But in construing this Act of Parliament I am not at all sure that the words require such a construction. I have already said that the inclination of my opinion would be that, notwithstanding the use of the word "void," the intention of the section is that it shall only operate on those who claim under the voluntary settlement as donees, and shall not bind purchasers for valuable consideration in good faith from those donees. The only difficulty I have in coming to this decision is caused by the decision of Stirling, J., in In re Briggs & Spicer. I feel impressed by that decision, and am somewhat doubtful whether I ought not to follow it, but on the whole I have come to the conclusion that the question Stirling, J., had to decide was a different question from that which I have to decide. He had to decide whether, under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, the purchaser could be compelled to accept a title, and he decided that he could not, because of this flaw. He points out that the purchaser had notice of the settlement, and that may make a difference. I do not understand here that Messrs. Hirsch & Co. had any notice of the settlement at all, or of the title of the wife. All that they knew was that she was dealing with the jewellery as her own jewellery, and the husband was standing by and seeing her do it. I have not to decide any question of notice, but whether the title of Messrs. Hirsch & Co., who only accepted the pledge from the wife without knowing her title, is defeated by the trustee by reason of the settlement now having been declared void. I think that the intention of the Act of Parliament was such that the trustee's title will not prevail against Messrs. Hirsch & Co., both because the section must be dealt with in the spirit applicable to this class of legislation, and the trustee having got a declaration that the settlement is void has not defeated the title of Messrs. Hirsch & Co. in respect of this jewellery given to them with the privity of the husband and without notice that Mrs. Vansittart was claiming under a voluntary settlement.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the trustee, R. & E. Bastard.

Solicitors for the respondents, M. Abrahams, Son, & Co.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } Oct. 28.
Probate. }

COLLINS AND TUFFLEY v. ELSTONE. (a.)

Probate—Will—Effect of words of revocation—Previous wills—Erroneous explanation.

If a testator employs another to convey his meaning in technical language, and that other person makes a mistake in doing it, the mistake is the same as if the testator had employed the technical language himself.

A lady, after making a previous will and codicil, desired to make a special disposition of a small sum of money payable under a policy of life insurance. She asked the insurance agent to draw up a will carrying out her intentions. He procured a form beginning with the words "I hereby revoke all wills by me at any time heretofore made," and, on his reading out these words, the testatrix objected to them, on the ground that she did not wish to revoke her previous will and codicil, but he assured her that, as the will in question related only to the insurance money, these words would not have the effect of revoking the other instruments, and, if struck out, might invalidate this will, and he believed what he stated to her. She accordingly executed the will with these words in.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, executors of all three documents, commenced an action asking for probate of all these testamentary papers, but with the words of revocation in the last omitted.

Held, that, on the authority of Guardhouse v. Blackburn, 14 W. R. 463, L. R. 1 P. & D. 109, and Morrell v. Morrell, 30 W. R. 491, 7 P. D. 68, the testatrix, having had the will read over to her, must, in the absence of fraud, be held to have approved as well as known the contents thereof, and probate of the last will only, with the words of revocation, granted.

Hearing of a probate action before the court without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the executors of a will dated the 12th of March, 1875, a codicil thereto dated the 21st of July, 1885, and a will dated the 17th of October, 1889, executed by Sarah Caroline Pinney, deceased, who died on the 9th of March, 1891. The defendant was Caroline Elstone, a first cousin of the deceased.

The plaintiffs, who were executors of all three testamentary papers, propounded them, but prayed that certain words revoking all previous wills contained in the last will might be omitted from the probate as having been inserted by mistake and without the knowledge and approval of the deceased.

The defendant, one of the next of kin, opposed the grant of probate of the first will and codicil as having been revoked by the last will, and asked for probate of the will of the 17th of October, 1889, as the true and last will of the testator.

It appeared from the evidence, and the facts were not disputed by the defendant, that the deceased and Miss Collins, one of the plaintiffs, were two maiden ladies of small means, who for thirty-one years lived together in a cottage at Belvedere, in the county of Kent. Many years before the deceased's death they had resolved to make mutual testamentary dispositions with the object of securing to the survivor of them substantially whatever both might possess at the time of the death of either. In pursuance of that arrangement Miss Pinney, the deceased, duly executed the will of March, 1875, and the codicil of July, 1885, disposing, in favour of Miss Collins, of an estate of under £300. A few months before her death it occurred to Miss Pinney that if she died before Miss Collins the latter might be in want of a little ready money for funeral expenses, and, in order to provide that, she insured her life for £50 in an office with which Mr. Tuffley, the other plaintiff, was connected as an out agent. Mr. Tuffley having acted for her in obtaining the policy, she asked him to draw a will by which she would make a testamentary disposition of the £50, in bequeathing £30 of it to Miss Collins, £10 to Mr. Tuffley's mother, and £10 to a clergyman. Mr. Tuffley procured a printed form of will with blanks for filling up. Almost the first words of it were—"I hereby revoke all wills by me at any time heretofore made." In his evidence to the court he said that he read the will with those words included in it to the testatrix, who at once objected to them, saying that she did not wish to revoke the will and codicil she had made; but he told her that, inasmuch as the will she was then making dealt only with the life insurance, and not with the estate dealt with in the previous will and its codicil, those words would not have the effect of revoking those two documents, and that the striking out of the words might vitiate the whole of the will of which they formed part. He swore that, in making the statement to the testatrix, he was stating what was his honest opinion. On hearing it the testatrix made no further objection, but executed the will with its revocatory clause.

B. Deane, for the plaintiffs.—The testator could not be said to have known and approved these revocatory words: Guardhouse and others v. Blackburn, 14 W. R. 463, L. R. 1 P. & D. 109; Atter v. Atkinson, L. R. 1 P. & D. 665, 17 W. R. Prob. Dig. 9; Fulton v. Andrew, 23 W. R. 566, L. R. 7 H. L. 448. Probate should be granted of the three papers without the revocatory words as constituting the last will and testament of the deceased. The court would be justified in holding that they were inserted by legal fraud, although Mr. Tuffley at the time had not the intention of deceiving the deceased. Legal fraud has not been accurately defined.

Bray, for the defendant.—Legal fraud is well understood; it cannot be alleged here. Where words appearing in a will have been read over to a testator the court must hold them to form part of the will: Morrell v. Morrell, 30 W. R. 491, L. R. 7 P. D. 68.

JEUNE, P.—I cannot help regretting, as I suppose anybody must regret, being compelled to come to a conclusion in which I am conscious that the result will be that the real intention of the testatrix is not carried out. Still, that is the conclusion I feel bound to come to upon the facts of the case. Upon the point raised it is quite clear. The will contains words which, I regret to say, in law, revoke the previous will. Those words were inserted, as I have no doubt, because the testatrix misunderstood their meaning; and I have no doubt how she came to misunderstand their meaning. It is clear on the evidence that the person who drew the will was ignorant—there is no fraud—as to the effect of putting in that clause, because he told her it would be inoperative, and he told her, further, if it was struck out it would affect or might vitiate the rest of the will; and, misinformed by this statement, she allowed the clause, which was in the printed form, to remain.

The question is, under these circumstances, can I strike it out consistently with the authorities? I am afraid I cannot. There are three cases which have been referred to. The first is the case of Guardhouse v. Blackburn, where, if you take Lord Penzance's words, they lay down a canon which no doubt completely covers this case, because Lord Penzance says that, subject to a question of fraud, the fact that a will has been duly read over to a capable testator on the occasion of its execution, or its contents brought to the testator's notice in any other way, should, when coupled with his execution thereof, be held conclusive evidence that he approved as well as knew the contents thereof.

Then there is the case of Atter v. Atkinson, to which I need not refer further because Lord Penzance's view of the law as expressed in the case of Guardhouse v. Blackburn is not there so fully laid down. The case of Guardhouse v. Blackburn is commented on in Fulton v. Andrew too, but I do not think any serious difference with it seems to be expressed. All that the Lord Chancellor seems to me to have pointed to is that, when that case was left to the jury, it was not clear that the jury did not believe then that there was some fraud with regard to the insertion of the particular clause, or that they were satisfied that it was read over so that it was fully before the mind of the testator. Therefore I do not think that on these cases I should strike out these words. Then Mr. Bray refers me to the case of Morrell v. Morrell, and I confess it seems to me that the words used in that case express the law, which is applicable to this case, and express what is some reason for it, because the view of Lord Hannen in that case clearly is this—that if a person employs another to convey his meaning in technical language, and that other person makes a mistake in doing it, the mistake is the same as if the person had employed the technical language himself. Now that view appears to me exactly to meet the present case. This lady thought it right to employ this gentleman to make her will for her. She thought it right to trust to him; no doubt he was mistaken, but, according to the view of Lord Hannen, his mistake was her mistake. I confess at the moment I felt some doubt as to whether it might not be possible to extend the doctrine of fraud so as to include this mistake. But I am satisfied there is no authority to make such an extension. There is, of course, a distinction between fraud and anything else, and even taking the view of Lord Hannen, which I have just referred to, it seems to me where there is the interposition of fraud between the principal and agent it may be, to follow out Lord Hannen's view, that the agency is thereby rendered invalid and that the person is not bound by the act of the agent. Under those circumstances, I feel bound to say with regret that I am unable to strike these words out of the will, and probate must go of the will of the 17th of October, 1889, with these words in. The will of 1875 and the codicil of 1885 will not be admitted to probate. I think as this is a case arising out of the testatrix's own fault the costs of all parties ought to be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, West, King, Adams, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Freshfields & Williams.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — Jan. 18; Feb. 3.

In re SMITH.

HANDS v. ANDREWS. (a.)

Attachment—Trustee—Non-compliance with order to pay money into court—Bankruptcy of trustee—Jurisdiction—Exercise of discretion—Appeal—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4 (3)—Debtors Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 54), s. 1—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 9.

The court has jurisdiction to order the attachment of a trustee who has made default in payment of a sum of money which he has been ordered to pay into court, notwithstanding that a receiving order in bankruptcy has been made against him.

Where a judge to whom an application for an attachment is made appears to the Court of Appeal to have exercised upon an erroneous ground the discretion conferred on the court by the Debtors Act, 1878, they will review his decision.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., directing the issue of writs of attachment under section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869.

An action was commenced by a creditor for the administration of the estate of one Smith deceased, the defendants being Andrews and Hooton, the two executors and trustees of the will of the deceased. It appeared that Smith had carried on business as a turf commission agent, Hooton being his manager, and it was the intention of the testator, as expressed by his will, that Hooton should continue to carry on the business for the benefit of his children. The executors realized the estate, and various payments were made by them by cheque, but Andrews never actually had in his hands any part of the estate, except the sum of £29 which was due to him. Among the cheques which Andrews joined Hooton in signing was one made payable to Hooton himself. The intention of Andrews in signing this cheque was to enable Hooton to carry on the business in accordance with the testator's wishes. The sum of money which Hooton thus obtained was misapplied by him.

On the 6th of August, 1892, an order was made in the action on both the defendants to pay certain sums of money into court. They disobeyed the order, and a motion was made for their attachment. In the meantime a receiving order in bankruptcy had been made against Andrews. Kekewich, J., thought that, notwithstanding section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, he had jurisdiction to entertain the application as against Andrews, and he exercised his discretion by ordering that writs of attachment should issue against both defendants.

The defendants appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Durandu, for the appellants.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Rowden, for the respondent.

The following cases were cited in the argument, besides those referred to in the judgment:—In re Wray, 36 W. R. 67, 36 Ch. D. 138; In re Simes, 38 W. R. 570; In re Edye, 39 W. R. 198; In re Grey, ante, p. 3, [1892] 2 Q. B. 440; Evans v. Bear, 23 W. R. 67, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 76.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 3.—LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an appeal by two executors and trustees against an order directing a writ of attachment to issue against them under the authority conferred by the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4 (3), as amended by the Debtors Act, 1878.

On the 6th of August, 1892, an order was made in an action for the administration of their testator's estate on both the appellants to pay into court £426 found due from them jointly; and an order was also made on the appellant Hooton to pay into court £90 found due from him separately. There was no summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and the liability of the defendants to pay these sums into court as ordered must be treated as indisputable.

On the 8th of September a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against Andrews. The moneys not being paid, notice of motion for an attachment against both appellants was served on the 19th of October. Before this motion came on to be heard—viz., on the 1st of November—Andrews was adjudicated bankrupt. On the 19th of November the order appealed from, for the issue of an attachment against both defendants, was made. No proceedings in bankruptcy have been taken against Hooton. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider their cases separately.

It will be convenient to take Hooton's case first, as it is the simpler of the two. He was an executor and trustee; he was ordered to pay money by a judge of the High Court exercising the jurisdiction formerly exercised by courts of equity. The money which he was ordered to pay was the balance of moneys come to his hands and not accounted for by him. He had not got the money in his possession or under his control when the order for the payment of it into court was made, for he had misapplied the money which had come to his hands. But this circumstance did not excuse him from his liability to pay, nor prevent an order for attachment being made under the Debtors Act, 1869. Courts of equity refuse to allow a man to derive any benefit from his own wrongful conduct, and treat a trustee as still having that which he once had and ought still to have although he may in fact have wrongfully parted with it. Acting on this principle it was decided by the Court of Appeal in Chancery as early as 1871 that an attachment might issue under section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869, against a trustee who made default in obeying an order to pay into court money which he had received as trustee, but had misapplied before the order for payment was made: Middleton v. Chichester, 19 W. R. 369, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 152; and this construction thus early put upon the Act has been followed ever since: see Crowther v. Elgood, 35 W. R. 369, 34 Ch. D. 691; Preston v. Etherington, 36 W. R. 49, 37 Ch. D. 104. It was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester by Lord Hatherley that all the debts specified in section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of which imprisonment was not abolished, were different from ordinary debts, and were "debts the incurring of which was in some degree worthy of being visited with punishment. In every case there is something in the character of delinquency pointed out." In 1869, if an order for payment was made under section 4 and was disobeyed, an attachment against the debtor was issued as a matter of course. But this was altered by the Debtors Act, 1878, under which a judge applied to for an order for an attachment is intrusted with a discretion to grant or refuse the order. If, therefore, an order for attachment is made in a case falling within section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, this court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge making the order unless it can be shown that he has not exercised his discretion in the particular case, or that he has manifestly proceeded on a wrong ground: see Crowther v. Elgood. Nothing of the kind is shown in Hooton's case, and his appeal, therefore, ought to be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The same principles are applicable to Andrews' case save so far as they are affected by his bankruptcy. But the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 contains a section (section 9) which is as follows:—"On the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose." This section is in substance the same as the corresponding section in the earlier Bankruptcy Act of 1869 (section 12). This last section was held by the Court of Appeal in Cobham v. Dalton, 23 W. R. 865, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 655, to prevent an arrest without the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy, even in cases falling within section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine this case, and to determine whether it can be regarded as an authority which still ought to be followed, regard being had to subsequent legislation, and to more recent decisions. The subsequent legislation, which is important, consists first of the Debtors Act, 1878, which has been already noticed, and, secondly, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which has replaced the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The operative words in section 9 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are the same as those in section 12 of the previous Act of 1869, and, although the two sections are not exactly the same, there is no difference in them material for the present purpose. Under both Acts money due from a trustee in respect of a breach of trust, whether fraudulent or not, is a debt provable against his estate in the event of his bankruptcy. But there is a very remarkable difference between the two Acts as regards the effect of an order of discharge; for whilst under section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, an order of discharge did not release a bankrupt from any breach of trust, under section 30 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, an order of disharge does release a bankrupt from all breaches of trust, except fraudulent breaches of trust, to which he was a party.

Now, in Cobham v. Dalton a defaulting trustee had been ordered to pay money into court; and on the same day that the order was made he was adjudicated bankrupt. An order for his attachment was afterwards made ex parte, and he was arrested. He then applied in Chancery to be discharged. This application was refused. He appealed, and his appeal was allowed. The Court of Appeal treated section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, as applicable to the case, and treated the money ordered to be paid into court as a provable debt, although it was not a debt due to the person who obtained the order to pay and the order for the attachment. The court further held that, the debt being a provable debt, the bankrupt was protected, until discharged, from arrest in respect of it; but that, as the Act then in force did not discharge him from the debt, he could be attached for it after his discharge. If the principle of this case is to be applied to the present case it will follow that Andrews ought not to be arrested pending his bankruptcy, nor after his discharge, unless his liability to pay the £426 arose from some fraudulent breach of trust to which he was a party, which is not the case. Although Cobham v. Dalton was decided in 1875 and Middleton v. Chichester was decided in 1871, and the Lords Justices who decided Cobham v. Dalton were members of the court which decided Middleton v. Chichester, the view then taken and expressed with reference to the punitive character of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, seems to have been overlooked by them. James, L.J., does not allude to it; Mellish, L.J., said, "Now, arrest for debt is intended as a means of enforcing payment, not as a punishment, for if the party pays the debt he is entitled to be discharged." This observation was true of ordinary debts, but not of obligations to pay under orders made under section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869—In re McWilliams, 1 Sch. & Lef. 169; Lees v. Newton, 14 W. R. 938, L. R. 1 C. P. 658. The punitive character of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. which was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester, has been since so often recognized that it cannot now be questioned—see Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338; In re Gent, 37 W. R. 151, 40 Ch. D. 190; although the court has under the Act of 1878 a discretion to grant or refuse an attachment in cases falling within it, and in one of the latest cases, Earl of Aylesford v. Earl Poulet, 40 W. R. 424, [1892] 2 Ch. 60, an attachment against a defaulting trustee was refused. In re Ryley, 33 W. R 656, 15 Q. B. D. 329; In re Manning, 34 W. R. 111, 30 Ch. D. 480; Preston v. Etherington, and Mitchell v. Simpson, 38 W. R. 565, 25 Q. B. D. 183, were referred to in the course of the argument, but they are not decisions upon the effect of section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on commitments under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. In these cases, however, the fact that a commitment under the section is not to be regarded simply as a form of civil process, but as punitive, is distinctly recognised. Having regard to the Debtors Act, 1878, and to the decisions to which I have referrred, it would be clearly wrong now to apply the observation of Mellish, L.J., in Cobham v. Dalton, above quoted to obligations to pay money in obedience to orders made under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4 (3). Kekewich, J., therefore had, in my opinion, jurisdiction under the Debtors Act, 1869, to order an attachment against Andrews, notwithstanding his bankruptcy.

But in this case the learned judge exercised the discretion reposed in him by the Debtors Act, 1878, upon a ground which, in my opinion, was erroneous. Andrews trusted his co-trustee Hooton, and handed money to him, and this money was misapplied. Andrews is liable for it; but he was not himself guilty of any dishonesty or fraudulent breach of trust. Kekewich, J., ordered an attachment to issue against him on the broad ground that every trustee who trusts his co-trustee and remits trust money to him and does not look sharply after him is dishonest and fraudulent. I cannot agree in this view, and, consistently with the principles on which this court acts in reviewing discretionary orders, I have come to the conclusion that Andrews' appeal ought to be allowed. In doing so I am not acting contrary to Ex parte Deere, 23 W. R. 866, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 658. In that case a solicitor who had become bankrupt was attached by a baron of the Court of Exchequer under the 4th section of the Debtors Act, 1869, and he applied to the Court of Bankruptcy to release him, but the court refused. The Court of Bankruptcy had, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which was then in force, a discretion in the matter, but it declined to interfere, and Mellish, L.J., said, "I think it is not right that this court should decide the question whether the attachment was issued for punishment or merely to enforce compliance with the order for payment of money. That question ought to be decided by the court which made the order." This decision and passage are not in point in the present case; for by "this court" was meant in Ex parte Deere the Court of Appeal sitting in Bankruptcy. That court was not entertaining, and had no jurisdiction to entertain, an appeal from the order for arrest. The present appeal is an appeal from the order for the attachment, and we have to rehear that order; and Ex parte Deere, therefore, is not really in point. The result, therefore, of the appeal is that it succeeds in Andrews' case, but not in Hooton's.

The order appealed from must therefore be discharged so far as it affects Andrews, but this is not a case for giving him any costs. As regards Hooton the order will stand, but nothing will be gained by making him pay the costs of the appeal, nor has he materially put his opponents to expense by joining Andrews in his appeal.

Lord ESHER, M.R., and LOPES, L.J., concurred.

Order varied.

Solicitors for the appellants, Wynne, Holme, & Wynne, for W. F. Gorst, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Nicholson & Pemberton, Liverpool.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Dec. 5.

RODGER v. HARRISON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Registry Acts—"Assurance"—Contract for sale of land—Registration—Priority—Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 54), ss. 3, 4, 14.

The owner of land in Yorkshire made an agreement in writing with the plaintiff, by which the former agreed, in consideration of £200 paid to him by the plaintiff, to complete certain buildings on the land, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase the buildings when completed for £750, less the £200 already paid. This agreement was registered under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884.

Held, that this agreement was not an "assurance" within the meaning of the Act so as to be entitled to be registered, and that, therefore, it had not priority over a prior mortgage to the defendants, registered subsequently.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a special case stated under ord. 34, rr. 1, 2, in an action claiming a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to have the premises comprised in a contract dated the 7th of June, 1889, transferred to him, and the title deeds thereof delivered to him.

It appeared that Naylor, the owner of certain land near Leeds, mortgaged it to a building society to secure an advance, and subsequently, on the 11th of April, 1889, mortgaged the same land to the defendants to secure an advance of £240. By an agreement in writing dated the 7th of June, 1889, made between Naylor and the plaintiff, who had no notice of the defendant's mortgage, in consideration of £200 then paid by the plaintiff to Naylor, Naylor agreed to complete certain buildings upon the land, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase the buildings when completed for £750, less the £200 already paid The buildings were duly completed, but no conveyance of the property to the plaintiff was executed, and the plaintiff did not pay the balance of the purchase-money. Upon the 30th of August, 1889, the plaintiff registered this agreement under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884, and on the next day the defendants registered their mortgage. The mortgaged property was afterwards sold, and the balance of the purchase-money, after satisfying the building society's mortgage, amounted to £247.

The plaintiff claimed this sum on the ground that the prior registration of the agreement of the 7th of June gave him priority over the defendants' mortgage of the 11th of April. The defendants contended that the agreement of the 7th of June was not capable of registration under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884, and that, therefore, the registration of it was of no effect. The Divisional Court (Mathew and Bruce, JJ.) held that the agreement of the 7th of June was a "memorandum of charge," and that it was therefore entitled to be registered, and had priority over the defendants' prior mortgage, which was registered subsequently. The defendants appealed.

Section 3 of Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 54): "The expression 'assurance' shall include (inter alia) any conveyance or memorandum of charge"; "the expression 'conveyance' includes any assignment, appointment, lease, or settlement made by deed on a sale, mortgage, demise, or settlement of any land"; "the expression 'memorandum of charge' shall include any memorandum of a lien or charge on any land which may be registered under the provisions of this Act."

Section 4: "All assurances . . . by which any lands within any of the three ridings are affected may be registered under this Act."

Section 14: "All assurances entitled to be registered under this Act shall have priority according to the date of registration thereof, and not according to the date of such assurances or of the execution thereof."

P. B. Abraham, for the defendants.

Lyon, for the plaintiff.

The following authorities were referred to:—In re Wight's Mortgage Trust, 21 W. R. 667, L. R. 16 Eq. 41; Credland v. Potter, 23 W. R. 36, L. R. 10 Ch.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

App. 8; Wythes v. Lee, 4 W. R. 184, 3 Drew. 396; Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. Cas. 672; Torrance v. Bolton, 20 W. R. 718, 21 W. R. 134, L. R. 14 Eq. 124, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 118; Lysaght v. Edwards, 24 W. R. 778, at p. 779, 2 Ch. D. 499, at p. 506; Kettlewell v. Watson, 32 W. R. 865, 26 Ch. D. 501.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is whether the agreement of the 7th of June is entitled to be registered under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884. It is an agreement in writing, but not under seal. It is an agreement for the purchase and sale of certain land and buildings subject to a condition to be performed by the vendor—namely, the completion of the buildings. It is also subject to the usual condition that the vendor must make out a good title. It is, therefore, subject to two conditions being fulfilled before the purchaser can be called upon to accept a conveyance. Is that agreement an "assurance" within the meaning of the Act? If it is an assurance by which any lands within any of the three ridings are affected, section 4 says that it may be registered under the Act. By section 3 the expression "assurance" shall include (inter alia) any conveyance or memorandum of charge. Therefore, the expression has its ordinary meaning and an extended meaning. No one could possibly say that a conditional contract to buy land is an "assurance" in the ordinary sense as understood by conveyancers. Is it within the extended definition of assurance given in the Act? Is it a conveyance or memorandum of charge? Now, by section 3 the expression "conveyance" includes any assignment, appointment, lease, or settlement made by deed on a sale, mortgage, demise, or settlement of any land. Therefore "conveyance" is to have its ordinary meaning as understood by conveyancers, and an enlarged meaning including certain other documents, all of which must be in the form of a deed. This contract is clearly not within the ordinary meaning of the word conveyance, nor within its enlarged meaning. When can it be said that this contract became a "conveyance"? At the time it was signed? If not then, at what subsequent time? It was said that Lord Cairns in Credland v. Potter had interpreted the word "conveyance" as including an equitable charge. Lord Cairns was there construing a different Act, (West Riding Registry Act, 2 & 3 Anne, c. 4), and that is no authority for the construction of the word in this Act. If he had been considering the true meaning of the word in equity or at law, the decision might have been of general importance. But he was doing nothing of the kind; he was only interpreting the word as used in a particular statute.

Next, is this contract a memorandum of charge? By section 3 the expression "memorandum of charge" shall include any memorandum of a lien or charge on any land which may be registered under the provisions of this Act. There was no lien or charge upon land when this contract was signed, and this contract is not a memorandum of any charge. A lien might arise subsequently, if the contract fell through owing to the default of the vendor, but there must then be a memorandum of that lien or charge. Further, the last words in the definition—"which may be registered under the provisions of this Act"—pointed to section 7, which dealt with a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money or a charge by deposit of title deeds. This contract, therefore, for the sale and purchase of land was outside the Act.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a conditional agreement for the sale and purchase of land. The question is whether it is capable of registration under the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884. Section 4 says that all assurances by which any lands are affected may be registered under the Act. Section 3 says that an assurance shall include a conveyance or memorandum of charge. First, is it a conveyance? By section 3 "conveyance" is to include any assignment, appointment, lease, or settlement made by deed, &c. Therefore "conveyance," in addition to its ordinary meaning, is to include those other matters there specified, all of which must be by deed. Conveyance ordinarily means an instrument which passes a freehold interest in land. The present document was not a conveyance in its ordinary or enlarged meaning. In Credland v. Potter Lord Cairns said that "conveyance" in that Act included an equitable charge on land. But the words "made by deed" were not contained in the Act there under consideration.

Secondly, is it a memorandum of charge? Section 3 says that a memorandum of charge shall include any memorandum of a lien or charge on any land which may be registered under the provisions of this Act. To see what that means we must refer to section 7, to which it clearly applies, which says that where any lien or charge on any lands within any of the three ridings is claimed in respect of any unpaid purchase-money or by reason of any deposit of title deeds, a memorandum of such lien or charge may be registered. That refers to a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money or a charge by deposit of title deeds. The charge alleged to exist in the present case is for money paid by a purchaser. Therefore this agreement does not come within section 7, and cannot be registered under this Act.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. By section 4 assurances by which any lands within any of the three ridings are affected may be registered under the Act. It would never strike the mind of a conveyancer that a contract for the sale of land could be treated as an assurance of that land. It is said, however, that this instrument comes within the definition of an assurance given in the Act. It is said that it is either a conveyance or a memorandum of charge. First of all, is it a "conveyance" within the language of conveyancers? I never heard of the word being applied to such an instrument. I never heard of a memorandum evidencing a contract of sale being called a conveyance. Section 3 of the Act, however, contains a definition of "conveyance" as including any assignment, appointment, lease, or settlement made by deed on a sale, mortgage, demise, or settlement of any land. All the things said to be included in the word "conveyance" must be "made by deed." Conveyance is to have its ordinary meaning among conveyancers—that is, a deed by which a freehold interest in land is transferred—and is also to include certain other specified things, but it does not say that it is to include a contract for those things. That interpretation is assisted by the fact that no case can be found since the statute of Anne in which it has been suggested that "conveyance" included a contract for the sale of land. In Credland v. Potter there was a mortgage by deed, and subsequently a further memorandum of charge was given. The latter was not an assurance of the legal estate; an additional charge was all that was intended to be created; and Lord Cairns, dealing with a totally different Act, held that the word "conveyance," as used in that Act, might include that memorandum of charge. The words there were "deed or conveyance," showing that a conveyance might be something other than a deed. Neither that case nor any other case went so far as to say that a contract for the sale of land was a "conveyance" within the meaning of the Act of Anne. Therefore the word "conveyance" in this Act was not intended to include a memorandum in writing of a contract for the sale and purchase of land.

Secondly, is it a "memorandum of charge"? The purchaser has to show that he has a charge on the property. The purchaser obtains a lien for his deposit only in the event of the contract going off through the default of the vendor, and from that moment. That is not a lien from the date of the contract. It cannot be assumed at that time that the vendor will not carry out the contract. How can it be supposed that the Registry Act intended the purchaser to register the contract as a memorandum of a charge which might never arise? Section 3 says that a "memorandum of charge" shall include any memorandum of a lien or charge on any land which may be registered under the provisions of this Act. Those latter words are restrictive, and point to section 7, which contains a distinct provision that an unpaid vendor's lien may be registered, and there is no provision that a purchaser's lien may be registered.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Few & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Paterson, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Chitty, J. } Jan. 17-19.

In re HARVEY.
HARVEY v. GILLOW. (a.)

Will—Lapse—Children as a class—Issue taking by substitution—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 33.

The 33rd section of the Wills Act, preventing lapse in case of gifts to a child or other issue of the testator, does not apply where the devise or bequest is to children as a class.

The principle is, that the section leaves the construction of class gifts unaltered, and that the gifts are still to be read as gifts to those only who survive, and not as gifts to the possible members of the class who die in the lifetime of the testator; and that the gift in regard to those children who so die is not to be treated as a gift to individuals.

Where G., a possible member of such a class of children, died in the testator's lifetime, leaving issue that survived the testator, and there was never, in fact, any other possible member,

Held, in conformity with the above principle, that the 33rd section did not apply.

Olney v. Bates, 3 W. R. 606, 3 Dr. 319, and Browne v. Hammond, Johns. 210, 7 W. R. Dig. 101, considered and followed.

Summons.

Admiral Sir Edward Harvey, who died in May, 1865, by his will, dated in November, 1857, bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees, upon trust as to one fourth part thereof to pay the income to his daughter, Eliza Ann, wife of R. J. Emmerson, for life, and after her decease, as to the capital of such one-fourth share, upon trust for the child, if only one, or the children, if more than one, lawfully begotten and to be begotten of his said daughter, who should, if a son or sons attain the age of twenty-one years, or if a daughter or daughters attain that age or be married, if more than one in equal shares; and if there should be no such child of his said daughter, then upon trust to pay the income of the said fourth part to the said R. J. Emmerson for life, in case he should so long remain unmarried, and after his decease or marriage the testator gave this fourth share upon certain trusts for the benefit of the testator's children other than Mrs. Emmerson, and otherwise.

Mrs. Emmerson had one child only, a daughter. This daughter, who attained twenty-one, and was married in 1863 to the defendant A. Gillow, died in the testator's lifetime (viz., in August, 1864), but left a child who survived the testator.

Mrs. Emmerson died in February, 1892.

This summons was thereupon taken out to determine to whom, and for what estate or interest, the one-fourth share belonged.

Church, for the trustees.

Farwell, Q.C., and Dauney, for the legal representatives of Mrs. Gillow.—The circumstances of this case distinguish it from Olney v. Bates, 3 W. R. 606, 3 Dr. 319, and Browne v. Hammond, Johns. 210, 7 W. R. Dig. 101, where it was held that section 33 of the Wills Act, preventing lapse in case of gifts to a child or other issue of the testator, does not apply when the gift is to the testator's children as a class. No doubt, where any members of the class survive the testator, those survivors must take as the children interested on the construction of the will. Section 33 says that the legacy shall not lapse or slip away from the beneficiary, and there is no lapse in such a case. But the section does apply to prevent lapse where a lapse would but for the section occur, as here, whether the gift be to my child A., or such of my children as attain twenty-one. Whether lapse, if it were permitted, would benefit legatees over or next of kin is immaterial. Moreover, the gift is in terms to "child or children" here; this child is therefore in the position of a persona designata, and for that reason also within section 33.

Byrne, Q.C., G. M. Prior, and Robertson Macdonald, for those claiming under the gifts over in the will.—The principle of Olney v. Bates and Browne v. Hammond applies here. There is nothing given by the will to any child, and the case provided for by the 33rd section, therefore, does not arise.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

Jan. 19.—CHITTY, J., delivered a written judgment, as follows:—

Olney v. Bates was decided by Kindersley, V.C., in 1855. The decision turned upon a consideration of the established law relating to a gift to a class in connection with the law of lapse. It may have been thought by some that the decision was founded upon too strict an application of these doctrines to the 33rd section of the Wills Act; and undoubtedly, as observed by Jarman, as gifts to the testator's children as a class are of frequent occurrence, their exclusion from this provision of the statute greatly narrows its practical operation (see 1 Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., p. 353). But the same point came in 1858 before Wood, V.C., in Browne v. Hammond, and he followed and adopted the decision in Olney v. Bates. These two authorities have put a construction on the 33rd section which has been since constantly acted upon by the courts, and has never, so far as I am aware, been judicially called in question. The decisions appear to have been accepted by text writers, subject only to the observation already cited, which, however, does not attempt to impeach their authority, but merely states their practical effect (see 1 Jarm., ubi sup., and Theobald on Wills, 3rd ed., p. 558). It seems too late after this lapse of time for any court to reopen the question thus apparently settled, and upon which many titles doubtless depend (see the observations of Lord Selborne in Holyland v. Lewin, 32 W. R. 443, 26 Ch. D. 266, at p. 271). I certainly cannot, and I ought not to attempt to impair the decisions or to fritter away the principles upon which they are founded.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The difference between a gift to named individuals and a gift to a class in reference to lapse is firmly established. A gift by will to a class is taken, in law and in equity, to be a gift, when it is immediate, to those only who survive the testator; and when it is not immediate, but postponed, to be a gift to those only who survive the testator or come into being before the period of distribution. Take gifts to children: when the gift is to a child named, and he dies in the testator's lifetime, it fails to take effect, apart from the 33rd section. The reason of its thus lapsing is found in the ambulatory nature of a will which does not come into operation until the testator's death; a dead person cannot take under a will, just as a dead person cannot take under a deed which has an immediate operation. But where the gift is to children as a class to take as tenants in common, a child dying in the testator's lifetime was excluded by the law as it stood before the passing of the Wills Act; and, according to the decisions already cited, the 33rd section does not apply, although the child leaves issue that survives the testator. The principle acted upon was that the section leaves the construction of these class gifts unaltered, and that the gifts are still to be read as gifts to those only who survive, and not as gifts to the possible members of the class who die in the testator's lifetime; and that the gift in regard to those children who so die is not to be treated as a gift to individuals. The difference between gifts to individuals and to a class is, if I may use the expression, engrained in the law. It is well illustrated by Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363, and the numerous subsequent decisions on the same point, including Pearks v. Moseley in the House of Lords, 29 W. R. 1, 5 App. Cas. 714. The distinction formed the ground of the decision in Olney v. Bates and Browne v. Hammond. Kindersley, V.C., in Olney v. Bates, laid it down that the effect of the devise which he had under consideration was to give to children living at the death, and "therefore," as he says, "there was no gift to Mrs. Foster, and the statute only applies to the representatives of children or issue to whom something is given." Wood, V.C., in Browne v. Hammond, concurs in this opinion, and says expressly that a gift to children as a class is not within the 33rd section, and he goes on to explain that a knowledge of the law as to the operation of a gift to a class must be imputed to a testator.

But it was contended in the case before me that the section does apply, because there was, in the events which happened, no child of the testator's daughter, Mrs. Emmerson, who took under the gift to her children. Consequently, as it was urged, there was a lapse, and the authorities therefore do not apply.

Mrs. Emmerson had, in fact, one child only, a daughter, who died in the testator's lifetime, leaving issue who survived the testator.

But this contention is, when examined, only asking me in another form to hold that the gift to the testator's daughter's children as a class is in effect a gift to individuals. Mr. Dauney felt this: he raised an argument upon the construction of the will which, although it was untenable and presently abandoned, is worth noticing. He fastened on the words "for the child, if only one," at the beginning of the gift to the daughter's children, and said that the daughter's child living at the date of the will was a persona designata by virtue of these words. The answer is simple. These words of amplification do not make the gift the less a gift to a class. A gift to all the testator's grandchildren as tenants in common would, without such words, carry the whole property to an only child; and if the daughter had had an after-born child, who being a son had attained twenty-one, or being a daughter had married, that child would unquestionably have taken Mrs. Emmerson's share, and would just as much or as little have been an only child within the words relied on. The descriptive words are not a designation of any particular child. In truth, I am asked to depart from the principle of the two decisions cited by holding that the gift to the grandchildren has lapsed by reason of the death of a possible member of the class in the testator's lifetime. It is not correct to say that it has lapsed for that reason; it has failed to take effect by reason of there being no grandchild to take; by reason of Mrs. Emmerson (who survived the testator) not having had any children or child answering the description. It was impossible to say that the gift had failed until Mrs. Emmerson, who might have had other children, had herself died.

Moreover, if I acceded to the contention of Mrs. Gillow's representatives extraordinary anomalies would result. If a testator had several, say five, children living at the date of his will, and four of them died in his lifetime leaving issue who survived him, the effect of the decisions is that the fifth child surviving would take the whole; but if that child also happened to die in the testator's lifetime leaving issue who survived him, the representatives, not only of the fifth child, but also of all the other four children, would, according to the argument, be let in and in equal shares. And, further, if there had been a sixth child who had died before the date of the will leaving issue who survived, the representatives of that sixth child, who by no possible construction of the will could himself have taken, would be inevitably let in to share with the representatives of his brothers and sisters all dying as above supposed For these reasons I am unable to hold that the representatives of the deceased granddaughter can take anything under this will.

Solicitors for the personal representatives of Mrs. Gillow, Speechly, Mumford, Landon, & Rogers.

Solicitors for the trustees and other parties interested, Prior, Church, & Adams, for R. T. Emmerson, Sandwich.

Chan. Div.
Stirling, J. } Dec. 16.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MOORE. (a.)

Coroner—Treasure trove—Title of Crown—Prerogative—Grant to subject—Coroner's inquisition—Jurisdiction—Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71), ss. 4 (2), 18 (1), 36.

The Crown is primâ face entitled to treasure trove, and it is not necessary that an inquest should be held for the purpose of informing the Crown as to its rights (following the Irish case of Reg. v. Toole, 16 W. R. 439); but its title may be displaced by a grant to a subject of the franchise of treasure trove.

Articles of silver were found concealed in the earth. The coroner for the district held an inquest on them before a jury, who unanimously agreed that the articles were treasure trove. The coroner then desired to hold a further inquisition to decide who was entitled to the treasure.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the coroner has no jurisdiction, either under the Coroners Act, 1887, or otherwise, to determine the question of title.

Motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the Crown asking for an order directing the coroner of Hereford to deposit certain articles of plate, alleged to be treasure trove, in court, or for an injunction restraining him from parting with the possession of the articles to any persons other than the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury pending the trial of the action.

On the 16th of December, 1891, two men were ferreting rabbits on a farm at Stoke Prior, in the county of Hereford. One of them, on putting his hand into a rabbit-hole, discovered a piece of silver plate. Further search was made, and ultimately three cups, a chalice, two pyxes, and a paten, all of silver, were unearthed. On the discovery being made known, the coroner for the district took possession of the plate, and proceeded to hold an inquest on the treasure before a jury empanelled for the purpose. The jury unanimously agreed that the plate was treasure trove, and thereupon a claim was made by the lord of the manor to the plate, on the ground that he was entitled under a deed of grant of "royalties," dated in 1620, and executed by King James I., to the Marquis of Buckingham, a predecessor in title to the present lord of the manor. The jury failed to agree as to the ownership of the plate, and the coroner bound them over to appear at the next assizes for the county. On that occasion one of the jury was absent through illness, and Day, J., discharged them. An application was then made to his lordship, on behalf of the Crown, that the coroner be directed to record the verdict of "treasure trove" upon the inquisition. Day, J., being of opinion that the inquiry was not then complete, and that the coroner was bound to inquire into the question of title, refused this. He said the office of coroner was a very ancient and responsible one, and, being an officer of the Crown, he had to inquire into the dues of the Crown, and as to the falling in of the rights of the Crown. The Crown was entitled, primâ facie, to treasure trove, though not absolutely, and had in many instances granted those rights to the subject. The coroner was justified in this case in the course he had adopted, because if, without considering claims made, the coroner had to hand treasure over to the Crown, the subject would only have the very precarious remedy of presenting a petition of right.

The coroner thereupon arranged to hold a fresh inquiry, when the present action was commenced by the Crown, and the motion as above stated was made.

Sir John Rigby, S.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the motion, contended that no further inquiry by the coroner was necessary; the jury having found a verdict of treasure trove, the coroner had merely to record the verdict, and then his duties were at an end, and he had no jurisdiction, by statute or otherwise, to try the question of title. They asked for the protection of the plate until the question of title had been determined by this court.

Corner, for the coroner, argued that there had been no verdict, nothing reduced into writing, and therefore another inquest must be held. For this purpose it was necessary that the coroner should hold the plate, in order that the jury might view it. [He referred to sections 4 (2), 18 (1), and 36 of the Coroners Act, 1887.] On the suggestion of his lordship he was willing to give an undertaking not to part with the possession of the articles mentioned in the notice of motion until further order.

A. J. David, for the lord of the manor.

STIRLING, J.—Having regard to the turn the matter has taken, it is not necessary for me to make a formal order, but I will say a few words in order to explain the ground upon which I proceed. This action is brought by Her Majesty's Attorney-General against the coroner of the district of Hereford, and it asks that "the defendant may be ordered forthwith to deposit in court the three silver cups, silver chalice, silver paten, and silver pyxes in the indorsement upon the writ of summons in this action mentioned, and claimed to be treasure trove belonging to Her Majesty, or otherwise that he may be restrained by injunction until the trial of this action or further order from delivering, parting with, or in any manner disposing of any of the articles aforesaid to any person or persons other than the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury." The circumstances are somewhat peculiar. It appears that the articles mentioned in the notice of motion were found concealed in the earth, that the finders took them to the coroner, and that the coroner now has them in his possession. An inquest has been held, and the proceeedings have proved to be abortive in this way. There appears to have been no question that the articles are treasure trove. The jury, as I understand, were willing so to find, but the coroner desired that the inquiry should be prosecuted further, and that the title to those articles should be found by the jury. The jury were unable to agree. The matter, in pursuance of the Coroners Act, was adjourned to the assizes. It came before Day, J., who discharged the jury. Therefore there has been no finding as yet in the matter, and it is proposed by the coroner to hold a further inquest. With that I am not asked to interfere, and I conceive it to be no part of my duty to interfere. But as certain observations have been made by the learned judge at the trial which have been read to me, and which would seem to point to a conclusion which does not quite occur to me to be the one in accordance with the authorities that have been cited, I desire simply to refer to one or two authorities.

First of all I will refer to Chitty on the Prerogatives of the Crown, where, at p. 152, "treasure trove" is thus defined: "Treasure trove is where any gold or silver in coin, plate, or bullion is found concealed in a house, or in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown, in which case the treasure belongs to the king, or his grantee having the franchise of treasure trove; but if he that laid it be known or afterwards discovered, the owner, and not the king, is entitled to it; this prerogative right only applying in the absence of an owner to claim the property." Now there is no question at all at the present moment that a primâ facie case of treasure trove has been made out. Primâ facie, the title to treasure trove is in the Crown, but no doubt that title will be displaced by producing a grant to a subject of the franchise of treasure trove. But the question between the Crown and the subject must be decided by an interpretation of the grant, and I cannot conceive that it is possible that that title can be decided either by the coroner or by the verdict of the coroner's jury. It does not seem to me that it is a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the coroner in cases of this kind to determine that title under section 36 of the Act of 1887. That Act says that "a coroner shall continue as heretofore to have jurisdiction to inquire of treasure that is found, who were the finders, and who is suspected thereof." Now it is limited to an inquiry who were the finders, and who is suspected thereof. I do not see, as at present advised, that there is any jurisdiction at all in the coroner to determine the title. No doubt he may have incidentally to refer to the title, as was the case where the verdict of the jury is set out on p. 536 of Umfreville on the Law and Practice of the Office of Coroners; but I think it is absolutely impossible that according to law that title can be determined by the coroner. That being so, it is further clear to my mind, according to the authorities, that the title of the Crown is independent of the finding of the jury. Chitty on Prerogative, p. 259, says: "As to personalty, the general rule seems to be that the king is entitled, without office or other matter of record, as in the case of goods and choses in action of felons, wreck of the sea, treasure trove, or the profits of lands of clerks, &c., convicted of felony, or of persons outlawed in a personal action," and the learned author goes on to cite the following passage from Blackstone: "with regard to other matters, the inquests of office still remains in force, and are taken upon proper occasions; being extended not only to lands, but also to goods, and especially as to forfeiture for offences." So that although it may be proper that an inquest should be held for the purpose of informing the Crown as to its rights, it is not essential according to the law as there laid down to the title of the Crown to chattels.

Then that view appears to me to be borne out by a case in Ireland to which I have been referred—Reg. v. Toole, 16 W. R. 439, in which the conclusion was arrived at after an investigation which evidently was most carefully considered of all the old cases, that in an indictment for concealing treasure trove it is not necessary to state any inquisition before the coroner or office found as to the title of the Queen. That being so, the Crown is clearly entitled to come here and to have its title determined, and, as it would seem to me, most conveniently determined, in an action of this sort in which questions arise as to the construction of ancient Crown grants and other matters which cannot be properly gone into at the coroner's inquest. I think, therefore, the Crown is fully entitled to come here, and that it is entitled to have the articles the title to which is in question secured until the dispute which has arisen is settled. For that purpose it seems to me that the lord of the manor ought to be made a party, and the learned Solicitor-General is willing that he should be let in and that the writ should be treated as amended at once, so that he would be made a defendant immediately. He appears on this occasion by counsel. The learned counsel for the coroner has asked me that he may not be deprived of the articles with a view to the inquisition which he proposes to hold. I think that is reasonable; but he is willing to give an undertaking not to part with them until the further order of the court. I am willing to accept that undertaking. That is all that is necessary to dispose of this motion on the present occasion.

The motion, therefore, will stand over generally, but when the coroner has performed his duty and held the inquest, I suggest that the most convenient course would be that he should make an application to the court, when it will be able to decide the question of the costs; the costs of this motion ought to abide the result of the trial.

There will be no undertaking in damages.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the coroner, J. T. & G. F. Marshall.

Solicitor for the lord of the manor, H. Andrews, for W. T. Sale, Leominster.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Jan. 23; Feb. 7.

In re THE VARIETIES (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Shareholder's petition for compulsory winding up—Subsequent resolution for voluntary winding up—Preponderating influence of one shareholder.

Where, after the presentation of a shareholders' petition for the winding up of a company by the court, a special resolution is passed for voluntary winding up, the court will inquire into the composition of the majority voting for the voluntary winding up, and if it is found that there are matters requiring investigation, and that the resolution was passed by the preponderating influence of one shareholder, a compulsory order will be made.

In re West Surrey Tanning Co., 14 W. R. 1009, L. R. 2 Eq. 737, followed.

Petition.

This was a petition by shareholders holding respectively seventy-five and fifty shares to wind up the above-named company, which was incorporated in August, 1892, with a nominal capital of £100,000 divided into 50,000 shares of £2 each. The objects of the company were to adopt an agreement of the 25th of August, 1892, between William Foster Shaw and a trustee of the company, and to undertake and carry on the business of opera house, theatrical or music hall or cafe chantant, proprietors.

The agreement of the 25th of August, 1892, provided for the granting of a lease by Shaw to the company of a piece of land in St. Martin's-street, Leicester-square, in the county of London, at a rent of £1,200 per annum, and that a theatre should be built on the ground by Shaw, who was promoter of the company, for £89,000, payable, as to one-third, in fully paid-up shares of the company when formed, at the option of the directors. The price was payable, as to £20,000, fourteen days after allotment of shares, and as to the residue upon the certificates of the architect of the company. The agreement was adopted by the company on the 19th of September, 1892. The theatre was to be completed in twelve months. By another agreement, made the 28th of October, 1892, between the company and Shaw, the first agreement was modified by a provision that £47,000 should be payable in fully paid-up shares, less any sum of cash received by the company in respect of shares prior to the 1st of May, 1893, excepting £500 to be retained for the use of the company. These shares were to be issued to the vendors by instalments as the works proceeded.

The original directors thought the number of applications for shares was insufficient to justify them in going to allotment, and two of them retired, but the remaining directors after having arranged the modification of the contract went to allotment. It appeared that the amount of cash at the company's bankers was insufficient to enable the company to carry out its contract. The London County Council refused to give the necessary sanction to the plan of the buildings proposed to be erected.

The petition alleged that it had become impossible to carry out the agreement, and that it was just and equitable that the company should be wound up by the court. Since the presentation of the petition the company had duly passed a special resolution for voluntary liquidation, with the secretary as liquidator. It was objected by the petitioners that the voting at the meetings at which the resolution for voluntary winding up was passed was deceptive, inasmuch as the majority of votes were in respect of shares held by Shaw and not were independent. The figures are stated in his lordship's judgment.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Farwell, Q.C., and Job Bradford, for the petition.

Brice, Q.C., and Abraham, for the company, referred to the following cases:—In re Middlesborough Assembly Rooms Co., 28 W. R. 868, 14 Ch. D. 104, In re Gold Co., 27 W. R. 757, 11 Ch. D. 701; In re Langham Skating Rink Co., 5 Ch. D. 669, 25 W. R. Dig. 65; In re Krasnapolsky Restaurant and Winter Garden Co., 40 W. R. 639, [1892] 3 Ch. 174.

Higgins, for shareholders in opposition.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—The court will order a compulsory winding up, notwithstanding a voluntary winding up, if the voluntary winding up is a sham: see the judgment of James, L.J., in In re Gold Co.; In re West Surrey Tanning Co., 14 W. R. 1009, L. R. 2 Eq. 737.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It does not appear by the contract of the 25th of August, 1892, that at this time there was any plan in existence or any architect of the company, although I suppose that Mr. Shaw had in effect prepared plans himself. It is to be observed that the first issue of shares to the vendors was to be immediately after the balcony girders should have been placed in a manner and according to plans approved by the London County Council. The prospectus says that "the plans have been prepared by Mr. Greatbach," and "the buildings will be erected in strict accordance with the known requirements and regulations of the London County Council." The affidavits do not make it clear how many shares other than vendors' shares were in fact applied for and issued, but the total amount paid into the company's bankers in respect of applications seems to have been £2,875, and the whole available cash of the company seems to have been insufficient to enable the company to carry out the contract. The company seem to have paid Mr. Shaw £1,000 on October 21 and £350 in the course of November and December. The sum paid to Mr. Shaw seems to have been largely expended in the payment of the legal costs and office expenses. The London County Council refused to sanction the plans presented to them. The petition alleges in substance that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up, because the substratum of the company is gone, it being plain that, in view of want of funds and the refusal of the London County Council to sanction the plans, the scheme cannot be carried through, especially as the refusal of the county council was, as I gather from the statement of the chairman of the company, based on the insufficiency of the ground space afforded by the land the subject of the lease.

It seems clear that there must be a liquidation, and the only question which I have to decide is as to the mode of liquidation—shall it be voluntary or compulsory? It is said on behalf of the company that the shareholders of the company have expressed a clear wish in favour of voluntary liquidation, and that the petition is a wrecking petition by two shareholders who hold only 75 and 50 shares each, and that a compulsory order will largely increase the costs of liquidation. It is said on behalf of the petitioners—first, that the voting at the meeting of shareholders is deceptive, for that of the 3,633 votes in favour of voluntary liquidation, 2,570 votes were in respect of shares held by Mr. Shaw, and I understand it to be admitted that only 210 votes can be regarded as independent. If this is so, and the votes in respect of shares held by the vendor and his nominees are excluded, it would seem that, out of the residue of 355 votes, 210 were recorded in favour of voluntary liquidation and 145 against it, whereas, in order to obtain the majority requisite, three-quarters, or 264 votes, should have been recorded in favour of voluntary liquidation. It is further said that the holders of no less than 847 shares have signed circulars in favour of compulsory liquidation, and the originals of those circulars have been produced before me, although the shareholders themselves have not thought fit to appear and support the petition. It is said, however, that on these facts it is clear that if you exclude the preponderating vote in respect of the fully paid-up shares held by the vendor and his nominees, the majority of the independent shareholders wish for compulsory liquidation. It is said, further, that there are matters here which require to be investigated. Why did the directors proceed to allotment? Why did they pay £1,300 to Mr. Shaw before the plans had been approved by the London County Council? I am not sure that the first of these matters can be investigated at the instance of shareholders who complain of their creation; but I think there is enough here to make it my duty to make an order for compulsory winding up.

Solicitors, Vallance & Co.; Bridger & Son; Beall & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) Jan. 24.

HARE v. ELMS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Relief against forfeiture after judgment in ejectment action—Application by mortgagee by sub-demise—Parties—Original lessee—23 & 24 Vict. c. 126 (Common Law Procedure Act, 1860), s. 1.

In an application under section 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, made (after judgment in an action of ejectment for non-payment of rent) by a mortgagee of land by sub-demise, for relief against forfeiture of the lease, the original lessee must be made a party to the proceedings.

Semble (per Collins, J.), that such an application may be made by an underlessee.

Berney v. Moore, 2 Ridgeway, 310, explained.

Doe d. Whitfield v. Roe, 3 Taunt. 402, distinguished.

Appeal from chambers.

The applicants, the No. 3 Borough of Lambeth Permanent Building Society, asked under the following circumstances for relief in an action of ejectment brought under a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent in a lease for ninety-nine years of land and houses at Dulwich dated the 7th of July, 1880, in which Newman was the lessor and Siler the lessee.

In 1891 the property had become vested in Roberts, but whether as assignee or as underlessee was, it was stated, uncertain.

In that year Roberts gave an underlease of the property for the residue of the term, less three days, to Mears, and Mears subdemised the property by way of mortgage to the applicants.

The plaintiffs were the assignees of the reversion subject to the lease, and on the 31st of May, 1892, the rent being in arrear, they issued their writ in this action, claiming to recover possession of the demised premises under the proviso for re-entry in the lease.

The defendants were the tenants in possession:

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

neither the original lessee nor the applicants, nor any of the intermediate owners were made parties.

The defendants allowed judgment to go by default, and on the 30th of June, 1892, the plaintiffs took possession under their judgment.

On the 8th of September the applicants became for the first time aware of these proceedings, and on the 5th of December, after some correspondence had passed between them and the plaintiffs, they took out a summons asking for relief.

The master held that he had no power to grant relief, because the applicants were only underlessees and the lessees were not before the court.

The applicants appealed, and Barnes, J., in chambers, referred the case to the court.

Willes Chitty (Frank Newbolt with him), for the applicants.—The decision of the master was wrong; this relief can be granted upon the application of underlessees without the presence of the original lessees. The old courts of Chancery granted such relief if it appeared just to do so, even though the lessee was present and declined to be relieved: Webber v. Smith, 2 Vern. 103; Berney v. Moore, 2 Ridgeway, 310. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 1, empowers a judge to grant relief in cases of forfeiture "up to and within the like time after execution executed and subject to the same terms and conditions in all respects . . . as in the Court of Chancery, and if the lessee, his executors, &c., shall, upon such proceeding, be relieved, he and they shall hold the demised lands according to the lease thereof made without any new lease." The older enactment as to relief against forfeiture was 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 4, and under that section relief was given in courts of common law to a sub-lessee (Doe d. Wyatt v. Byron, 1 C. B. 623), and to a mortgagee (Doe d. Whitfield v. Roe, 3 Taunt. 402). That section was substantially re-enacted by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 212, as to which see Day's Practice, under the Common Law Procedure Acts (ed. 1872), p. 206.

Bowser v. Colby, 1 Hare, 109, was referred to by the court.

Frank Gover, for the plaintiffs.—The master was right. Doe d. Wyatt v. Byron is no authority as to the jurisdiction of the courts of common law to grant relief after execution executed. That case was merely an application to stay proceedings before judgment, and no new lease was ordered to be granted because the original lease had never been determined by a decree of ejectment. But here the lease has been determined, and with it the lessee's liability on the covenants; this liability cannot be revived against him in his absence. An underlessee has no equitable rights against the original lessor, but only against the lessee who has granted him the underlease. The decree in Webber v. Smith shows that the real decision in that case was that, the lessor consenting to grant a new lease, such of the underlessees (the plaintiffs) as would accept a new lease for the residue of the term upon the conditions of the original lease should be entitled to have such a lease granted to them. That would throw no liability on the original lessee, and is no authority for the contention of the applicants.

The applicants are not in a position to claim relief at all under section 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860; they are merely derivative underlessees, and have no privity with the lessors: Cresswell v. Davidson, 56 L. T. N. S. 811, 35 W. R. Dig. 110; Burt v. Gray, 39 W. R. 429 [1891] 2 Q. B. 98.

Chitty replied.

DAY, J.—This is a case which has been referred to us by the learned judge at chambers, and it seems to me to involve the question whether relief against forfeiture under a forfeiture clause in a lease can be granted to an undertenant who seeks that relief as against the landlord, and incidentally also against the original lessee. He does not bring the lessee before us, and he asks to have the lease and the old liability of the lessee restored without giving the lessee any opportunity of showing cause why that should not be done. We have to determine whether such an application ought to be granted or not.

Now I do not propose to base my judgment upon the determination of the statutory rights of lessees and underlessees, but I intend to deal with the question in a broader sense, and to consider whether redress can be given—whether at law or in equity, and whether under statute or not under statute—in the absence of the original lessee.

This is a lease for a long term, which, after various underleases, has found its way as to certain portions of the term into a building society, who are mortgagees of some interest in the lease. The property has been parcelled out amongst several occupiers, and the ground-rent has been allowed to get into arrear. In the result the lessor, not being able to obtain his ground-rent, has brought his action of ejectment. He has not only brought his action, but he has recovered judgment in it, and has obtained execution and enforced the forfeiture, and is now in possession of the property. The present applicants, the mortgagees, have had notice of these proceedings, and come within the statutory period of six months to obtain relief. It is very likely that they have a remedy, and I am very far from saying that they have not. I think it is not at all improbable that mortgagees, whether by underlease or otherwise, have a remedy against forfeiture under such circumstances; but it is quite clear to my mind that, whatever remedy they have, they must enforce it in the proper manner, and must bring the proper parties before the court, or make adequate excuse for not doing so.

Now, in my judgment, this question must be treated historically. We must try to find out what the original principle was, and what the practice was before comparatively recent statutes. At law for a great length of time it has undoubtedly been the practice of the courts to restrain the further prosecution of an action of ejectment, brought in respect of an alleged forfeiture for non-payment of rent, upon the party proceeded against paying the rent into court. The courts were long in the habit of looking on forfeiture for non-payment of rent as merely a security for the payment of the rent, and therefore they would not allow the action of ejectment to proceed to its final end where the tenant thought fit to bring the money into court. Where that was done, such actions were habitually restrained.

This remedy was afterwards more precisely defined by statute. The earliest statute which has been referred to as dealing with the subject is 4 Geo. 2, c. 28. That Act (section 2) relieved the landlord from the embarrassments in which he constantly found himself by having to prove a demand for the rent between certain hours upon the day upon which it fell due, and it also provided (section 4) that if the rent, arrears, and costs were paid into court all further proceedings should be discontinued. That provision was substantially re-enacted by subsequent statutes, and in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (section 1), a new provision was introduced giving the common law courts power to give relief in the same manner as it had been given in courts of equity, and in courts of equity alone. What the courts of law did was to restrain the action and to prevent the completion of the forfeiture. The courts of equity were in the habit of doing more than that. Where forfeiture had been completed, upon the money being brought into court and full compensation made to the landlord the courts of equity were in the habit of directing a new lease to be executed similar to the old lease, and for this purpose of course they had before them the lessee, because they could not compel the granting of a new lease to a man without having him present upon the application for the granting of it. We have appealed to the counsel on the one side and on the other to suggest any instance in which the court of equity has ever directed a new lease to be granted where the lessee was not before them to take the lease. The lessee, of course, was ordinarily the person who made the application. Applications by underlessees, mortgagees, and others are comparatively not very numerous. I shall deal with one or two cases to which our attention has been called in a moment; but the ordinary class of applicant has been a lessee who has applied to have a lease granted to him by the lessor, and these two essential parties have always been, in all the cases that I can find, before the court. There is a case in the Irish courts which has been pressed upon us a very great deal, merely on account of the form of the answers of one or two judges. The answers of the judges are to be taken in connection with the questions put to them, and the questions put to the judges must in all reason be taken to be put with reference to the facts of the case. The case is Berney v. Moore, reported in 2 Ridgeway. In that case the lessee undoubtedly was before the court, and the court seems to have thought it only fair and reasonable that he should execute this lease, and he was directed to do so. That is a jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery undoubtedly always possessed. In the case in Ridgeway the lease was executed, no doubt, for the benefit of the underlessee; but it was executed with the privity of the lessee, who was a party to the proceedings and who was directed by the order of the court to execute the lease; so that that case is a very different case from the present and it seems to me to be no authority upon the point at issue. The theory of the law was that when an entry had been made under the ejectment the lease was gone, and therefore unless a new lease were executed there would have been no documentary evidence of the title of the tenant. It was for this reason that courts of equity required that a new lease should be granted, and their decrees contained provisions for that purpose. It was afterwards found inconvenient that in all cases the execution of a new lease should be required; the only object of the new lease was to set up the old lease again, and the Legislature very properly thought that the best way of doing that was simply that the courts should declare that the old lease was set up. It seems to me that that makes no substantial change in the remedy or in the procedure; all that was done was to dispense with the trouble and expense of having a new lease drawn up, and to relieve the parties from the payment of the burdensome stamp duties which had to be paid upon the new lease. For these reasons the Legislature provided that in the future it should not be necessary to direct that a new lease should be executed; but that the old lease should continue in force. That does not, in my judgment, alter the rights or remedies of the parties, and if it was necessary before to have all the parties interested in the lease before the court, I think it is necessary now, and I can find no authority to the contrary.

Our attention was called to Doe d. Whitfield v. Roe. There judgment of ejectment had been obtained and execution issued. The lease in that case had no doubt been forfeited. Then a mortgagee came and proved that he was mortgagee and had a right to be put in possession of the property, as between himself and the lessor, and the court, after hearing the lessor, directed that the mortgagee should retake possession of the land, but they did not give him any rights as against the lessee, they merely put him in the same position as if no ejectment had been brought. Then we were referred to Doe d. Wyatt v. Byron. There the defendants were underlessees of the term less two days. There had been no judgment in ejectment at all. The defendants, as soon as they heard of the writ, and before judgment could be obtained, entered an appearance and took out a summons asking for a stay of proceedings upon payment of the rent and costs under 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 4. The judge gave them that leave, and his decision was upheld by the court. The lease had never been determined, there had been no judgment or entry in ejectment. The lessees were not necessary parties there at all. The application was merely to stay proceedings in ejectment, not to set up a lease which had been formally determined by the acts of the parties and by the law.

In the present case we are asked to set up a lease which has been determined against lessees who are not before the court. It is said that they have no interest in the matter, but in my opinion they may have a very great interest in the matter, and may have many equities to set up against an attempt by underlessees, or mortgagees, or any one else to saddle them with a renewal of the lease. They have been relieved from this lease through the failure on the part of somebody to pay rent. It may be the building society or it may be the lessees who are to blame—I do not know—but it may well be that the lessees, if they were before the court, could show good cause why this lease should not be set up against them, and why they should not be bound again by the covenants contained in it, and have reimposed upon them a burthen of which they have been relieved. For these reasons I am of opinion that this application should not be granted.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. After the elaborate judgment of Day, J., I need only say a very few words. The application is made at the instance of the mortgagees of a sub-lessee, and they have made that application in the absence of the first lessee as party to the proceedings. Now a point has been taken by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs that the mortgagee by sub-demise is not within the 1st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, at all, and he says that is an answer to the whole case. It is not necessary for us to decide that point, because I am of opinion here that whether he is right or wrong in that, the absence of the first lessee is a fatal blot; but I should be sorry to give an opinion in favour of that contention of the plaintiff, and I think that it is substantially met by the reasons given by Henn, J., in the case of Berney v. Moore, 2 Ridgeway, at p. 329. 11 Anne (Irish), c. 2 is in these terms:—"If such lessee or lessees, his or their executors, administrators, or assigns, shall upon such bill filed as aforesaid, be relieved in equity, he and they shall have, hold, and enjoy the demised lands, according to the lease thereof made, without any new lease to be thereof made to him or them." Henn, J.'s answer to the question put to him is said by him to depend on the consideration "whether undertenants are comprehended under the general words, intent, and meaning of the Acts 11 Anne, c. 2 and 4 Geo. 1, c. 5, and he conceives they clearly are, and that the interest of an undertenant is derived out of the original lease; the existence of his interest depends on the existence and continuance of the original lease; if the original lease should be defeated the interest of the undertenant drops, of course." On that reasoning he holds that they are persons entitled to the benefit of that relief. However, as I have said, I do not think it is necessary to decide that point here, because I am of opinion that the lessee is a necessary party to these proceedings. These proceedings are taken under the 1st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. That section gave to the common law courts the right of exercising an equitable jurisdiction. It was to be exercised on the same terms and conditions in all respects as to payment of rent, &c.—I need not read that further—as in the Court of Chancery. Prior to that time the common law courts had no such jurisdiction. They could intervene, it may be at the instance of a sub-lessee, before execution to stay proceedings, and when proceedings were stayed then the parties seeking relief had to go to equity, and adopt the proceedings of equity in order to get that relief. If judgment had gone the court of common law could do nothing and the person seeking relief had to go to equity.

Equity before the Common Law Procedure Acts appears to have proceeded by granting a new lease. The application came after the forfeiture, and therefore after the first lease had been determined. That involved granting a new lease, and therefore the presence, as one of the parties, of the person to take a new lease. Then it was thought inconvenient that that cumbrous process should continue, and instead of granting a new lease it became, under the provisions of the statute, competent for the courts to say that the old lease should be deemed to continue; but that, again, involved a burthen being superimposed upon the person who had got rid of it, in just the same way as if they had granted or imposed upon him a new lease.

Now, under those circumstances, who is the real party against whom relief is sought on an application of this kind? It went without saying that the lessor was bound to accept the tender of rent, because, as has been pointed out, the forfeiture clauses were looked upon merely as securities for payment of the rent, and therefore the lessor, when the rent was paid, had nothing more to say in the matter. He could not help having the lease and having the tenant re-imposed upon him. He was a necessary party to the proceedings. But there was another person who might have had a great deal to say, and that was the first lessee. That first lessee may have got rid of his liability by something entirely independent of any default of his own. He may have relied, and properly relied, upon somebody else. He may have forfeited his lease without knowing it and without any default on his part, and he may have—and we do not know in this case that he has not—very good reasons to urge why that liability should not be re-imposed upon him; and I certainly do not think that we can say it should be re-imposed upon him without his having a right to be heard. No decision has been cited to show that any such thing was ever done by the courts of equity; but it is said that two authorities of the court of common law, before this jurisdiction was extended to the common law courts, carry the applicants through, and establish that the relief can be given in the absence of the person principally entitled to object.

I think, for the reasons—I will not go through them again—which have been so fully stated by my brother Day, the first of these cases—Doe d. Whitfield v. Roe—is distinguishable. That case is the only one which, even according to Mr. Chitty, goes the length of his proposition, because it is the only one that deals with relief after judgment; but I think it is open to the distinction pointed out by Day, J.; and, further, if it is not open to this distinction, it would affirm the proposition that the courts of common law had, before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, the jurisdiction which was then extended to them, and that that section was not necessary. That case really does not decide what Mr. Chitty says it does—namely, that the common law courts had full jurisdiction after forfeiture to relieve, and to consider upon what terms it would relieve, in the absence of the first lessee.

The second case cited by Mr. Chitty—the case of Doe d. Wyatt v. Byron—is only a case of an application to stay proceedings before judgment or before ejectment, and therefore it does not touch the point here.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this application cannot be successful, the applicants not having brought in the first lessee as a party to these proceedings, and having given no reason why they should not have done so

Summons dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicants, Wyatt & Co.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Henry Gover & Sons.

Q. B. Div. (Day and Collins, JJ.) — Jan. 20.

BRADLEY v. CHAMBERLYN. (a.)

Practice — Writ — Specially-indorsed writ — Condition precedent—No averment of performance—Ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1.

The defendant agreed to pay £210 to the plaintiff if he would deliver to the defendant's husband certain bills. In an action to recover the £210, the writ, which was specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6, did not aver that the plaintiff had delivered the bills to the defendant's husband.

Held, that, notwithstanding the non-averment of performance of the condition precedent, it was a good special indorsement.

Appeal of the plaintiff against an order of the judge in chambers reversing an order of the master directing judgment for the plaintiff under order 14.

The writ, which was specially indorsed, was as follows:—

"The plaintiff's claim is for £210, payable to the plaintiff on demand, under an agreement bearing date 21st June, 1892, made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff for value.

"PARTICULARS.

"1892, Oct. 13th.—To amount due ... £210.

"The following is a copy of the said agreement:—'To A. M. Bradley, 42, Lombard-street, London, 21st June.—Dear Sir,—If you will deliver to my husband, Mr. A. H. Chamberlyn, the three bills you hold accepted by Edwardes (1) and Chatterton (2) I undertake to pay you on demand the sum of £210, which he owes to you for cash advanced.—Yours truly, MAY CHAMBERLYN.'

"The defendant is sued in respect of her separate estate possessed by her at the time the said agreement was entered into."

Oswald, for the plaintiff, referred to Gurney v. Small, [1891] 2 Q. B. 584, 40 W. R. Dig. 192; Fruhauf v. Grosvenor, 8 Times L. R. 744; Satchwell v. Clarke, 66 L. T. N. S. 641, 40 W. R. Dig. 192; Paxton v. Baird, ante, p. 88, [1893] 1 Q. B. 139.

Sylvain Mayer, for the defendant.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, J.—The question is whether this is a good special indorsement, and the only objection made to it is that it contains no averment of the performance of the condition precedent. I think that there is no authority which binds us to say that such an averment is necessary, and it is clear that if it is not necessary this is a good special indorsement. This is a case in which, before the Judicature Act, the sum due might have been recovered under the ordinary money count if the condition had been performed in fact. If authority is required in favour of the plaintiff there is the case of Satchwell v. Clarke, in which it was decided that it is a good special indorsement although an averment is omitted which would be material in a statement of claim. I, therefore, am of opinion that the indorsement in this case is a good special indorsement, notwithstanding the absence of averment of performance.

The defendant has made no affidavit on the merits, but has relied solely on the legal point, and it is too late now for the defendant to ask for leave to make an affidavit on the merits.

DAY, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Plaintiff in person.

Solicitor for the defendant, Fereday.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) Jan. 17.

SALT UNION (LIMITED) v. WOOD. (a.)

Master and servant—Workman—Person employed on ship engaged in traffic in rivers and estuaries—"Seagoing ship"—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90)—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 109, 243.

A ship engaged in carrying cargo upon rivers and their estuaries, although it may be capable of going to sea, is not a "seagoing ship" within the meaning of section 109 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. Therefore the provisions of section 243 of that Act for the punishment of offences by seamen do not apply to a man who is employed upon such a ship, and he may be dealt with under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

Special case stated by justices of the county of Cheshire.

The material facts were as follows:—

On the 24th of August, 1892, the appellants and the respondent and their respective solicitors appeared before the justices on a summons under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, issued on the complaint of the appellants, wherein it was alleged that at Wharton the respondent did, on the 19th of August, 1892, unlawfully refuse to carry out his contract of service with and to obey the orders of the appellants, who claimed damages in the sum of £10.

The respondent was one of the crew of the screw steamship Albion, a vessel or barge exclusively used for the conveyance of salt upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey from Winsford, the place of its manufacture, to Liverpool, where it was transferred to oceangoing vessels. The voyages of The Albion were upon the rivers Weaver and Mersey only, and did not extend upon the tidal waters of the Mersey beyond the limits of the Port of Liverpool.

The Albion was registered under the Merchant Shipping Acts as a British ship in 1887 at the Port of Liverpool, her gross tonnage being 142·87 tons, and registered tonnage 102·99 tons.

The respondent filled the post of "hand" or "mate" on board The Albion, the other members of the crew being the captain and engineer. His duties were to obey the captain's orders in navigating The Albion and keeping her in repair, and in working a derrick and assisting at the locks; he was paid weekly wages, and so much per ton winding, trip money, and tonnage.

No articles of agreement in writing had been entered into between the appellants and the respondent, nor was he registered as a seaman. The contract of service was determinable on a week's notice from either party, and a notice given by the respondent to the appellants was put in evidence.

It was alleged that the respondent on the 19th of August, 1892, refused to comply with an order of the superintendent of the vessels and barges of the appellants to transfer himself to another vessel.

The respondent's solicitor contended that The Albion was a ship and the respondent a seamen as respectively defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 2; and that, although section 13 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, which enacted that that Act should not apply to seamen, had been repealed by the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), yet the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 243, which provided for the punishment of acts of disobedience by seamen and others, by implication took away any other remedy against the respondent for breach of contract, and the appellants could not take proceedings for the recovery of damages under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. The respondent's solicitor cited the case Great Northern Steamship Fishing Co. v. Edgehill, 11 Q. B. D. 225, 31 W. R. Dig. 99, as an authority.

The appellants' solicitor contended that the respondent was a workman within the meaning of the term "workman" as defined by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 10, and that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, did not apply, as the respondent was not what is generally known as a seaman, but only a waterman, and The Albion was a river vessel, not a seagoing ship, to which class of vessels only section 243 applied, and that, therefore, the appellants' only remedy was by summons under the provisions of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

The justices were of opinion that The Albion was a "ship" and the respondent a "seaman" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and on the authority of the case of Great Northern Steamship Fishing Co. v. Edgehill held that the appellants had no remedy under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and, therefore, dismissed the complaint.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent was a workman who could be dealt with under the summons issued under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875; or whether he was a seaman and ought to have been summoned and dealt with under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

"Workman" is defined by section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, to mean any person (except a domestic or menial servant) engaged in manual labour who works under an oral or written contract with an employer.

Section 13 provides that the Act shall not apply to seamen, but this provision is repealed by section 11 of the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act, 1880.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 2, defines "seaman" as including "every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship," and by the same section "'ship' shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Part 3 of the Act (sections 109-290) deals with "masters and seamen," and section 109 enacts that "the various provisions of the third part of this Act shall have the following applications, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application (that is to say), . . . the whole of the third part of this Act shall apply to all seagoing ships registered in the United Kingdom" (with certain specified exceptions), "and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships respectively."

Section 243 provides for the summary punishment of seamen who have committed certain offences, including (clauses 4, 5) wilful disobedience to lawful commands.

J. E. Bankes (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The magistrates ought to have dealt with this case under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. The Great Northern Steamship Fishing Co. v. Edgehill does not affect the right of the appellants to proceed under that Act, for they have no remedy under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. By virtue of section 109, which introduces and applies to Part 3 of that Act, section 243 (which is contained in Part 3) only applies to seamen upon "seagoing ships." The justices have found that the voyages of The Albion are confined to rivers, and that her cargo is transferred in the Mersey to oceangoing ships. She is therefore not a "seagoing ship." As to the distinction to be drawn between "rivers" and "the sea," the judgment of Lindley, J., in The Overseers of Woolwich v. Robertson, 29 W. R. 892, 6 Q. B. D. 654, is in point.

T. G. Carver, for the respondent.—Section 109 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, does not by any negative words limit the application of the other sections of Part 3 of that Act; it does not enact that the words specified are never to have any other meaning than that assigned to them in that section. That was the view of Dr. Lushington in The Milford, 6 W. R. 554, Swab. 362, and The Jonathan Goodhue, ib. 524. I contend, therefore, that "seaman" in section 243 does not necessarily denote a seaman falling within the categories specified in section 109. Moreover, The Albion is a "seagoing ship." She is of a sufficient size to enable her to go to sea, and she is capable of doing so, although she happens to be used only in rivers and estuaries. She is registered, and that is done with the object of getting her clearance before going to sea: Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 19.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The point which arises in this case is a simple one—namely, whether section 243 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, does or does not apply to this case. If it does not apply these proceedings were rightly taken, if it does apply they were wrong. That depends upon the construction of a single word in the 109th section. That section says that the third part of the Act is to apply to "all seagoing ships registered in the United Kingdom," with certain exceptions which are not material to this case. This ship is registered. Is she also a seagoing ship? for both qualifications must co-exist. I am of opinion that she is not a seagoing ship within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. We must give a simple, sensible interpretation to an eminently practical statute, with regard to which it is extremely important that its true meaning should be understood and should be a meaning capable of being at once applied by the tribunals which have to apply it. If we were to accede to the argument of the respondent we should oblige every bench of magistrates before whom a similar case arose to embark on an inquiry, not as to whether a particular ship actually does go to sea and is therefore a seagoing ship—an exceedingly simple matter to ascertain—but as to whether she is or is not fit to go to sea, or might, under certain circumstances, be sent to sea. I cannot imagine anything more difficult for the magistrates to enter into. But I think that we may properly hold that a seagoing ship is a ship that goes to sea, whose practice and occupation is to go to sea. Now this ship does not do so in any ordinary or reasonable sense. She is one of a number of ships engaged in this traffic in the Weaver and the estuary of the Mersey, where, we are told, they transfer their cargo to oceangoing ships: that is the avocation which this ship pursues from day to day. It may be that she is very capable of going to sea, but she does not go to sea, and is, therefore, not a seagoing ship. It follows that the first question put by the justices must be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative. The respondent ought to be dealt with under the Employers and Workmen Act, and not under the Merchant Shipping Act.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The point, which is, comparatively speaking, a narrow one, turns on the construction of the last part of section 109 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and that again depends upon the application of the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius. To apply that maxim it is necessary to see what is the unus and what is the alter. The cases in Swabey's reports which were cited to us are authorities in favour of the appellants rather than of the respondent. The learned judge did not mean to say that section 109 had no meaning; he had to consider what was the unus and what was the alter. Now the unus was clearly seagoing ships registered in the United Kingdom; was the alter foreign ships or all other ships British or foreign, or was it ships that did not go to sea? The judge decided that the alter did not embrace foreign ships, but only ships that did not go to sea, and consequently that that part of the Act might be taken as applying in some cases to foreign ships. That conclusion is, as I said, rather in favour of the appellants.

With regard to the question of whether this was a seagoing ship I entertain no doubt whatever, and I entirely agree with what my lord has said on that point.

Case remitted to the magistrates.

Solicitors for the appellants, Busk & Co., for J. H. Cooke, Winsford.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. W. Thompson, Liverpool.

Q. B. Div.
(Bruce and Kennedy, JJ.) Nov. 3.

MALLEY v. SHEPLEY. (a.)

County court—Practice—High Court action with London agent's address for service—Action remitted to county court—County court proceedings with country solicitor's address for service—Notice of appeal—Service on London agent—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10; ord. 33.

In an action commenced in the High Court the address for service mentioned on the writ was the address of certain London solicitors, agents for the plaintiff's solicitor. The action was remitted to a county court, and on the particulars which were duly lodged with the registrar and a copy of which was served upon the defendant's solicitors, the address for service was stated to be that of the plaintiff's country solicitor. After the action had been heard and judgment had been delivered in the plaintiff's favour, a notice of appeal on the part of the defendant was, on the last day for service of appeal, served upon the London agents, whose names appeared upon the writ.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the service was bad, on the ground that the notice had not been served upon the plaintiff through his country solicitor, whose address for service was the only one given in the county court proceedings.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the decision of the county court judge sitting at Stourbridge.

The action had been commenced in June, 1892, in the High Court of Justice, by a writ which stated that "this writ was issued by Messrs. A. H. Arnould & Son, whose address for service is 10, New-court, Lincoln's-inn, London, agents for Joseph Higgs, Brierley Hill, Staffordshire, solicitor for the said plaintiff." On the 13th of July the action was remitted by order of a judge at chambers to the Worcestershire County Court, and in accordance with the County County Rules, 1889, ord. 33, r. 1, the plaintiff's solicitor lodged particulars of the plaint with the registrar of the county court, and indorsed thereon his own name and place of business as the address for service of all proceedings in the action as required by ord. 6, r. 10. The registrar duly forwarded a copy of the said particulars to the defendant. At the hearing on the 6th of October judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff, and notice of appeal was left with Messrs. Arnould & Son, the agents for the plaintiff's solicitor, twenty-one days after the hearing, being the last day for service under ord. 59, r. 12, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883.

Macaskie, for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection that the appeal was out of time, as the notice of appeal had been served on the last possible day upon the London agents of the plaintiff's solicitor instead of on the plaintiff's solicitor himself, whose address for service was the only one given in the county court proceedings. Such a service is bad, and was so determined in the case of Powell v. Thomas, 39 W. R. 224, [1891] 1 Q. B. 97. The cause had become a county court cause, and the only solicitor whose name had been given for service was the plaintiff's solicitor. There is no time now to serve the notice in a proper way, and this is not a case in which the court should grant any indulgence.

E. Pollock, for the defendant.—The case of Powell v. Thomas is not applicable, as that was an action commenced in the county court and no notice had been served upon any person whose name appeared in the record. In this case the address for service was given upon the writ with which the action commenced. The notice from the registrar was in the terms of form 73 in the appendix to the County Court Rules, 1889, and in that form there is nothing to notify the place of service. The address of the solicitor indorsed upon the particulars is the same as that which appears upon the writ, and the defendant was justified in presuming that the name of the London agent had been omitted by inadvertence. The case of Powell v. Thomas has never been held to apply to a remitted action, but if it is so held this is a case in which the court ought to extend the time for service, which is within their discretion: Cusack v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 39 W. R. 244, [1891] 1 Q. B. 347.

Macaskie replied.

BRUCE, J.—The only question before us is whether a notice of appeal could be properly served on the London agents of a plaintiff's country solicitor. Upon the writ issued in the High Court the address of the London agents was given for service. But under the order remitting the action to the county court the action and all proceedings therein were tried and taken in such court as if the action had originally commenced therein in accordance with section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The whole of the proceedings were rightly regulated by the county court procedure, and the plaintiff accordingly filed his particulars with the registrar, on which the plaintiff's solicitor's address was indorsed for service. The registrar was bound to send to the defendant a notice of the date of hearing, together with the particulars indorsed with the name of the plaintiff's solicitor, and all the proceedings, were regulated by the terms of the Act of 1888, as if the action had commenced in the county court. There can be no doubt that for service in all proceedings in that court the country solicitor's address was the only right one. This notice of appeal is therefore bad; but it is said that this objection is only a technical one, and a new one as applied to remitted actions. The words of the Act are quite plain, but as there seems to be a slip or mistake, we are unwilling to shut the defendant out from his appeal; but it must be clearly understood that these rules of procedure exist in order to be observed.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

The appeal was subsequently heard and dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Arnould & Son, for Joseph Higgs, Brierley Hill, Staffordshire.

Solicitors for the defendant, W. Robinson & Co., for W. Waldron, Brierley Hill, Staffordshire.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } Jan. 24.

In re CRAWSHAY (DECEASED). (a.)

Probate—Will—Bankrupt executor out of England—Testator's desire to change executor—Wish not carried out—Grant to widow—Citation—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.

A sole executor named in a will during the lifetime of the testator left England under an assumed name, after selling all his effects to his landlord, and was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt.

The testator, on hearing of the facts, desired to alter his will by removing the name from the executorship, but, owing to illness and the inaccessibility of the will at the time, died without carrying out his intention.

The court, on motion, granted letters of administration with the will annexed to the testator's widow under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857, and dispensed with citation of the absent executor.

Application for grant of letters of administration with last will and testament of Herbert Henry Crawshay, late of St. Aubyns, Brighton, deceased, annexed of all and singular the personal estate of the said H. H. Crawshay to Maria Courtenay Crawshay, widow of the deceased, the sole beneficiary named in the will.

Affidavits were filed stating that the deceased died at Biarritz on the 2nd of November, 1892, having made a will dated the 24th of February, 1891, by which he appointed Ernest Jerdein, of the Isthmian Club, sole executor thereof. Ernest Jerdein, in August, 1892, left England under an assumed name without leaving any address, having first sold the whole of his effects to his landlord saying he was going to San Francisco. He had since been adjudicated bankrupt.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was further stated that on the deceased hearing of these facts he desired to alter his will by removing the said Ernest Jerdein's name as executor, but owing to his sudden illness and unexpected decease, and to the fact that the will was packed up in some part of his luggage which was not accessible, being in another city, and his wife could not leave him during his last illness, he had been unable to carry out his intention.

Deane, for the widow, made the application ex parte under section 73, asking the court to dispense with citing the absent executor.—He can only be cited by advertisement. We do not know where to advertise, and if we did advertise so that the citation came to the knowledge of the executor, it is plain that he has no intention to return; if he did and claimed to act, I should, under the circumstances, ask the court to refuse the grant to him.

JEUNE, P.—In this case, considering the strength of the affidavits and looking at the special circumstances af the case, I think I can dispense with service on the executor and grant the application.

Application allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Carlisle, Alma, & Fisher.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Nov. 25.

"THE MONTE ROSA." (a.)

Shipping—Damage—Pilot in charge by compulsion of law—Carrying anchor at the hawse pipe with stock above water within province of pilot — Order in Council, February 5, 1872, par. 20 (Thames Conservancy Bye-Laws).

Whether the anchor of a steamer in the Thames should be carried at the hawse pipe with the stock above water is a matter within the province of the pilot, notwithstanding that the carrying of the anchor in such a position may be an infringement of rule 20 of the Thames Conservancy Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, in force under the Order in Council of the 5th of February, 1872.

The Ripon, 33 W. R. 659, 10 P. D. 65, explained.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamtug Contest against the steamship Monte Rosa.

The action was now heard before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

The result of the evidence appears from the judgment.

Pyke, Q.C., and Nelson, for the plaintiffs.

Sir W. Phillimore, and Aspinall, Q.C., for the defendants.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the following authority was cited: Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546.

BARNES, J.—In this case the collision took place on the 1st of June, 1892, about six o'clock in the evening, between the tug Contest and the steamer Monte Rosa, in Bugsby's Reach. Both vessels were proceeding up the Thames, and the tug was about to assist in docking The Monte Rosa, and was proceeding up at the same speed on her starboard side. The collision happened by the steamer coming into contact with the port quarter of the tug, making a hole in two plates on that quarter, knocking off the propeller, and doing some other damage. The steamer, it is necessary to add, was in charge of Mr. Henderson, a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, and was under his charge by compulsion of law. The first point to determine is by whose default the collision was occasioned, and at an early stage of this case, after hearing the evidence of the tug, I intimated—and in that intimation the Elder Brethren agreed—that the principal cause of the collision was the careless management of the tug, in allowing herself, by the improper action of her starboard helm, to get across the bows of the steamer on the occasion of the attempt to make fast to the steamer. We have no doubt whatever that the cause of the collision was the improper manœuvring of the tug in the way I have indicated, which brought her across the bows of the steamer. I do not feel disposed to accept the statement that the tug was signalled. I cannot help thinking that those on board the tug thought it was about time to attempt to get a rope on board, and that in that attempt, and while they were engaged in it, she was carelessly handled and allowed to get across the bows of the steamer.

It is suggested that the steamer ought to have eased her speed or stopped and reversed her engines when she saw that there was a likelihood of danger from the approach of the tug. I have asked the Elder Brethren their view upon these points, and they consider, and in their opinion I entirely agree, that the steamer did stop when she saw that there was danger, that she had no time to do anything more than she did, and that she is not in any way to blame in respect of the points made against her of not easing speed or stopping and reversing. I think these two parts of the case are really free from any doubt or difficulty. But I now come to that which has been the principal matter in contest—namely, what was it that caused the damage to the plates which have been produced in court, and to the propeller of the tug? It is said by the plaintiffs that that damage was due to the stem of the steamer coming in contact with the plates, and afterwards with the propeller. I have asked the Elder Brethren to give me their opinion upon this part of the case. After careful examination of the plates and the model, said to be to scale, though there is a dispute as to the actual shape of the anchor and the fluke which would be projecting from the side of the steamer, the conclusion they have come to—and they advise me on this point with considerable confidence—that the damage to the plates and the propeller was done by the anchor, and I see no reason to differ from them, and I accept their view on that part of the case, and come to the conclusion that the anchor did the immediate damage to the tug.

This conclusion raises a question of some nicety. The plaintiffs say that the steamer was guilty of a breach of rule 20 of the Thames Conservancy Rules approved by the Order in Council of the 5th of February, 1872, which provides that "no vessel shall be navigated or allowed to lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging by the cable perpendicularly from the hawse-pipe unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for catting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way." Now there can be no doubt that the anchor of The Monte Rosa was carried up the Thames with the shackle up at the hawse-pipe, and in that position the stock was considerably out of the water and the flukes were just carrying the anchor just about level with the water—and it is clear that this mode of carrying the anchor was not in accordance with the above rule. The defendants, however, say that the anchor was carried in that position by the orders of the pilot, and that, that being so, as the anchor's position is a matter for the pilot to deal with, they are exonerated from liability for anything that happened in consequence of that position of the anchor by virtue of the pilot's orders. That, again, raises two questions, one of fact and one of law. The first question is whether the anchor was in that position in which it was, in accordance with the pilot's orders. On that the master's evidence is, taking it very shortly, that the pilot said: "I see your anchor is at the hawse. You will let it remain there till she eases down to go into the dock." The master adds: "He told me to tell the mate when we eased down to go into dock, that the stock was to be put awash. I told him to do so. I heard him repeat the orders to the mate. We had not eased down at the time of the collision." The mate said: "I got an order from the pilot in Long Reach to lower the anchor when easing for the docks." The pilot said: "Don't lower it till we ease for the docks, and then lower it stock awash. We had not eased for the docks at the time of the collision." I have no hesitation in accepting the story of the two officers of the ship that the anchor was in its position by the pilot's orders at the time of the accident.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then it is contended by Sir Walter Phillimore and Mr. Aspinall that if that is so, the position of the anchor is a matter within the pilot's jurisdiction, even though there is a Thames Conservancy bye-law to the effect that it ought not to be in the position to which it was ordered by him. The short way of putting that point is that the position of the anchor forms part of the navigation of the ship which is in the pilot's jurisdiction. It is said on the other side that that is not the true position with regard to the anchor; that the same consequence must follow as if the Thames bye-laws as to lights had been disobeyed, when, as was decided in the case of The Ripon, 33 W. R. 659, 10 P. D. 65, the owners of the steamer would not have been exonerated from liability. In that case a vessel in motion in the Humber, in addition to the side lights, by the pilot's orders had a white light from the main peak showing astern, and it was held that that was a breach of the statutory regulations; that there being no circumstances to make that departure from the rule necessary, and it being impossible to say that the white light at the peak might not have contributed to the collision, the shipowners were not exempt from liability, though the pilot was in charge by compulsion of law; and that, although the light in question had been exhibited by the order of the pilot, the master should not have permitted an infringement of the regulation. If one states the case of The Ripon a little more broadly, it is that the position of the lights and their proper exhibition is a matter for the master and not for the pilot. I have considered that case with some care by the light of two other cases cited —namely, The Rigsborgs Minde, 8 P. D. 132, 31 W. R. Dig. 175, and The Gipsey King, 2 Wm. Rob. 537. In the latter case a vessel had come into collision with another in such a way that the anchor, which had not been hoisted on deck nor catted, as proper and customary, and was hanging over her bow under water, made a hole in the other vessel, Dr. Lushington said: "If the pilot, then, is to decide the mode of anchoring a vessel it appears to me that it follows as a necessary consequence that the pilot is responsible to see that the anchor is in a proper situation to be dropped when necessary. In the present case this view of the pilot's duty is confirmed by the rules and regulations of the river in which this collision occurred, and in which he is licensed to act as pilot. Those rules specially enjoin what is to be done as regards having the anchor in a proper position, ready to be dropped, and such rules must be considered as peculiarly binding upon the pilot on board The Gipsey King as being prescribed by the authority under which he was entitled to act." In The Rigsborgs Minde damage had been done by the fluke of a schooner's anchor piercing the side of a flyboat. The court held that there was no want of care on the part of the crew, and it was held that the damage was caused by the fault of the pilot in the course of his duty. It is said, as against that, that even if it is within the pilot's duty to attend to the position of the anchor, and give orders as to the anchor, still the master is to blame, and his owners through him, because the master is bound to comply with the rules, and interfere with the pilot with reference to his orders in connection with the anchoring of the ship if such orders are infringing any rule laid down by authority. I think it would be dangerous to lay that down as a sound proposition in face of such a decision as that of The Argo, Swab. 462, where a steamer, which was being navigated on the wrong side of the channel, contrary to the section of the Act then in force, was doing so under the pilot's orders, and it was held that the master was not bound to interfere, and that the owners were not responsible for the damage caused thereby. It really comes, when one considers it, to be a question of whether what is being done is part of the ordering of the navigation of the ship and her manœuvres, and the case of The Argo and that class of case seems to be much more analogous to the present case, than the case of The Ripon, decided as to a matter of lights, with which the pilot has nothing to do, and which it is entirely the master's duty to see to.

I think that in this case, the infringement of the rule having been by the pilot's order, the shipowners are exempt from responsibility for his accident in the matter. There is, however, a further point in this case which I think is equally fatal, if established, to the plaintiff's case. [His lordship then proceeded to examine the question whether, notwithstanding the position of the steamer's anchor, the tug might not have avoided the collision, and, coming to the conclusion that she could, concluded his judgment as follows:—] I am of opinion that the damage in this case was caused by the action of the tug; that the anchor was an obvious danger which could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the tug; that at that time no want of care was exhibited on the part of the steamer which could have in any way affected the matter; and that the tug is alone to blame for this disaster. Therefore the claim must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Cooper & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, & Kay, L.JJ.) [and Chan. Div. (Chitty, J.)] — Jan. 20, 21, 24, 25, 31; Feb. 6, 7.

WITHINGTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH v. CORPORATION OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Hospital — "Noxious business" — Smallpox hospital — Local authority — Adjoining district — Consent — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 112, 131, 285.

A hospital is not within the provisions of section 112 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The powers conferred by section 131, exercisable by a local authority, are not limited for their exercise to the district of the particular local authority which exercises them.

Section 285 does not apply to the powers conferred by section 131 so as to require for their exercise in an adjoining district the consent of the local authority of such adjoining district.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Motion.

The question was whether a smallpox hospital was a "noxious or offensive trade, business or manufacture" within the meaning of section 112 of the Public Health Act, 1875, or whether by virtue of sections 131 and 285 of that Act the erection of such a hospital by a local authority in an adjoining district required the consent of the local authority of such district.

The defendants proposed to build on certain ground of their own, but which was situate within the district of the plaintiff local board of health—an urban sanitary authority whose district adjoined the district of the defendants—a temporary hospital for the reception of smallpox patients for the use of the inhabitants of their own district.

The plaintiffs moved for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from establishing or carrying on such hospital without their consent.

Section 112 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides as follows: "Any person who, after the passing of this Act, establishes within the district of an urban authority, without their consent in writing, any offensive trade; that is to say, the trade of blood boiler, or bone boiler, or fellmonger, or soap boiler, or tallow melter, or tripe boiler, or any other noxious or offensive trade, business or manufacture, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds in respect of the establishment thereof, and any person carrying on a business so established shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day on which the offence is continued, whether there has or has not been any conviction in respect of the establishment thereof."

Section 131 provides that "any local authority may provide for the use of the inhabitants of their district hospitals or temporary places for the reception of the sick, and for that purpose may themselves build such hospitals or places of reception, or contract for the use of any such hospital or part of a hospital or place of reception, or enter into any agreement with any person having the management of any hospital, for the reception of the sick inhabitants of their district, on payment of such annual or other sum as may be agreed on. Two or more local authorities may combine in providing a common hospital."

Section 285 provides that "any local authority may, with the consent of the local authority of any adjoining district, execute and do in such adjoining distric all or any of such works and things as they may execute and do within their own district, and on such terms of payment or otherwise as may be agreed on between them and the local authority of the adjoining district; moreover two or more local authorities may combine together for the purpose of executing and maintaining any works that may be for the benefit of their respective districts, or any part thereof."

Farwell, Q.C., Clare, and Norris, for the Withington Local Board. — First, the proposed hospital is a noxious or offensive business within section 112 of the Act: Bramwell v. Lacy, 27 W. R. 463, 10 Ch. D. 691; it would be a private nuisance: Metropolitan Asylums District v. Hill, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193. The penalty in section 112 implies a prohibition: In re Cork and Youghal Railway Co., 18 W. R. 26, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 748. Secondly, the powers of a local board under section 131 are confined to their own district: Haywood v. Lowndes, 7 W. R. 279, 4 Dr. 454. Thirdly, the consent of the Withington Local Board is necessary under section 285.

Byrne, Q.C., Maberly, and Macmorran, for the Corporation of Manchester.—As to the first point, the business is not ejusdem generis with those mentioned in section 112: Wanstead Local Board of Health v. Hill, 11 W. R. 368, 13 C. B. N. S. 479; Passey v. Oxford Local Board, 43 J. P. 622; Braintree Local Board of Health v. Boyton, 52 L. T. N. S. 99, 33 W. R. Dig. 147. It would not necessarily be a private nuisance: Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 2 T. L. R. 361. As to the second point, the rule in Haywood v. Lowndes is only a primâ facie rule. On the construction of section 131 no such limit is implied. As to the third point, section 285 is in an entirely distinct part of the Act from section 131, and does not control it. Section 131 occurs in Part 3 under the head of "Sanitary Provisions," "Infectious Diseases and Hospitals." Section 285 is in Part 8 in a group of sections relating to "Union of Districts."

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—As to the first point which arises on section 112, I observe that that section has already received a judicial construction. It first enumerates certain specific trades which are described as offensive, and which, according to the habits of mankind, are offensive, and then winds up with "any other noxious or offensive trade, business, or manufacture." A penalty is imposed upon any person establishing such trades without the consent of the local authority, and such establishment is therefore unlawful. The question is whether the proposed hospital falls within the above general words. Now the Court of Common Pleas (in Wanstead Local Board of Health v. Hill) had before it practically the same point under a similar section of the Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 64), the words not being identical, but very similar. It was a question whether brickmaking was a noxious or offensive trade, business, or manufacture within the meaning of the section, and a strong court, consisting of Erle, C.J., and Williams, Willes, and Keating, JJ., held it was not, and that to bring the case within the general words the trade or business must be in itself of a noxious or offensive nature analogous to those mentioned. No one can say that carrying on a smallpox hospital is analogous to blood boiling, or the other businesses specifically mentioned. It has been decided that carrying on a hospital is a business, and so far the plaintiffs are right, but it is impossible to hold it is an analogous business. There was a subsequent decision (Braintree Local Board of Health v. Boyton) as to fish frying, a case as to which there was more to be said against the trade, and more to be said in favour of its falling within the section.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE and G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

I base my decision on the case in the Common Pleas, and the principles there laid down. I should be misreading the section if I held this hospital fell within it.

It was pointed out by Willes, J., that the jurisdiction under the section rests with the justices of the peace. He thought, as I think, that their task would be easier if they had to find that the noxious trade was analogous to those specified.

This disposes of the first point, which is far from unimportant. As to the remaining points, I will reserve judgment.

Jan. 31.—CHITTY, J.—The question reserved depends upon the true meaning of section 131 and section 285 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The defendants propose to build on their own ground within the plaintiffs' district, which adjoins their own district, a hospital for the use of sick inhabitants of their own district. The defendants intend to use the hospital for the reception of smallpox patients; but, on the question reserved, there is no distinction between patients suffering from infectious sickness such as smallpox, and patients suffering from a non-infectious sickness. The propositions for which the plaintiffs contend are, first, that the powers as to hospitals conferred by section 131 are, on the true construction of that section, exercisable by a local authority only within their own district, and, secondly, that section 285 applies to these powers, and enables a local authority to exercise them within an adjoining district, but only with the consent of the local authority of such adjoining district. The propositions for which the defendants, on the other hand, contend are, first, that the powers of section 131 are not confined to the district of the local authority by whom they are exercisable, but are unlimited in point of space, and, secondly, that section 285 has no application to the exercise of powers under section 131. The arguments on each side were supported by an elaborate examination of the provisions of the two sections themselves, and by copious references to numerous other sections of the Act bearing, or supposed to bear, on the question. In fact the Act, which contains 343 sections, was ransacked by counsel, and nothing that had any relevancy was omitted in the discussion. The general scheme of the Act is to divide England, except the metropolis, into districts, and to subject these districts to the jurisdiction of local authorities invested with the powers conferred by the Act. Hence it is said for the plaintiffs that the consideration of the particular provisions of the Act must be approached with due regard to this general scheme, and, consequently, with a presumption that the powers conferred on a local authority are restricted in their exercise to the particular district for which they are specially constituted, and the decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Heywood v. Lowndes is relied upon in support of the argument. The soundness of the argument may be admitted if it is advanced merely in a general way; the presumption is merely of a primâ facie nature, which may be displaced by an examination of the Act itself.

Another argument of a general nature put forward for the plaintiffs was that a corporation created by statute for a specific purpose has those powers only which the statute confers, and, consequently, that a local authority which is empowered to provide a hospital in an adjoining district with the consent of the local authority of that district has no power to provide a hospital there without such consent. Stated in a general way the argument is correct. The question, however, is whether it applies to this case. The ground on which the plaintiff's case rests is not simply that the defendants are acting ultrà vires. If that were all, the plaintiffs would have no right of action, although the Attorney-General might complain. But the plaintiffs say that the defendants are invading their district unlawfully, because the plaintiffs' consent is rendered necessary by section 285 and has not been given, and that by reason of their consent being required by the statute they have a sufficient interest to support their action. To succeed it is plain that the plaintiffs must show that section 285 applies. In addition to these observations of a general character there is another which strikes me as pertinent. When the plaintiffs' counsel speak of the defendants invading the plaintiffs' district and interfering with their jurisdiction, and when they say that the care of the health of the inhabitants of their district is committed to the plaintiffs' charge, it must be borne in mind that the powers and jurisdiction of the plaintiffs as the local authority are of a special and limited kind strictly defined by the Act. One thing is clear. If a wealthy and charitably disposed person were minded to set up a hospital for the sick within the plaintiffs' district the plaintiffs could not stop him. They would have no power of interference with the establishment or the management of the hospital as such. They could, of course, require plans of the building and drains to be submitted, and generally could exercise all their powers in regard to infection and the like, just as they could in reference to any other house or building within their district; but they could not prohibit the erection or carrying on of any such hospital, even though it was established for the reception of patients suffering from infectious diseases.

All this was necessarily admitted by the plaintiffs' counsel after a careful examination of the statutes. The plaintiffs' case, then, comes to this—that their consent is required only where it is a local authority that purposes to provide the hospital within the plaintiffs' district. I proceed now to examine shortly section 131. It is altogether silent as to the place where the hospitals or temporary places for the recep- of the sick are to be situate. An examination of upwards of forty other sections of the Act gives the following result:—The powers and duties of the local authority are in some cases in express terms made exercisable within their own district; in others in express terms both within and without; and in others no mention is made, one way or the other, as to district or place. Of the last class examples are found in the section under consideration (section 131), and also, amongst others, in section 141 (as to mortuaries) section 164 (as to recreation grounds), section 165 (as to clocks), section 39 (as to urinals, &c.), and sections 120, 121, and 122 (as to disinfection). In these circumstances it is argued for the plaintiffs that where the Legislature intends to confer a power exercisable without the district it says so in direct terms, and consequently, that where there is silence as to the district the inference is that the power is exercisable only within the district; while, on the other hand, it is contended for the defendants that where the Legislature intends to confer a power exercisable within the district it says so in direct terms, and consequently, where there is silence as to the district, the inference is that the power is exercisable without as well as within the district. These conflicting arguments, which would have delighted the mediæval schoolmen, are calculated to reduce the matter to a standstill. The right practical method of interpretation is not to sweep every section which is silent as to district into one and the same class, but to consider each of these sections, with its context, separately, with a view to ascertain whether it is or is not intended to be confined to the district.

I do not intend to venture to put a construction on each of the sections where silence is preserved as to the district; I confine myself to saying that I can see no reasons which tend to restrict some of the sections to the particular district, but which would not be applicable to others of the same sort of sections. On the whole, I think that silence as to place affords some ground in this Act for holding that the Legislature did not intend to confine the local authority to its own particular district. Continuing the examination of the 131st section, I find the term "district" occurs twice. The hospital which the local authority may provide is "for the use of the inhabitants of their district," and the agreement which they are authorized to enter into is for the reception "of the sick inhabitants of their district." The attention of the Legislature was, therefore, directed in the section itself to the district of the local authority; yet the section does not in terms confine the local authority to its own district as to place when the hospital or other accommodation for the sick is to be provided. Again, for the purpose of providing a hospital or temporary place for the reception of the sick, the local authority are empowered—(a) "to contract for the use of any such hospital or part of a hospital or place of reception" and (b) "to enter into any agreement with any person having the management of any hospital for the reception of the sick inhabitants of their district." "Any such hospital" and "any hospital" in these clauses mean, primâ facie, any hospital for the sick anywhere, and I can find no sufficient reason for saying that the hospital or place of reception in respect of which the local authority may enter into a contract or agreement must be confined to a hospital or place of reception within the district of the local authority. On the other hand, I see reasons for holding that the primâ facie meaning is the right one. A local authority, not having provided a hospital of its own, purposes to enter into an agreement with persons having the management of a hospital outside its own district for the reception of its sick inhabitants; the local authority may be a rural sanitary authority having but few sick. It seems reasonable and convenient that they should be at liberty to send their sick to any hospital, wherever situate. Why should the local authority within which the hospital happens to be situate, and which authority has, as already shown, no power to interfere with the hospital as such, have a special veto as to the sick to be brought there, simply because the sick are sent by another local authority? And, what is more strange, a veto only in the case of the sick being sent by the local authority of an adjoining district. If the plaintiffs are right no local authority can contract to send their sick to a seaside convalescent home out of their own district. I can find no sufficient ground for saying they cannot. The evidence affords a curious illustration of the effect of the plaintiffs' contention.

The plaintiffs, under an agreement they have come to with the managers of the Monsall Hospital, are sending their sick to that hospital, which is situated within the district of the defendants; yet, if their contention is right, the agreement is of no effect and they are not justified in sending their sick to the Monsall Hospital unless they first obtain the consent of the defendants. The provisions of section 131 are not severable; the hospital to be provided is for the sick, without any distinction as to the nature of the sickness, whether it be infectious or not; and the powers to provide a hospital or temporary place for the reception of the sick must, one and all, either be confined to the district or must, one and all, without distinction, be exercisable without regard to place. The test to ascertain whether the powers are severable is to try and read the sections, inserting the limitation of place as to some of the provisions and omitting such limitation as to others. I invited the plaintiffs' counsel so to write out the section, and, after some attempts, he rightly admitted that it was impossible. No distinction, then, can be maintained between the cases of the local authority providing the hospital (a) by themselves building it, (b) by contracting for the use of a hospital belonging to others, or (c) by entering into an agreement with persons having the management of a hospital.

One other observation remains to be made on section 131. It concludes with a provision empowering any two or more local authorities to combine in providing a common hospital. This power of combining is not confined to adjoining districts, but is general, and the place where the common hospital is to be situate is not specified. For these reasons I think that section 131 must be read as it stands, and that, in the exercise of the powers thereby conferred, local authorities are not confined to their own districts.

I have already to some extent necessarily dealt with section 285. In my opinion it does not apply to section 131. It is not a negative, but an affirmative section. It occurs in an entirely distinct part of the Act. The Act is divided into parts, and under such parts sections are grouped together under distinct headings. Section 131 occurs in "Part 3, Sanitary Provisions," which embraces sections 13 to 143, both inclusive. Section 131 is grouped with sections 132 and 133 under the heading of "Hospitals." Section 285 occurs in "Part 8, Alteration of Areas and Union of Districts," which embraces sections 270 to 292 both inclusive. Section 285 is found with other sections under the heading of "Union of Districts." One would hardly expect to find a limitation in section 131 in so different a part of the Act. Section 131, with its special power for authorities to combine for the purpose of providing a common hospital, seems not to require any supplementary provision. But I admit that in so complex an Act of Parliament as this is, observations on the particular place where provisions are found are not of any great weight.

The plaintiffs' argument rested on the first sentence of section 285, which runs thus: "Any local authority may, with the consent of the local authority of any adjoining district, execute and do in such adjoining district all or any of such works and things as they may execute and do within their own district, and on such terms as to payment or otherwise as may be agreed on between them and the local authority of the adjoining district." The section then proceeds thus:—"Moreover, two or more local authorities may combine together for the purpose of executing and maintaining any works that may be for the benefit of their respective districts or any part thereof." The plaintiffs asked me to read the words "execute and do within their own district" as applying to the cases where the power is confined by implication or just construction to the district of the authority purposing to execute it, and consequently as including section 131, inasmuch as that section is, as they say, confined to the local authority's own district. But I have declined so to read section 131, and I think section 285 was not intended to limit the powers conferred by section 131. Again, the plaintiffs' contention would restrict what I may term the hospital powers exclusively to the district of the local authority providing the hospital and the adjoining districts. I think that such a construction of the Act is too narrow. The powers of a local authority to acquire land by agreement are not confined to land within their own district. (See section 175.) Suppose a local authority desires to acquire a site for a hospital on some open moor near their own district, but separated from it for a short distance by an intervening district adjoining their own. The land may be bought without the consent of the local authority within whose district it lies; but no hospital can be provided there if the plaintiffs are right, because the requisite statutory consent cannot possibly be given. The only body that can give the statutory consent is the local authority of an adjoining district, but in the case supposed the hospital would not be within any district; and the consent of the local authority within whose district the hospital would be situate would be of no avail. It would be absurd to suggest that the consent of the local authority of an adjoining district to the establishment of a hospital within another non-adjoining district would satisfy the statute. The plaintiffs' counsel pressed for an exhaustive definition of the "works and things" intended to be included within the first part of the 285th section. I am not bound to do that which the Legislature has not done, and I decline to frame any such definition. It is obvious that there are many works and things to which the section would readily apply without including a hospital and without drawing in the 131st section. I am content to say that, in my opinion, the building and providing of a hospital by a local authority on their own ground in an adjoining district are not the kind of works and things to which the 285th section was intended to apply.

The result is that I hold that the plaintiffs have failed in their contention on the point raised under sections 131 and 285 of the Public Health Act, 1875. I refuse the injunction, and make no order except that costs be costs in the action.

Injunction refused.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Gully, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellants, used similar arguments to those advanced in the court below.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Byrne, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Chitty, J., refusing to restrain the Corporation of Manchester from erecting a smallpox hospital on land of their own in a district of which the Withington Local Board of Health is the urban sanitary authority. The judgment of Chitty, J., has been read, and I confess I feel very great difficulty in improving upon it. It appears to me to be right from beginning to end upon every point. But there are one or two observations I will make with reference to the arguments which have been addressed to us.

First of all, let us consider who the plaintiffs are, and what they must prove in order to entitle them to any relief in this action. They are the urban sanitary authority of the district which has been called the Withington District, which is near Manchester. They have certain statutory rights and statutory duties, and unless their statutory rights are infringed, or they are prevented from performing their statutory duties, they have no right to complain at all. That is their position. The position of the defendants is that they are a municipal corporation having some land (about 100 acres) in the district of which the plaintiffs are the urban sanitary authority, and what the defendants are proposing to do is to build a hospital on their own land.

Now let us consider upon what ground the plaintiffs can interfere with them or prevent them from doing that. I put out of sight the broad ground that the hospital will be a public nuisance, because that question does not arise in this action. That will arise in the other action which we are told is pending, which is in the form, I understand, of an action by the Attorney-General. Therefore I leave that out of the question, and say nothing at all about it as to whether it will or will not be a public nuisance. Apart from that the plaintiffs are driven to rely upon certain sections in the Public Health Act of 1875, and they rely, first of all, on section 112, which is the "noxious trade" section.

Now before I make any observations upon that particular section and upon the decisions which have already been given upon it, explaining the meaning of it, I must point out that the word "hospital" does not occur in the section at all, and that "hospitals and noxious diseases" are specially mentioned, and specially provided for, in another group of sections, beginning with section 120—the very next group but one. It would, therefore, be rather strange if one were to find language in section 112—general language—of such a kind as to relate to hospitals, which are specifically mentioned and dealt with in another part of the Act, and to my mind that observation is extremely cogent. It is an observation which I could not notice in the judgment of Chitty, J., but it is one which to my mind is very strong indeed. Bearing that in mind when we are asked to say that a hospital is a noxious or offensive trade, business, or manufacture—leave out manufacture and leave out trade—noxious or offensive business within section 112, my answer is, primâ facie it is not, because you find other provisions specially addressed to that very thing, hospitals, and you do not want this section in order to deal with them. When we look at the words of section 112, such as "blood boiler, bone boiler, fellmonger, soap boiler, tallow melter, tripe boiler," and these other words "other noxious or offensive trade, business, or manufacture," and when you bear in mind that those words have been construed already so as not to include businesses which may or may not be noxious, the conclusion at which I have arrived is clear and strong, that, even assuming that a hospital may be made out to be a noxious business, it is not a noxious business to which section 112 has any application at all, but it is a thing to be dealt with under the other group of sections which relate specifically to hospitals and infectious diseases.

That is the short answer to the first contention of the plaintiffs that they are entitled to prevent the defendants from erecting a hospital in the plaintiffs' district without their consent. Section 112, to my mind, has nothing whatever to do with it.

The next point raised is that, under sections 131 and 285 combined, the plaintiffs are entitled to say to the Corporation of Manchester, "You cannot erect this hospital upon this piece of ground without our consent." Let us see how this matter stands. First of all, let us assume that the Manchester Corporation, having got this piece of land, which is their own property, have got funds applicable to the erection of a hospital for smallpox patients. Assume that for a moment. Assume that they have got funds to which the Public Health Act has no relation at all. Can you spell out of the Public Health Act any prohibition against the Manchester Corporation building a hospital upon their own land? There, again, I say it is utterly impossible. I have gone through the sections; I am not going to go through them in detail; it has been very skilfully done by Mr. Gully, and partly by Mr. Clare, and exhaustively by the learned judge in the court below, and after spelling through those forty or fifty sections the result is a negative one: that you cannot get out of them anything like a prohibition which prevents the owner of land from building a hospital upon it. But it is put in another way. It is said, "Well, but the Corporation of Manchester are going to build this hospital out of rates, which they have no power to raise except under the Public Health Act, and therefore the Public Health Act is to be drawn in, and must be drawn in, to warrant them in doing what they are about to do." I suppose that is so. Let us look for a moment at section 131 and see whether it is possible to put upon that section the limited construction contained in that argument that will include the Corporation of Manchester. The words are: "May provide for the use of the inhabitants of their district hospitals or temporary places for the reception of the sick, and for that purpose may" do these four things: they may "themselves build such hospitals or places of reception"—no limitation as to place, none whatever; "or contract for the use of any such hospital or part of a hospital or place of reception"—no limitation as to place; "or enter into any agreement with any person having the management of any hospital, for the reception of the sick inhabitants of their district, on payment of such annual or other sum as may be agreed on"—no limitation as to place; or "two or more local authorities may combine in providing a common hospital"—no limitation as to space there either. I think it is perfectly impossible to read that section and get out of it any implied prohibition against building the hospital, or contracting for the use of a hospital, or entering into any agreement with anybody having the management of a hospital, out of the district of a particular local board. Of course, if they cannot get it without exercising compulsory powers, and so on, that is quite another matter; but that is not the case with which we have to do.

Then reliance is placed upon another section—285. The observations made by Chitty, J., upon sections 131 and 285 cannot, in my opinion, be improved upon. He notices what is worthy of attention—that they occur in totally different parts of the Act of Parliament—and the argument based upon section 285 really breaks down when you observe that it is confined to adjoining districts and does not extend to districts which do not adjoin. It appears to me, any argument based upon that section for the purpose of getting out of it a prohibition such as is wanted by the appellants cannot be supported. I cannot, upon this point, add anything to what the learned judge has said; it appears to me when the appellants base their case (as in this action they do) upon the sections of the Public Health Act they hopelessly fail.

Then, that being so, we need not discuss the convenience or inconvenience. They have no right to their injunction: that is the short answer to their appeal, and I think it must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of Chitty, J. In point of fact, if I may say so, I think it is an admirable judgment, and I can add nothing to it.

But there is one observation I should like to make with regard to section 112. If I had been called upon to interpret that section, I should have come to the conclusion, independently of any other sections of the Act, that it had no application to hospitals of this kind. I think the words "any other noxious or offensive trade, business or manufacture" must be read as contemplating something ejusdem generis with those things preceding those words. I am clearly of opinion that a hospital is not an analogous kind of business. Assuming it to be a business, as I do, and assuming it, for the purpose of what I am now upon, to be noxious, I think it is not an analogous business with any of those mentioned, and on that ground I should have held it did not come within section 112.

But when I look at the next heading—"Infectious Diseases and Hospitals"—beginning at section 120, and find that hospitals and things connected with hospitals are specially dealt with under that heading, and in sections which follow that heading, I am very much confirmed in the view which I have already expressed with regard to the true interpretation to be put upon section 112. It seems inconceivable that the Legislature intended hospitals to have been included in the enumeration of noxious businesses mentioned in section 112, when we find the Legislature immediately afterwards in express terms dealing with those very businesses. I do not desire to say anything with regard to section 131 and section 285, because I entirely agree with every word in regard to the true interpretation to be put upon those sections that was uttered in the court below by Chitty, J.

In regard to the matter of convenience—the balance of convenience—that is a question which has not to be considered, because we are here dealing with the construction to be put upon an Act of Parliament.

Shortly I say this: that I find nothing in the Public Health Act of 1875 which prohibits the defendants from erecting a hospital on their own ground.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree, and should add nothing except from a motive of respect to the able and admirable arguments. There are several that were put to us as to which I feel respectfully bound to say a few words, and also upon one part of the case.

I agree entirely with the result at which the learned judge in the court below has arrived, and I think it may be put upon ground rather stronger than the reasons for which he arrived at his conclusion.

A good deal has been said in course of the argument in this case about the nuisance, and annoyance, and possible injury to the neighbourhood. I agree that much of that was said in order to make out that this was a noxious business; except for that purpose no argument of that kind can possibly be used in this particular case. In this case the Local Board of Withington say, "You have no right to erect this hospital upon your own ground which is within our district without our consent." That depends entirely upon the construction of this Act of Parliament, about which so much argument has been addressed to us—the Public Health Act. It is a question of the construction of that Act of Parliament. I agree this is a motion for an interlocutory injunction, but the plaintiffs, who come and say, "Our consent is requisite before you can build this hospital upon your own land," are bound to make that out as the first step to the relief which they ask, and unless they make that out, their case falls necessarily; no question of convenience or inconvenience arises in a matter of this kind. The question is simply, Aye or No, is that the meaning of this Act of Parliament? Does it make the consent of the Withington Local Board requisite before the Manchester Corporation can make this use of their own land within the Withington district?

Now on section 112 I confess that my opinion has wavered a good deal during the argument. First of all I was rather inclined to doubt whether you could call this a business at all, and whether, if it was a business, it was a noxious business; but the real question is: Even if it can be considered a business, and even if it can be considered a noxious business, does it come within that section? I have come to the conclusion that, even if you could consider the carrying on of a smallpox hospital to be a noxious business, it is not one of the noxious businesses to which section 112 is addressed, and for this simple reason. I think it is difficult to say that it is not a business, and probably a business within the meaning of the word as used in that section, because, as Mr. Clare particularly pointed out in his most ingenious argument, if it were carried on for the purpose of profit by an individual, as it might be, like the numerous private surgical hospitals in London, it certainly would be a business then. A thing or an operation is not made into a business because it is carried on for the purpose of a profit; otherwise you might say, if it does not produce profit it is not a business, which would be ridiculous. Therefore, primâ facie, it seems to me it is made out to be a business.

Then upon the other question: Is it noxious or not noxious? I confess I think a great deal may be said in favour of the view that it is noxious per se, that the establishment of a smallpox hospital, which is one of the most infectious diseases known, and which generally does produce an increase of smallpox cases in the neighbourhood of the hospital by some means or other (the means not being quite thoroughly recognized even by medical authority) is establishing a business which, in one sense of the word, is of a noxious kind.

But, then, is it a noxious business within the meaning of this section? The section is one of a group which is headed with the words "Offensive Trades." Then it goes on to particularize certain trades which certainly are as unlike the carrying on of a hospital as could possibly be imagined, and it contains, no doubt, the words at the end of the enumeration of the particular trades, "any other noxious or offensive trade, business or manufacture." You have got the word "business" there put in between the words "trade" and "manufacture," undoubtedly meaning that that section is to apply to what are ordinarily called trades, businesses, or manufactures; and it gives the local authority a power of veto over the establishment or commencement of a trade, business, or manufacture which is noxious or offensive. I agree that it would be possible to construe that section as including within the word "business," and possibly —I do not say more—within the word "noxious" also, the establishment of a smallpox hospital, if you do not look to the rest of the Act of Parliament. But the very next group of sections, the one beginning with section 120, is headed "Infectious Diseases and Hospitals." Then you have a number of sections applying to hospitals distinctly. To my mind it is impossible to read this Act of Parliament so as to include within the group of sections headed "Offensive Trades" the establishment of a hospital, when you find another and separate group of sections actually addressed to hospitals and to infectious diseases—"Infectious Diseases and Hospitals"—which give the urban authority such powers as the Act intended they should have with reference to institutions of that kind. For that reason, which was not so much, I think, insisted upon by Chitty, J., it seems to my mind a conclusive reason for coming to this result—that the proper construction of this Act of Parliament is that a hospital, though it may be a business, and though it may be a noxious business, is not within the provisions of section 112, which require the consent of the district within which the hospital is being erected, before it can be so erected.

So much for that point. On the other point a very ingenious argument was raised upon sections 131 and 285. I really can add nothing to what has been said by the learned judge in the court below, whose argument I follow and agree with entirely, and also with what Lindley, L.J., has said.

I think on both grounds the appeal fails, and it is plain, as I have said, that no consideration of convenience or inconvenience can possibly arise on this discussion if the plaintiffs fail to make out, as I think they have failed, that their consent is necessary before this hospital can be erected upon the land within their district which belongs to the Corporation of Manchester. They have to make that out under the Act of Parliament; and I can see nothing which makes their consent necessary, nothing which gives them a power of veto, and therefore, for this reason, I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

I will only say one word as to another point which has been raised in argument, and that is this. It was suggested that the Manchester Corporation, in building this hospital, were exceeding their own powers. Now with that the Withington Local Board have nothing on earth to do. It is a point which cannot be raised in this action at all. If that is to be raised it must be raised by the Attorney-General in an action properly framed in the nature of an information, and the point must be raised by pleadings and evidence. I understand there are no pleadings and evidence addressed to that point in this case at all. Therefore I think that argument cannot be made use of.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the Withington Local Board, Chester & Co., for Crofton & Craven, Manchester.

Solicitors for the Corporation of Manchester, Austin & Austin, for the Town Clerk, Manchester.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Dec. 1.

In re Corcoran.
Corcoran v. Riddell. (a.)

Will—Contingent bequest to charity—Statute of Mortmain—Investment on mortgage—Discretion of trustees.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees on trust for sale, conversion, and investment, and to stand possessed of the same on trust for his niece for life, with remainder to her issue, and on her decease without issue, on trust to transfer the same or so much thereof as might by law be so applied for the benefit of a charity. He gave his trustees power to postpone the conversion of his mortgage securities, and also power to invest on real securities. The trustees invested part of the residuary personal estate on mortgage of real estate; and some part of the residuary personal estate, consisting at the decease of the testator of real securities, was left unconverted. Testator's niece died without issue.

Held, that the charity could only take such parts of the residuary estate as at the decease of the testator's niece consisted of pure personalty.

By his will, dated the 14th of August, 1879, James Corcoran appointed his nephew, Edward de Vernon Corcoran, and his niece, Anna Corcoran, and C. J. Johnson executors and trustees thereof, and bequeathed the residue and remainder of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, with full discretionary powers to permit any part of his said residuary personal estate which should at his death consist of mortgages, stocks, funds, shares in public companies, colonial and foreign Government securities, or any other species of investment yielding income, to remain in the same state of investment for such periods as his trustees should think fit; and as to moneys to arise from the sale and conversion of his said residuary personal estate, upon trust to invest the same in their names in or upon the public funds, Government securities of the United Kingdom, real securities in England or Wales, or the bonds, debentures, or debenture stock or guaranteed stock or shares of any railway or dock company in England authorized by special Act of Parliament and at the time of the investments therein respectively paying dividends, with power for his trustees to vary such investments; and upon further trust to permit his said niece Anna Corcoran to receive the income of his said residuary personal estate and of the investments thereof, and after her death to hold the said principal in trust for her issue. But if no object of the last preceding trust should acquire an absolute vested interest in the said trust funds, then on trust, upon the death of his niece, the said Anna Corcoran, to pay, assign, and transfer his said residuary personal estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities whereon the same might be invested, or so much or such parts thereof as might by law be so applied, unto the Roman Catholic bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of Northampton for the time being, his then vicar-general, and the Roman Catholic priest who should be then in charge of the Roman Catholic mission at Bedford, who should hold and apply the same as part of the general funds of the said Roman Catholic diocese of Northampton. And the testator declared that if his said nephew Edward de V. Corcoran should purchase the Angel Hotel, Wellingborough, and the Rose Inn at Bedford, or either of them, his executors and trustees should lend to him out of his residuary personal estate the amount of the purchase-moneys thereof at the rate of £3 per cent. per annum.

(a.) Reported by J. Arthur Price, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said James Corcoran died on the 22nd of August, 1879, and his will was proved by his said executors on October 14, 1879.

Edward de Verdon Corcoran, after the death of James Corcoran, purchased the Angel Hotel, Wellingborough, for the sum of £2,400, and the trustees of the will advanced to him the sum of £1,200 upon the security of a mortgage of the said hotel premises. Anna Corcoran died on February 20, 1892, without ever having married. Of the testator's estate, which at his death consisted chiefly of pure personalty, £2,175 had been advanced by the trustees on mortgages, and other investments represented impure personalty.

A summons was taken out by the trustees of the will to determine whether the whole of the residuary estate of the testator, or, if not, what part of the stocks, funds, and securities representing the same, passed on the death of Anna Corcoran, the tenant for life, to the Right Rev. Arthur Riddell, Roman Catholic Bishop of Northampton, the Very Rev. Canon Scott, his vicar-general, and the Rev. R. C. Middleton, priest in charge of the Roman Catholic Mission at Bedford, who, together with Martin and Maria Lynch, the testator's next of kin, were made defendants to the summons.

Macnaghten, for the trustees, stated the facts.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Butcher, for the Roman Catholic charity.—The general rule is that the date of the testator's death is the proper time to ascertain what part of his estate consisted of pure and what of impure personalty. The words of the will are not sufficient to prevent its application. What at the testator's death was pure personalty must pass to the charity. The testator's intention cannot be defeated by the action of the trustees. [NORTH, J.—Do you say that if the testator had directed his trustees to invest his pure personalty on mortgage of freehold land the charity could have taken?] No; but we contend that this is not the case. Charity trustees are, however, authorized by statute to invest on mortgage securities, although they cannot foreclose: 33 & 34 Vict. c. 32. The trustees had no right to defeat the testator's intention in any case. [NORTH, J.—Does not the testator authorize them to advance money on the mortgage of the two inns?] No. He authorizes them to lend money. [NORTH, J.—Without security?] He only intended that they should take personal security. The £1,200 secured on mortgage of the Angel Inn was pure personalty at the death of the testator, and as such it ought to go to his residuary legatees, the Roman Catholic charity.

Sir Arthur Watson, Q.C., and Warrington, for the next of kin.—All such investments, whether made by the testator or the trustees acting in their discretion, that savour of the realty belong to the next of kin. Especially is this true of the money advanced on mortgage by the testator's direction to his nephew. The trustees had an absolute discretion and they acted bonâ fide. [They referred to Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen, 224.] The express trust in the testator's will is that the whole of his residuary personal estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities whereon the same might be invested, or so much and such parts thereof as might by law be so applied, should be transferred to the charity. This certainly must exclude all impure personalty. The express direction to the trustees to advance the purchase-money to his nephew was necessary, because his nephew was a trustee of his will. There is, however, no direction in the will permitting the trustees to advance the purchase-money to him merely on his personal security.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—I think that the real securities existing at the date of the death of the tenant for life cannot be transferred to the three charitable trustees named in the will. The language of the testator's will is: "Upon the death of my niece shall transfer my residuary personal estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities whereon the same may be then invested, or so much and such parts thereof as may by law be so applied, unto" the three persons. Now, supposing that all his personal estate had been pure personal estate, the direction is that it is to be invested, and after the death of the tenant for life to be transferred to these persons. The investment is made, in part, upon a mortgage. I do not think that can be transferred. If the testator had directed that the trustees should take his personal estate and invest it in the purchase of land and transfer that to the charitable trustees, it is conceded that that could not have been done. If it had been, instead of purchasing, to invest it on mortgage of real estate and transfer the mortgage to the trustees, it is again admitted, and clearly settled by authority, that that could not have been done. Then supposing it had been this: "I give my pure personal estate to trustees upon trust to invest it as they please on the purchase or mortgage of land, or on pure personal security, and transfer the property so acquired to trustees." In that case, in my opinion, the trustees would have had a discretion to exercise which might have the effect of enabling it to go to the trustees of the charity, or might have prevented it from going to the trustees of the charity, and if they had exercised their power bonâ fide in the exercise of their discretion, the charity trustees would or would not have taken according to the result. In a case of that sort it might be rather difficult to say whether the trustees had exercised a discretion bonâ fide or not, because they had only one thing to look to—viz., where the fund was going.

In the present case there is a tenancy for life, and it is with reference to the tenant for life, and, after the death of the tenant for life, for the benefit of her children, if any, that the discretion is to be exercised, and it is only after the death of the tenant for life and failure altogether of her children that the charities take at all. Under the circumstances the trustees did in the exercise of their discretion invest part of the pure personalty upon a mortgage of real estate. Can, in the events that have happened, the trustees of the charity ask to have the mortgage transferred to them? In my opinion they cannot do so. They can only claim under the will. The testator gives the property existing at the death of the tenant for life without issue, and that property must be dealt with according to the state in which it is then found, under the terms of the will. The will says: "The residuary personal estate and the stocks, funds, and securities wherein the same may be then invested or so much or such parts thereof as may by law be so applied." The direction therefore is that the then investments are to be transferred. In my opinion it makes no difference as regards the power of the testator whether he directs a mortgage security to be transferred upon the death or whether he directs his pure personalty to be invested on a mortgage and the mortgage to be transferred, or, thirdly, whether he directs the pure personalty to be invested on a mortgage and held for the benefit of the tenant for life, and after the death of the tenant for life to be transferred, or, fourthly, whether he gives a discretion to the trustees as to what the investment should be, when that discretion is bonâ fide exercised by them in the acquisition of a mortgage security. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the only claim the charity can make in this case under the express direction in the testator's will is that, having regard to the events which have happened, a mortgage security should be transferred to them, and that in my opinion cannot be granted, having regard to the statute bearing upon the subject. I do not think that the statute referred to, authorizing charity trustees to invest on mortgage, really has any application here. That statute doubtless gives them power to invest money that is clearly and admittedly the money of a charity, upon mortgage security, taking care that the evil intended to be avoided by the Mortmain Acts, namely, the acquisition by a charity of land, shall be avoided in that particular case by the restriction that they shall never be able to foreclose. I do not think that applies here as regards the final clause.

Solicitors, Crossman & Prichard, for H. Tebbs, Bedford; Speechly, Mumford, & Co., for Whyley & Piper, Bedford.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Jan. 12, 13; Feb. 14.

In re BOROUGH COMMERCIAL AND BUILDING SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Unlimited liability—Reduction of capital—Memorandum and articles—Clause in articles giving right of withdrawal.

An unlimited company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, with the object (as stated in the memorandum) of, among other things, lending money to its members. The articles provided that the capital of the company should not be of any fixed nominal amount, that every person should be deemed to be a member who became possessed of a share, and that any member desirous of withdrawing before his share or shares were fully paid should give notice to the company, and, if the committee allowed his withdrawal, he might, on payment of all moneys due to the company, receive back his subscription according to a scale. The company went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator took out a summons to make members withdrawing in accordance with the memorandum and articles of the company declared liable for calls on shares they had held.

Held, that, according to the observations of Lord Herschell in Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409, there was a distinction between a limited and an unlimited company with respect to the validity of a clause of withdrawal like the above, and that persons who had withdrawn from membership in pursuance of such clause were under no liability in the winding up.

Summons.

The above-named company was incorporated in 1883, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, with unlimited liability.

By the memorandum of association (clause 3) the objects for which the company was established were the following:—

"(a) To accumulate capital by means of monthly subscriptions from members, and also to raise funds by borrowing money from members or other persons or companies, on such security and on such terms as the committee may deem conducive to the interests of the company.

"(b) To advance or lend any portion of the said capital or funds to members or other persons on the security of real or personal property, bills of exchange, bills of sale, promissory notes, machinery, stock-in-trade, and such other security as the committee may deem sufficient.

"(c) To purchase or otherwise acquire any land or buildings on any tenure, and any other kind of property, whether on land or sea, in the United Kingdom, the British colonies, or in any foreign country, and to sell, mortgage, let, work, develop, or otherwise dispose of the same, or any part thereof.

"(d) To receive money on deposit from members or other persons or companies, at such rate of interest or on such terms as may be agreed upon, and to issue debenture bonds or other securities based upon any of the real or personal property of the company; and

"(e) To do all such other things as may be incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them."

The articles of association, so far as is material for the purposes of this report, provided as follows:—

(2) The capital of the society shall not be of any fixed nominal amount, and shall be divided into shares of the ultimate value of £50 each. The shares shall be paid up by contributions of 10s. per month for each share taken up, and all contributions and other moneys shall be paid at the registered office of the society. . . .

(3) Every person shall be deemed to be a member of the society who shall become possessed of a share either by original allotment, transfer, or transmission, and upon his name being entered on the register of members of the society.

(9) Any member desirous of withdrawing from the society before his share or shares are fully paid shall give one calendar month's notice in writing to the secretary, and if the committee allow his withdrawal he may, on payment of all fines or other moneys due to the society, receive back his subscriptions according to the following scale, or such other terms as the committee may decide:—Withdrawal during first year of membership for every £1, 18s.; withdrawal during second or third year of membership for every £1 paid, 19s.; withdrawal during fourth or any subsequent year of membership for every £1 paid, 19s. 6d.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(39) Any member wishing to receive an advance from the society shall apply to the committee, and state the security he proposes for the loan, and the committee shall decide whether the loan be made on the security offered, and shall cause all such inquiries and arrangements to be made, and do all things in and about the matter which they may think necessary. All loans shall bear interest at £5 per cent. per annum, such interest to be paid monthly along with the subscription, and in calculating such interest the monthly subscriptions from time to time paid by the borrower are not to be taken as reducing the amount of the loan. Any member may, subject to these articles, receive a loan from the society equal to the amount he has paid into the society, subject to the former part of this article, on his giving his own promissory note for the amount, such note to carry interest at £5 per cent. per annum. All the costs and expenses of or in any way connected with the giving or taking any security as aforesaid shall be paid by the borrower. All promissory notes, receipts, or other securities shall be attested by the secretary or his deputy, or by a member of the committee or a solicitor.

Messrs. Lunn, Sellars, and Wood became members of the society, and after they had become members they became borrowers, and before the voluntary winding up hereafter mentioned, had paid off the loans made to them by the society. The facts were complicated, but it appeared that in practice the society never lent to persons who were not members except in the case of kindred societies, and that after the payments made by Lunn, Sellars, and Wood, the society ceased to treat them as members.

The company went into voluntary liquidation and the liquidator put Lunn, Sellars, and Wood on the list of contributories, and now took out this summons in the winding up calling on them to show cause why they should not pay the amounts set against their names in the schedule to the summons, which were sums alleged to be due from them in respect of calls. Sellars did not appear.

Farwell, Q.C., and Davenport, for the summons.—The clause in the articles giving the members a right of withdrawal is ultrà vires and inconsistent with the Companies Acts, and is a reduction of capital in a manner different from that required by those Acts: Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409.

R. W. Harper, for Wood.—Trevor v. Whitworth only relates to a company with limited liability, as is clear from the judgment of Lord Herschell, who expressly distinguishes unlimited from limited companies.

Leverson, for Lunn.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

Some further facts and arguments are stated in the judgment.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I find as a fact that the intention of the society, with regard both to Lunn and Sellars and Wood, was to accept the total sums paid by them in full satisfaction of all claims by the society, and that the society further intended that on such payments being made these persons should be treated as withdrawing from membership. The intention of the society in its general practice was that any person holding shares only for the purpose of obtaining a loan should, on paying off such loan and any other moneys then due to the society, ipso facto cease to be a member thereof. That was the idea of those who had the conduct of the society, and I think that, if anyone had asked any officer of the society before the winding up whether persons paying off their loans continued to be members, the answer would have been "No." The society carried on a business of making loans, and those who had borrowed were treated, on making payment, as having withdrawn from membership. The result would be that if in law the society was competent so to deal with its members, the persons so dealt with would in law cease to be members, and, in case of a winding up, would not be liable to be placed on the list of contributories. The question remains whether it was competent for the officers of the society so to deal with its members. If the company had been one with a limited liability, then, according to the decision of the House of Lords in Trevor v. Whitworth, no such arrangement would have discharged these persons. When I say that no such payment would have freed the members, I feel that I am attempting to compare things which it is perhaps impossible to compare, for in a limited company, if there had been a £50 share, the payment of £50 by the holder would pay off the amount of his liability, and it is difficult to put the hypothesis to one's mind of liability continuing after payment of the £50. But I have cited the case to show that I am not overlooking the fact that it was there laid down that a member of a limited company could not get rid of his liability otherwise than by payment or by means of a forfeiture, and not always then.

It seems that Trevor v. Whitworth is a useful authority in the present case, rather for the observations made by Lord Herschell than for other purposes. Lord Herschell said: "I will first consider the question apart from authority, and then examine the decisions relied on. The Companies Act, 1862, requires (section 8) that in the case of a company where the liability of the shareholders is limited, the memorandum shall contain the amount of the capital with which the company proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount; and provides (section 12) that such a company may increase its capital and divide it into shares of larger amount than the existing shares, or convert its paid-up shares into stock, but that, 'save as aforesaid, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association.' What is the meaning of the distinction thus drawn between a company without limit on the liability of its members and a company where the liability is limited, but in the latter case to assure to those dealing with the company that the whole of the subscribed capital, unless diminished by expenditure upon the objects defined by the memorandum, shall remain available for the discharge of its liabilities? The capital may, no doubt, be diminished by expenditure upon, and reasonably incidental to, all the objects specified. A part of it may be lost in carrying on the business operations authorized. Of this all persons trusting the company are aware, and take the risk. But I think they have a right to rely, and were intended by the Legislature to have a right to rely, on the capital remaining undiminished by any expenditure outside these limits, or by the return of any part of it to the shareholders."

It is remarkable that Lord Herschell said this of a limited company, and pointed out that there was in this respect a distinction between a limited and an unlimited company. I am therefore of opinion that in the view of Lord Herschell, as expressed in those observations—I do not say it was a judgment, but it was Lord Herschell's view—that these matters mentioned there as distinguishing a company limited from a company unlimited do not apply to a company unlimited. I am therefore of opinion, after having carefully looked through the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, that there is nothing to prevent a company unlimited from providing by its memorandum and articles for a return of capital to the members of the partnership, or for the withdrawal of members from the company. I do not say that if you had a company unlimited, with no fixed amount of capital, in the absence of any provisions for withdrawal of members, the officers of the company could arrange with a member for his withdrawal so as to discharge him from liability to creditors in the event of a liquidation. There was a great deal in the argument of Mr. Farwell that it never could have been intended by the Legislature that the law should be in such a condition that, whenever the affairs of a company seemed to be in an unfavourable condition, the more solvent shareholders should be in a position to go to the insolvent shareholders, who had nothing to lose, and say, "Pass a resolution consenting to our withdrawal, and then the liquidation may follow and the creditors may get what they can, and we shall escape from our liability." That would be an unsatisfactory state of the law, and I doubt whether such a withdrawal would be of any validity against creditors. But I have not to decide that question, and do not decide it. All I say is that there is nothing in the words or in the spirit of the Acts of Parliament which prevent an unlimited company being associated on the terms that members may withdraw in the mode provided by the particular memorandum or articles. It seems if one limits the matter in that way the creditors have nothing to complain of. They could look at the articles and see that a member could withdraw by doing particular acts. If a large number of members were to withdraw by taking advantage of those articles, the creditors, with notice of the rules, would have nothing to complain of. So I arrive at the conclusion that, notwithstanding Trevor v. Whitworth, it is possible to have an unlimited company so formed that withdrawal of members may be made in accordance with the memorandum and articles, and that there is no wrong to the creditors in giving effect to a memorandum and articles so drawn. By the very force of the terms it is plain that in the case of an unlimited company the creditors know that there is no fixed capital, and therefore they have no right to complain of a reduction of that which had never been fixed in any way.

Taking this view, the next matter I have to deal with is the question whether the rules of this society provide for the withdrawal of members, and whether these members availed themselves of these provisions and have withdrawn. The plain meaning of the memorandum and articles is that, in respect of shares taken for the purpose of enabling those who took them to borrow money from the society, as soon as the loan had been discharged the membership in respect of those shares came to an end, and the members were ipso facto withdrawing members. That was the view taken by the society's officers. As soon as the loan was paid off the society ceased to send to members who had paid off notices of the transactions of the society, whereas, if the view of the liquidator is accurate, a member who had paid off would have the deepest interest in knowing how the society was going on. Article 9 deals with an indulgence which might be granted to those who had not paid up their shares by allowing them nevertheless to withdraw. If Trevor v. Whitworth applies, that claim would be ultra vires. But, having regard to the fact that this is an unlimited company, that decision does not apply. If this conclusion is wrong, a member in default could withdraw, whereas a member not in default could not withdraw. It must be remembered that this society was not formed to make a money profit or for the distribution of its earnings amongst its members, but for their mutual advantage. When a member had obtained his advantage and had paid for it, it was only consistent that the society should have its rules so framed that such a member should be allowed to withdraw.

Under the circumstances I come to the conclusion that those who had fully paid their shares were intended by the rules of the society to cease to be members. The object was effected, their liability discharged, and they were no longer to be members unless their liability was pledged to the creditors. Though their liability would be so pledged in the case of a limited company, in a case like this the credit of the members is in no way pledged, and they are not liable as contributories. The summons must be dismissed as against Wood and Lunn, with costs, but the liquidator will be allowed to pay such costs and his own costs out of the assets of the company.

Solicitors, Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet, for G. G. Fisher, Huddersfield; Ramsden, Radcliffe, & Co., for Sykes & Ramsden, Huddersfield; Crossman & Prichard, for J. Sykes & Son, Huddersfield.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) Feb. 1.

BELTON v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compulsory purchase—Compensation—Reversionary interest in licensed premises—Admissibility of evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's interest in the premises as licensed premises.

In estimating the amount of compensation under the Lands Clauses Acts to be paid to the reversioner of licensed premises, let on lease with twenty-six years unexpired, required by a public body under compulsory powers, the arbitrator ought to admit evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's reversionary interest in the premises as licensed premises, and need not confine the evidence to the estimated rental value of the premises as a house and shop apart from the question of whether, when the reversion falls in, they would then be licensed premises.

This was a special case stated by an umpire, submitting for the opinion of the court a point of law which had arisen during arbitration proceedings to assess the compensation payable to the claimant in respect of his reversionary interest in certain premises about to be acquired by the county council under compulsory powers. The case was stated as follows:—

1. Under the powers of the Thames Tunnel (Blackwall) Act, 1887, the London County Council (hereinafter called "the council"), as successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works, are authorized to construct a tunnel or subway under the River Thames at Blackwall, with the roads and approaches thereto in such Act described, and for the purposes thereof required to purchase and take certain lands and premises belonging to the said John Belton (hereinafter called "the claimant").

2. The council duly served notice to treat for such lands and premises, and a claim was duly made by the claimant in respect thereof, and subsequently each side duly appointed arbitrators. The arbitrators failed to agree as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the council to the claimant, and duly appointed me to be the umpire to determine the question of such disputed compensation.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3. The premises in question consist of a fully-licensed public-house known as the "Cooper's Arms," High-street, Poplar, and certain houses, shops, workshops, and stabling adjoining. No question of law arises as to any portion of the premises except the public-house.

4. The Cooper's Arms" is a copyhold property, and has been, together with the house adjoining, being No. 311, High-street, Poplar, let by the claimant for a term, of which twenty-six years are unexpired, at the annual rent of £100.

5. When the case was being heard by me counsel for the claimant tendered evidence for the purpose of showing the present market value of the claimant's reversionary interest in the "Cooper's Arms" as it now exists, being licensed as a public-house.

6. Counsel for the council objected to my admitting the evidence in question, upon the ground that the licence was not an element of value attaching to the premises in reversion after twenty six years, and that for the purposes of estimating the reversionary value I must estimate the rental value of the premises as a house and shop apart from the question of whether they would then be licensed premises and requested me to state a case for the opinion of the court, raising the question as to the admissibility of the evidence.

7. I was prepared to admit the evidence, but as counsel for the council protested against such admission, and stated that he was not prepared with evidence upon the point, I consented to state a case for the opinion of the court before admitting the evidence.

8. The question for the opinion of the court is whether I ought to admit evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's reversionary interest in the "Cooper's Arms" as a licensed public-house, or whether, for the purpose of ascertaining the reversionary value, I should confine the evidence to the estimated rental value of the premises as a house and shop, apart from the question of whether, when the reversion falls in, they would then be licensed premises.

Moulton, Q.C. (Freeman with him), for the London County Council.—In assessing the value of this reversionary interest the capabilities of the premises should be included, but not the fact of their application to the particular trade carried on. The evidence here should not go further than showing that these premises are suitable for a licensed trade. It is not everything that raises the value in the market that is a legitimate element for the arbitrator to notice, and certain persons—viz., brewers—would give an unduly large price in the present case. The licence has not been granted in perpetuity; it only gives a temporary value to the house, and ought not to be considered in dealing with the reversioner.

He referred to Wadham v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 33 W. R. 215, 34 Ib. 342, 14 Q. B. D. 747, 16 Ib. 227; Beckett v. Midland Railway Co., 16 W. R. 221, L. R. 3 C. P. 82; Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 15 W. R. 937, L. R. 2 H. L. 175; Metropolitan Board of Works v. McCarthy, 23 W. R. 115, L. R. 7 H. L. 243.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Edward Pollock, for the claimant, were not called upon.

DAY, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the course which the umpire proposed to take was the right one, and that the answer to his question is that he ought to admit evidence to prove the present market value of the claimant's reversionary interest in the "Cooper's Arms" as a licensed public-house, that is, as a public-house which is now licensed. I cannot conceive any other test of value. The argument put forward by Mr. Moulton involves great injustice, and its success would result in public bodies being enabled to obtain property under compulsory powers at less than its fair market value, to obtain it at one price and, if they were sufficiently dishonest, to avail themselves of the opportunity to sell it again at a very much enhanced price. The fair market price of the claimant's interest is what he has a right to have; he ought not to suffer by reason of what are deemed public improvements; he is to get its value as if he had brought it into the market and sold it at public auction. The umpire proposed to receive evidence to ascertain what this property was worth in the market such as it is now, and I am clearly of opinion that he was entitled to do so. No sound argument can be brought forward to show that the council are at liberty to take property at less than the fair market value. That is the true test; casual expressions of judges in other cases on other subjects must be read in reference to their subject-matter. In the cases of Wadham v. North-Eastern Railway Co. and Beckett v. Midland Railway Co., to which our attention has been called, the judges were dealing with the question of compensation for injuriously affecting lands under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and no case has been cited to us which would exclude evidence to enable the umpire to find the fair present market value of the property which he is required to assess on its transfer from the owner to the public buyer.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is a strong primâ facie objection to holding that the Legislature intended to deprive the claimant of that which it is admitted would be an important factor if he were ascertaining the present market value of his interest. Mr. Moulton adduced no authority for that proposition; his cases referred to section 68, which deals with injuriously affecting property, and seem to me to bear not in his favour, but against him. In Wadham v. North-Eastern Railway Co. the question was whether depreciation in the special value of the premises as a hotel and public-house could be taken into account under section 68. When the case came before the Court of Appeal a question arose as to whether the proper inferences had been drawn by the court below from the findings as stated by the arbitrator, and the case was sent down to him again. He then found in terms: "I considered that the hotel premises were from their construction and situation specially suitable to be let or sold as premises to be used as a hotel and public-house. I looked at the fact that the premises known as the 'Royal Hotel' were being, and had been for some time, used as a hotel and public-house as part of the evidence that such premises were suitable for being used as a hotel and public-house." In consequence of this report Sir Farrer Herschell for the railway company declined to further argue the case; so that this is a decision of the Court of Appeal that, in dealing with the question of injuriously affecting property under section 68, the arbitrator is not only justified, but is bound to take into consideration evidence that the premises are being used for a particular purpose, and Mr. Moulton admits that the possibility of the premises being used as a public-house may be taken into consideration; but he says that in appraising that possibility you are not to take into consideration the probability, which appears to me to be an absolutely impossible contention. Even upon Mr. Moulton's own authorities then, apart from common sense, it is clear that an element of value which would affect the price of the property in the open market may be taken into consideration, and evidence may be received upon it by the umpire in assessing the compensation to be paid upon compulsory purchase.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the claimant, Young, Jones, & Co.

Solicitor for the county council, Blaxland.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) Jan. 25.

WHITWORTH v. DARBISHIRE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—Joinder of causes of action—Claim against executor as such—Claim against executor for personal wrong—Right to join such claims—Ord. 18, r. 5.

The earlier paragraphs of a statement of claim in an action against executors, alleged that, in consideration of certain services which the plaintiff performed for their testator in his lifetime and at his request, the testator had promised the plaintiff to bequeath him the sum of £5,000, but that the testator had not done so. Then came two paragraphs claiming the same sum in the alternative, as against the defendants personally, on the ground that the defendants had, by undue influence and fraud, induced the testator to break his contract with the plaintiff as to leaving the plaintiff the above sum.

Held, that these two paragraphs, as they showed a cause of action against the defendants in their private capacity, and without any reference to the estate of the testator, could not, under ord. 18, r. 5, be joined with the claim against the executors as such.

Appeal from an order of Wright, J., reversing an order of a master. The master had refused to strike out three paragraphs of a statement of claim, but the learned judge in chambers ordered all three—namely, paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 of the statement of claim—to be struck out, on the ground that they were irrelevant and showed no cause of action beyond that shown in the preceding paragraphs, and that they were therefore useless; also that they could not, under ord. 18, r. 5, be joined with the previous paragraphs of the claim.

The facts, as disclosed in the statement of claim, were as follows:—The plaintiff was an engineer, and the three defendants were the executors and residuary legatees under the will and codicils of the late Sir Joseph Whitworth, who died in 1887. During the lifetime of the late Sir J. Whitworth—namely, from the year 1875 until 1880—the plaintiff was in the employment of Sir J. Whitworth as private secretary, and also assisted him in perfecting and developing certain patents in which Sir J. Whitworth was interested, and also provided materials, constructed models, and made experiments under the direction and at the special request of Sir J. Whitworth, until his death in 1887. Sir J. Whitworth in his lifetime promised the plaintiff that, in consideration of the plaintiff rendering him the services and supplying the materials and doing the work already mentioned, he (Sir J. Whitworth) would, by his will, leave and bequeath to the plaintiff the sum of £5,000. Alternatively, the plaintiff sued the defendants, as executors, for money payable by Sir J. Whitworth on a quantum meruit for work done and materials provided by the plaintiff; and the plaintiff alleged that the defendants as executors had sufficient assets of the testator to pay the debt of the plaintiff, and had not paid it.

Then came paragraph 7, which set out: "That in the further alternative the plaintiff's claim is against all and each of the defendants personally, for that, knowing of the contract between the plaintiff and the late Sir J. Whitworth, they fraudulently and by undue influence, and while the said Sir J. Whitworth was in a state of senile dementia, induced him to make the will and codicils that he purported to make, and of which they are executors, and whereby they practically became possessed of the whole of the property of the late Sir J. Whitworth, no provision in the said will or codicils having been made by the said Sir J. Whitworth for payment to the plaintiff of the agreed sum of £5,000."

Paragraph 8: "By the fraud and undue influence of the defendants in the preceding paragraph set forth the late Sir J. Whitworth was induced to break his said contract with the plaintiff to leave him on death the sum of £5,000."

Paragraph 9: "In the further alternative the plaintiff says that before and at the time of the execution by Sir J. Whitworth of the said will and codicils the defendants knew that the said Sir J. Whitworth had contracted and then intended to bequeath to the plaintiff the said sum of £5,000 as remuneration for the services rendered by the plaintiff to him, and that the said Sir J. Whitworth was desirous that the plaintiff should be paid out of his estate the said sum of £5,000, which is one of the wishes referred to in the fourth codicil to the will, and the plaintiff contends that the defendants took the said residuary estate burdened with a trust in the plaintiff's favour to pay to him thereout the sum of £5,000, and the plaintiff claimed £5,000."

The words of the fourth codicil relied on by the plaintiff to create a trust in his favour were these:—"And I accordingly give to them" (that is, the defendants), "such real and personal estate in equal shares for their own benefit, having full confidence that they will respectively desire to carry out my wishes to the utmost of their power, but nothing in this codicil or in my will shall be construed so as to impose any trust upon my residuary legatees and devisees" (that is, the defendants), "or any of them, or in any manner to abridge or qualify their absolute ownership or rights."

The learned judge at chambers struck out paragraphs 7, 8, and 9; and the plaintiff appealed.

Lionel Hart, for the plaintiff.

Sir C. Russell, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the defendants.

DAY, J.—This is an application by way of appeal from the learned judge at chambers, who has struck out of the statement of claim, paragraphs 7, 8, and 9. The grounds upon which the decision of the learned judge is supported are different with regard to paragraphs 7 and 8 from what they are with regard to paragraph 9. As to paragraphs 7 and 8 the decision of the learned judge is supported on the ground that the cause of action raised in these paragraphs cannot be joined with the other cause of action. As to the 9th paragraph the objection is a different one, and substantially it is that that paragraph is frivolous and that no foundation of any sort is shown for it in point of law.

As to paragraphs 7 and 8, we are both clearly of opinion that they must be struck out of this statement of claim. To my mind they do not come within the rule (ord. 18, r. 5). They are not claims which in any way affect the estate. They do not arise out of the estate at all, but they are causes of action which, if there is any foundation for them, are just as applicable whether the defendants were executors or strangers, whether they derived any benefit under the estate or no benefit at all. They have no bearing on their position as executors, and they are improperly joined with the cause of action previously alleged.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Even if I were of opinion that they came within the terms or spirit of ord. 18, r. 5, I should still not allow them to be joined with the other previous paragraphs as forming one cause of action. I should strike them out and disallow them in the exercise of my discretion, and I should not allow them to be joined with the other cause of action. If we look at the previous paragraphs and paragraphs 7 and 8, these latter are essentially dependent on the establishment of a contract, and if that contract is maintained, then the whole £5,000 would be recoverable, and it is not to be tolerated that such paragraphs should be allowed when they are utterly unnecessary, and when they are based substantially on the same cause of action as the previous paragraphs. Therefore, if I were called upon to exercise a discretion, I should certainly order them to be struck out.

With regard to paragraph 9, I consider that is utterly frivolous. As reference has been made to the fourth codicil, we have looked at it and read it, but it gives no shadow of support to the claim which is based on it. The claim is utterly frivolous, and therefore we disallow the 9th paragraph also.

The result is that we affirm the decision of the learned judge in every particular.

COLLINS, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, P. Collings & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Cookson, Wainewright, & Pennington.

Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. Probate. } Dec. 6, 13.

In the Goods of WRIGHT (DECEASED). (a.)

Probate—Administration—Lost will—Grant until will found—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.

Where it appeared that a will had been duly executed by the testator, but it could not be found after his death, and his widow, who had made a statement to the effect that it had been accidentally destroyed, on being served with a notice to attend and be examined concerning the contents of the will, disobeyed the order, and was believed to have left the country, and it was necessary, for the purpose of selling certain leasehold property valued at between £300 and £400, the court made a grant of letters of administration to the testator's only son, with the consent of the remaining next of kin, limited to the property in question, and without requiring the widow to be cited.

Motion for a grant of administration of the goods and effects of J. T. Wright until his last will should be found.

J. T. Wright, late of 29, Nile-terrace, Bermondsey, died on May 1, 1887, leaving a widow and son, his next of kin and the only persons entitled in distribution, surviving him. J. T. Riches, secretary of a building society, deposed to the fact that he drew a will for the deceased some time in 1886 or 1887, which was duly executed, but he could not remember its contents. The attesting witness also deposed to the attestation.

The value of the estate was between £300 and £400, and consisted of leasehold houses which it was desired to sell, but this could not be done until a personal representative was appointed. J. T. Wright, the son, in his affidavit stated that the widow had told him that the deceased had made a will, but that it had been accidentally destroyed.

On August 12, 1892, an order was served personally on the widow, Mrs. Wright, under section 26 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), directing her to attend and be examined as to her knowledge of the deceased's will. She did not attend, and disappeared, it being supposed that she had left the country.

Dec. 6.—Powles, in support of the application, cited In the Goods of Metcalfe, 1 Add. 343. He asked for the grant under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, to the son of the deceased.

BARNES, J.—The case of Metcalfe was practically a grant ad colligenda. The case of In the Goods of Campbell, 2 Hagg. Eccl. 555, is, however, an authority on which I can act. I am not, however, disposed to make the grant without the consent of the next of kin, and I shall have to consider what form the grant should take.

Dec. 13.—Powles.—An affidavit by Anna Wright, the sister and sole remaining next of kin, consenting to the application, has been filed.

BARNES, J.—Under the circumstances you may take the grant until the will is found, but it must be limited to the property mentioned in the application, and I shall dispense with the necessity of citing the widow.

Solicitors, Maynard & Son.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Aug. 9, 1892.

LORD HENRY BRUCE v. MARQUIS OF AILESBURY. (a.)

Settlement—Settled land—Mansion-house—Sale by tenant for life—Sanction of the court—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 15, 50, 53—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 10 (2).

It is the duty of the court, on an application under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 1890 for permission to sell the mansion-house and lands usually occupied therewith, to consider the interests of the estate itself, in addition to the wishes and interests of the remaindermen.

A young tenant for life under a settlement of an old family estate, who had heavily mortgaged his life interest, and was unable to keep up the establishment, applied for an order sanctioning a proposed sale of the mansion-house and demesne lands for an adequate price. The remaindermen opposed.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, 40 W. R. 243, [1892] 1 Ch. 506), that the sale should be allowed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) reported as In re Ailesbury (Marquis of) Settled Estates, 40 W. R.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

243, [1892] 1 Ch. 506, where the facts are set out at length. They are shortly as follows:—The Ailesbury Estates in Wiltshire and Berkshire, known as the Savernake Estate, were settled upon the present marquis as tenant for life in possession, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to Lord Henry Bruce for life, remainder to his eldest son for life, remainder to the first and other sons of such eldest son in tail male, with divers remainders over, and with an ultimate remainder to the present marquis in fee. The marquis, who was born in 1863, married in 1884, and his wife was still living, but there had been no issue of the marriage. The Savernake Estate comprised over 40,000 acres, and there were ninety-five separate farms upon it, besides about 1,000 cottages and other buildings. The park, pleasure-grounds, and lands usually occupied with the mansion-house comprised over 7,000 acres, and included Savernake Forest. The mansion-house had been the principal residence of the Ailesbury family since 1675. The present marquis had incumbered his life interest to the extent of more than £200,000, and the net income after paying outgoings, jointure, &c., was very small. The mortgagee had commenced an action for foreclosure, and a receiver had been appointed. Bankruptcy proceedings had also been instituted against the marquis, and a receiving order had been made at the suit of other creditors. In these circumstances the marquis had in June, 1891, entered into a contract with Lord Iveagh under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, for the sale to him of the whole of the Savernake Estate, including the mansion-house and the lands usually occupied therewith, for £750,000; £500,000 of the purchase-money to be left upon mortgage for five years at four per cent., the agreement being conditional upon an order of the court being obtained to authorize the sale of the mansion-house, &c. The Marquis of Ailesbury presented a petition before Stirling, J., asking the court to sanction the proposed sale of the mansion-house, &c., and to the arrangement for the £500,000 being left on mortgage. The petition was opposed by Lord Henry Bruce and others. It appeared from the evidence that the price offered was in the opinion of experts a high one for the property, and was considerably enhanced by including the mansion-house and Savernake Forest with the rest of the estate in one sale. The Court of Appeal (reversing Stirling, J.) sanctioned the proposed sale.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Buckley, Q.C. (G. Henderson with them), for the appellants, referred to In re Earl of Radnor's Will Trusts, 45 Ch. D. 402, 416, 39 W. R. Dig. 202; sections 53 and 37 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; section 10 of the Settled Land Act of 1890; and the Settled Estates Acts.

Rigby, Q.C., and Fossett Lock, for the Marquis of Ailesbury, and Sir H. James, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the other respondent, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case your lordships are called upon to consider the exercise of the discretion which has been vested in the court by the Settled Land Act of 1890, s. 10, sub-section (2), which is in these words:—"(2) Nothwithstanding anything contained in the Act of 1882, the principal mansion-house (if any) on any settled land, and the pleasure grounds and park and lands (if any), usually occupied therewith, shall not be sold, exchanged, or leased by the tenant for life without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court." Section 3, sub-section (1), of the Act of 1882, of which the sub-section I have just recited is an amendment, but which adds nothing which is relevant to any dispute between the parties here, gives an absolute power to the tenant for life to sell the settled land.

By section 53 of the Act of 1882 it was enacted that a tenant for life in exercising any power under the Act should have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and should, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties.

Of the 40,000 acres of which the estate now in question consists, it cannot be denied that the tenant for life has, in respect of 33,000 of them at all events, an absolute right to sell. That has not and could not be disputed. The question arises under the restriction as to the mansion-house and the lands, pleasure grounds, and park usually occupied therewith. It scarcely requires argument to show that, if the commercial interest is alone to be considered, the withdrawal from the sale of the mansion-house and the pleasure grounds usually occupied therewith, in this particular case would have a very serious depreciatory effect upon the sale of the remainder. The 7,000 acres by themselves, or the odd 33,000 acres by themselves, would not be likely to realize, if sold separately, the gross sum which would be obtained by selling both as one estate. But the question your lordships have to determine is whether, under the circumstances of this particular case, consent should be given to the sale of the whole.

It cannot be denied that the tenant for life is not in a position to do that which may be compendiously described as "keeping up the estate." If capital expenditure either for repairs or otherwise is required, he cannot supply it. The estate during the period of his life—and he is still a young man—must pass into the hands of his creditors, whose interest in it would be confined to realizing their security. I say nothing of his own wishes; I say nothing of his own conduct; I simply refer to dry facts, which render it to my mind a matter of absolute certainty that if the estate is to be continued as vested in him, neither improvement, repair nor profitable occupation either to the estate or to the individual, is likely to result from a continuance of the estate in its present incumbered condition. Under these circumstances the tenant for life has consented to sell, and an offer has been made for the estate, as to which it has hardly been seriously contended that it is not a good and even advantageous offer, though not, perhaps, as Sir Horace Davey said, an extraordinarily lavish one. The trustees of the settlement have not in this case consented, but are divided in opinion, and the court, therefore, has, to determine whether upon the facts of this case the consent ought or ought not to be withheld. Now the Act of Parliament itself contains, either by way of recital or preamble, nothing to show what the meaning or policy of the statute was; but the power given to the tenant for life to sell notwithstanding that by the terms of the settlement his powers do not extend beyond his own life, seems to me—apart from every extraneous consideration—enough to show that what the statute intended to do was to release the land from the fetters of the settlement, to render it a marketable article notwithstanding the settlement. And historically one knows very well what were the objections made to the law of settlement in its effect upon the cultivation and useful occupation of land. Now, it has been a very familiar canon of construction to contemplate what was the cause and reason of the Act, or, in other words, the mischief requiring a remedy. Thus, in Heydon's case, 3 Rep. 7b, 8a, the

They referred to Pare v. Clegg, 9 W. R. 795, 29 Beav. 589; Bromley v. Williams, 11 W. R. 392, 32 Beav. 177; Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, 16 W. R. 1138, L. R. 6 Eq. 551; Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott, 23 W. R. 249, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 142; Commissioners of Sewers v. Gellatly, 24 W. R. 1059, 3 Ch. D. 610; Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 9.

E. Morten and L. G. Pike; and T. W. Chitty, for the several defendants, were not called upon.

Feb. 23.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was delivered by LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against an order of the Divisional Court striking out from the title of the writ and statement of claim the words "as well on their own behalf as on behalf of and as representing all the members of each of the said societies and joint committee to which they respectively belong." In order to make the question clear it is necessary to state shortly the nature of the action. The plaintiff is a mason and builder carrying on business at Hull, and he sues the presidents and officers of the Hull branches of three trade unions and of the joint committee of the Hull branches of those trade unions personally, and also as representing all the other members of each of the trade unions and joint committee respectively, for maliciously and wrongfully doing certain acts of interference with his business, and he asks for an injunction to restrain the trades unions and joint committee from doing those acts. Whether the defendants can be so sued depends upon ord. 16, r. 9.

The question turns upon the true meaning of the words in that rule, "the same interest in one cause or matter." This expression only extends to persons who have or claim some beneficial proprietary right which they are asserting or defending in the cause or matter. The plaintiff in this case sues for damages, and the action, assuming it to lie at all—as to which we pronounce no opinion—is founded on tort. The old Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to grant relief in such an action; and although its rules as to parties to actions or suits maintainable in it, have now to be applied in all divisions in the High Court when exercising the old jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, the rules ought not to be construed as creating a jurisdiction in one division which was never exercised by any court in the country before the rules were made. But then the plaintiff seeks an injunction. This is an equitable remedy. But a suit for an injunction in such a case as this, even if maintainable at all, certainly could not be so framed as to bind persons not actually parties to it. What right is it which the plaintiff asserts? It is a right not to be molested in the conduct of his business. Who are the persons against whom he seeks redress? They are a number of persons belonging to various trade unions acting more or less in concert; but the persons assumed to be represented by the officers of those trade unions have no such interest as is contemplated by the rule as above explained. The truth is that this is an attempt to stretch the rule to cases to which it is wholly inapplicable, and the attempt is only plausible by reason of the ambiguity of the expression, "same interest." The Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel, is no authority for them. In the first place, the case was overruled by the Court of Appeal in The Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott; and, in the next place, the suit was not in form a suit against the defendants as representing others, although the prayer was for an injunction against them in that character. The point now raised could not arise, and did not arise, in that case on demurrer, for it was no objection to a bill in equity that, besides a relief which might lawfully be claimed, it claimed also a relief which was impossible. The words struck out by the Divisional Court ought never to have been inserted, and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for J. T. & H. Woodhouse, Hull.

Solicitors for the defendants, Shaen, Roscoe, Messey, & Co.; Collyer-Bristow, Russell, Hill, & Co., for Laverack & Son, Hull.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Dec. 3.

HARRISON v. DUKE OF RUTLAND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Highway—Trespass—Right of owner of soil of highway—Right of public—Interference with owner's right of shooting.

The defendant was the owner of certain moors across which a public road ran. While the defendant and his friends were engaged in shooting over the moors, the plaintiff went upon the road for the purpose of preventing, and acted so as to prevent, the grouse, which were being driven, from flying across the road towards the place where the defendant and his friends were. The defendant's keepers thereupon seized hold of the plaintiff and held him down upon the road until the drive was over. In an action to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment,

Held, that, as the soil of the road was vested in the defendant as owner of the adjoining land, subject only to the right of the public to pass and repass along it, the plaintiff, not being upon the road in the exercise of the right of way, but for another purpose, was a trespasser.

Motion by the plaintiff for a new trial, and cross-motion by the defendants for judgment upon certain issues in the claim and upon the counter-claim.

The action was for assault and false imprisonment upon a highway. The defendants pleaded justification, on the ground that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the soil of the defendant, the Duke of Rutland, and in the alternative paid 5s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim; and the defendant, the Duke of Rutland, counter-claimed for an injunction to prevent a repetition of the trespass and for damages. The action was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and a jury, when the learned judge directed the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser upon the highway, and the jury found a verdict for the defendants, upon the ground that the 5s. paid into court was sufficient.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lopes, L.J.

The plaintiff in person.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action against the Duke of Rutland and certain other persons who acted under his authority for an assault and false imprisonment. The defendants pleaded justification, and, in the alternative, paid 5s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, and also counter-claimed against the plaintiff for trespass, claiming an injunction.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was tried before the Lord Chief Justice, and the jury found a verdict for the defendants on the claim, except upon the issues of justification, upon which issues, and also upon the counter-claim, the Lord Chief Justice directed a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. Both parties appealed.

The main facts are not really in dispute. The duke had a right of shooting over certain moors, and upon the occasion in question he and his friends were exercising that right. A highway, the soil of which was vested in the duke, crossed the moors. The plaintiff, from some perverted notion, went on to the highway, knowing that it passed close to the place where the duke and his friends were shooting, and he went there, not for the purpose of using the highway as a highway, but solely for the purpose of interfering with the duke in the exercise of his rights as owner of the soil. He went along the highway near the butts towards which the grouse would be driven, knowing that the grouse would cross the highway, for the purpose of preventing the grouse coming across towards the butts, and thus interfering with the duke in the exercise of his undoubted rights. The plaintiff by waving his handkerchief and otherwise sought to prevent the grouse from approaching the butts, and when appealed to, refused to desist. The duke's keepers then seized him and held him down on the ground until the drive was over. The keepers held him down for the sole purpose of preventing him, and only so long as was necessary to prevent him, from so interfering. It was clear that they did not use any unnecessary force. The defendants justified the act upon the ground that the plaintiff was a trespasser on the duke's land for the purpose of interfering with the duke's enjoyment of and rights over his own land, and that no more force was used than was necessary to prevent such interference; and in the alternative they paid 5s. into court. The Lord Chief Justice, being anxious to maintain to its largest limits the right of the public over highways, with which anxiety I entirely sympathize, directed the jury as a matter of law that the plaintiff was not trespassing upon the defendant's land. The jury thereupon found a verdict for the defendants upon the claim, holding that 5s. was sufficient compensation, and judgment was entered for the defendants on the claim, except upon the issues of justification, upon which issues judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff on the counter-claim.

It is clear that the plaintiff's appeal must fail, because in either view of the matter the verdict of the jury was right. Upon the cross-appeal of the defendants we are asked to enter the verdict and judgment upon the issues of justification and upon the counter-claim for the defendants. In my opinion the verdict and judgment upon the issues of justification should be entered for the defendants, and also upon the counter-claim for nominal damages if such damages are asked for. There is another remedy asked for on this counter-claim, with which I shall deal subsequently.

The difficulty I have is to express the reasons for my judgment in such a way as to give effect to the rights of the owner of the soil without at the same time interfering with the largest possible rights of the public over highways. The question is whether the plaintiff was trespassing on the soil of the highway. The true rule as to the nature of the user of a highway is laid down in Reg. v. Pratt, 3 W. R. 372, 4 E. & B. 860. The Lord Chief Justice thought that that decision did not apply, because it was a criminal case, and that it was founded on the fact that the defendant was using the highway for the purpose of committing a criminal offence. But the decision depended upon whether the defendant was a trespasser. The land in question was a highway, and the prosecutor was the owner of the soil of the highway, being the owner of the adjoining land. The defendant was charged with trespassing on the land of the prosecutor in search of game. The foundation of the charge was that he was a trespasser. The defendant there, as is the case with the plaintiff here, did not use the land as a highway, but went there solely in search of game. Lord Campbell said that "it is true the public had a right of way there, but subject to that right the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in Mr. Bowyer. Then Pratt, being on that land, was undoubtedly a trespasser if he went there, not in exercise of the right of way, but for the purpose of seeking game and that only." If, therefore, a person goes upon a highway, the soil of which is vested in another person, not for the purpose of using it as a highway, but solely for some other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, he is a trespasser. That case is an authority for that proposition, and it is founded upon cases which preceded it, and it is supported by subsequent cases. Therefore, upon the ground that the plaintiff was on a part of the highway, the soil of which was vested in the duke, not for the purpose of using the highway to pass and repass along it, or for any other reasonable and usual mode of using it as a highway, he was a trespasser. The language of Erle, J., and Crompton, J., in Reg. v. Pratt might in one view interfere with the universal user of highways in this country, and if so would be productive of mischief. If that language were taken literally, highways could only be used for the purpose of passing and repassing along them. Highways are given primâ facie for that purpose, but things are done on them which are now recognized as done by the public in the exercise of a reasonable and usual mode of user, and if one of the public does no more than that, in my opinion he cannot be considered a trespasser.

The result is this: The person, to be a trespasser on a highway, must be committing the act of trespass at the spot where he is on the highway. If he is passing along the highway for the purpose of doing some act at a further point on the highway, which would make him a trespasser at that point, he is simply using the highway to pass along it, and the owner of that part of the soil of the highway over which he is passing cannot interfere with him. If, again, a man is passing along a highway for the purpose of entering upon the land of the same owner further on, he would not be a trespasser while so passing. But the plaintiff here was using this very part of the highway for the purpose of interfering with the duke's right of shooting. He stood upon the highway for the purpose of interfering with the duke's rights as owner of the land. Therefore he was not using the highway for the purpose of passing and repassing along it, or in any other reasonable and usual way. He was therefore a trespasser. It might be a question of fact whether a person was using a highway in the reasonable and usual mode of user, and if so that would be a question for the jury. But in this case the evidence was all one way, and we are bound to hold that the plaintiff was a trespasser. Therefore upon the issues of justification, judgment must be entered for the defendants. Consequently judgment must be entered for the defendants upon the whole claim.

As regards the counter-claim, the defendants do not ask for nominal damages, but for an injunction and a declaration. I have always felt disinclined to introduce the procedure of the Court of Chancery into an ordinary common law action. I think it is mischievous, except in very special cases, to introduce it. This is a trespass committed by an obstinate man. There was no possible damage. If he repeated the act the jury would probably mark their sense of it by giving substantial damages. If an injunction were granted, and the plaintiff disobeyed it, he would have to go to prison. That would bring into a mere common law action the very severe procedure of the Court of Chancery. When before this court the defendants did not press for an injunction, but asked for a declaration that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the occasion in question. Of what possible use can it be? The judge would have to direct the jury as to the law, and the declaration would be wholly misplaced in such a case after the direction of the judge laying down the law. In equity a declaration is useful in working out a decree. I think, therefore, that the verdict and judgment on the counter-claim should be entered for the defendants for nominal damages, but I differ from my brothers in thinking that there should be no declaration.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—This to my mind is a case of great importance, which must be my excuse for delivering a somewhat lengthy judgment. This is an action of trespass to the person brought by the plaintiff against the defendants claiming damages and an injunction. The defendants justified, amongst other defences, the alleged trespass on the ground that the plaintiff was trespassing upon the soil of the defendant, the Duke of Rutland, for the purpose of interfering with the legal right of shooting belonging to the said duke, which by his friends and keepers duly authorized in that behalf he was then exercising, and alleging the use of no greater force than was necessary for the purpose of abating such trespass. The defendant, the Duke of Rutland, also counter-claimed against the plaintiff in respect of a trespass by the plaintiff to the soil of the said duke, and for his interference with the exercise by the said duke of his legal right of sporting over the said lands, alleging threats to continue and repeat such unlawful interference, and claiming an injunction and damages. Alternately the defendants brought into court the sum of 5s. in satisfaction of all the causes of action of the plaintiff. The plaintiff joined issue on the defendants' defence, and denied the allegations in the counter-claim.

The case came on to be tried before the Lord Chief Justice. So far as material, the facts may be stated as follows:—At the times in question the Duke of Rutland was lawfully exercising sporting rights over certain moors belonging to him. These moors were in certain parts intersected by certain highways; the soil of such highways, subject only the easement of passing and repassing, which belonged to the public, was vested in the said duke, he being the owner of the lands on each side adjoining the said highways. Butts were erected at some places near the said highways, at other places at a distance of 200 yards from the highways, for the purpose of the sportsmen concealing themselves from the grouse which were to be driven towards them. The vision of the grouse is signally acute, and very little will induce them to shy away from the butts and follow a course which would be out of reach of the guns of the sportsmen occupying the butts. The plaintiff, knowing this and believing that he had cause of annoyance with the duke or with his predecessor in title, placed himself, avowedly and admittedly, on the highway in such a position and so acted as to prevent the grouse from approaching the butts. The plaintiff had done this on former occasions, and had threatened to continue so to act whenever the duke drove his moors. Some years before the moors had been let to a tenant. During that time the plaintiff, who had been paid by the tenant, had desisted from any interference with the shooting on the moors; but so soon as the duke resumed the shooting on his moors so soon did the plaintiff renew his interference with the sport. It was an undisputed fact in the case that the plaintiff did not use the soil of the highway as one of the public for passing and repassing, or for the legitimate purpose of travel, but was at the times in question using it for the purpose of interfering with and obstructing the legal right of the duke to exercise sporting rights over the said moors. There was a conflict of evidence as to the amount of force used by the defendants in their attempts to prevent the plaintiff interfering with the sport. In these circumstances the Lord Chief Justice directed the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser, and that therefore what the defendants did could not be justified; that the defendants had no cause of action on their counter-claim; and that the only question which they would have to consider was whether 5s. was enough to compensate the plaintiff for the acts of the defendants. The Lord Chief Justice said: "I do not think the plaintiff was a trespasser. I do not think, therefore, that what was done to him was lawful"; and again, "The trespass is hardly denied, and is attempted to be justified on grounds that, in my judgment, fail. The trespass, therefore, remains a trespass, not a lawful act. It is an unlawful act; 5s. has been paid in respect of that unlawful act. In your judgment is 5s. enough; if 5s. is enough, verdict for the defendants; if 5s. is not enough, then verdict for the plaintiff, with such an addition to the 5s. as you think on the whole necessary." The jury thereupon found a verdict for the defendants on the claim, thinking 5s. enough, and the Lord Chief Justice ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants on the claim, and for the plaintiff on the counter-claim and pleas justifying the trespass. The result is that, while the defendants succeed on the issue raised as to the 5s. paid into court, the plaintiff has had entered for him the issues raised by the pleas of justification, and has judgment on the counter-claim. This arises from the holding of the Lord Chief Justice that the plaintiff was not, under the circumstances, a trespasser. The plaintiff and defendants have both appealed to the court, the plaintiff seeking judgment for him on the claim so far as the issue with regard to 5s. being enough to satisfy the claim is concerned, alleging the 5s. to be contemptuous and inadequate; and the defendants seeking to have judgment entered for them on the pleas justifying the trespass and on the counter-claim.

I am of opinion the Lord Chief Justice was wrong in directing the jury that on the facts as admitted the plaintiff was not a trespasser. In my opinion the Lord Chief Justice ought to have told the jury that the plaintiff, on the admitted facts, was a trespasser, and that the pleas justifying the trespass and the counter-claim must be found for the defendants, and that the only question they had to consider was whether there had been an excess of force used in abating the trespass, and, if so, whether 5s. was enough to compensate the plaintiff for such excess. The Lord Chief Justice ought further to have told the jury that if there was no excess then they must find everything for the defendants; but if there was an excess, then if 5s. was enough they ought still to find everything for the defendants; but if, on the other hand, they thought 5s. was not enough, then they should find for the plaintiff for such sum as in their opinion he was entitled to beyond the 5s. The jury were of opinion that 5s. was enough to cover everything to which the plaintiff was entitled. Their finding on that issue is therefore conclusive, and the verdict and judgment in that respect must stand. But ought the Lord Chief Justice to have told the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser?

The interest of the public in a highway consists solely in the right of passage; the soil and freehold over which that right of way is exercised is vested in the owner or owners of the adjoining land, who may maintain actions of trespass against persons infringing his or their rights therein; as, for instance, by permitting cattle to depasture thereon: Dovaston v. Payne, 2 H. Bl. 527. Buller, J., says: "Whether the plaintiff was a trespasser or not depends on the fact whether he was passing and repassing and using the road as a highway, or whether his cattle were in the road as trespassers." Again, Heath, J., says: "If it be a way, he must show that he was lawfully using the way; for the property is in the owner of the soil subject to an easement for the benefit of the public." In the case of Reg. v. Pratt Pratt had been convicted by justices under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, of committing a trespass by being in the daytime on land in the occupation of B. in search of game. On appeal, a case was reserved by the sessions for the opinion of the court, and the facts appeared to be that Pratt was in the daytime on a public road (the soil of which as well as the land on both sides belonged to B.) carrying a gun and accompanied by a dog, that Pratt sent the dog into a cover by the roadside which was in the actual occupation of B., and that a pheasant flew across the road from the cover and was fired at by Pratt, who was still standing upon the road. Upon these facts the court held that the conviction was right, the road being land in the occupation of B. subject only to the right of way of the public; and the evidence showed that Pratt was not on the road in the exercise of the right of way, but for another purpose—namely, the search for game—and that thus he was a trespasser. "On these facts," said Lord Campbell, C.J., "I think the magistrates were perfectly justified in concluding that Pratt was trespassing on land in the occupation of B. in search of game. He was, beyond all controversy, on land the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land—that is, B. It is true the public had a right of way there, but subject to that right the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in B. The road, therefore, must be considered as B.'s land. Then Pratt, being on that land, was undoubtedly a trespasser if he went there, not in exercise of the right of way, but for the purpose of seeking game and that only. If he did go there for that purpose only, he committed the offence named in the Act; he trespassed by being on the land in pursuit of game. The evidence of his being there for that purpose is ample. He waved his hand to his dog; the dog entered the cover and drove out a pheasant, and Pratt fired at it. The magistrates were fully justified in drawing the conclusion that he went there, not as a passenger on the road, but in search of game." Erle, J., in the same case, says: "There can be no doubt, in fact, that Pratt was on the land, and that he was in search of game; but it is said he could not be a trespasser because it was a highway. But I take it to be clear law that, if in fact a man be on land where the public have a right to pass and repass, not for the purpose of passing and repassing, but for other and different purposes, he is in law a trespasser, like the cattle in Dovaston v. Payne." Crompton, J., in the same case, says: "I take it to be clear law that if a man use the land, over which there is a right of way, for any purpose lawful or unlawful other than that of passing and repassing, he is a trespasser." I do not think the language used by the learned judges in that case too large or that it in any way impeaches the legitimate use of highways by the public. The Lord Chief Justice, however, appears to have thought that this decision was founded on the fact that Pratt was committing an offence on the highway. The Lord Chief Justice says —I quote his own words—"As he was using the highway not to pass and repass, but to be guilty of a criminal offence, the judges held that his being on the highway for the purpose of committing that criminal offence, he was none the less doing that criminal offence because he was on the highway; but they could not take exception and say he had a right to be there, as he had for all purposes, and try to make that a defence for being there for a criminal purpose."

In my opinion that is not the ground of the decision. The ground of the decision is that Pratt was using the highway for purposes other than those of legitimate travel, and was, therefore, a trespasser on the soil and freehold of the adjoining owner; he could not have been convicted unless he had been a trespasser. The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has, subject to the easement, precisely the same estate in the soil as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public. If this is the law, the plaintiff, on the admitted facts, was a trespasser. He was using the soil of the highway, not for the purpose of passing and repassing, but for the purpose of interfering with the exercise of a legal right by the defendant, the Duke of Rutland. In these circumstances the defendants are entitled to judgment on the pleas of justification, and also on their counter-claim for nominal damages. The plaintiff's appeal will, therefore, be dismissed, and the defendants' appeal be allowed with costs. Sir H. James, on the part of the duke, does not press for an injunction; if he had I should have thought it ought to be granted; but he asks for a declaration that the plaintiff, on the facts appearing, was, at the time when he interfered with the legal right of the duke, a trespasser. This I think he ought to have. An injunction is constantly granted by the Queen's Bench Division for trespasses threatened to be repeated. It is the effect of the Judicature Act, and a most wholesome remedy. This action might have been brought in the Court of Chancery, and an injunction on the facts appearing would, in my opinion, have been readily granted; and under ord. 25, r. 5, there is full power to make a declaration such as we make.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The soil of a highway belongs, primâ facie, to the owner of the land adjoining it. If the land on either side is the property of different owners, each is owner of the soil on his side ad medium filum of the highway. But this ownership is subject to the right of the public to use the highway. Any use of the soil of the highway other than the legitimate use of it for the purposes of a highway is a trespass upon that soil as against the owner to whom it still belongs. These propositions are amply established by judicial decisions. The only difficulty in applying them is in determining whether the particular act complained of is or is not a user of the soil as a highway.

The legitimate use of a highway is generally de-

introduce the procedure of the Court of Chancery into an ordinary common law action. I think it is mischievous, except in very special cases, to introduce it. This is a trespass committed by an obstinate man. There was no possible damage. If he repeated the act the jury would probably mark their sense of it by giving substantial damages. If an injunction were granted, and the plaintiff disobeyed it, he would have to go to prison. That would bring into a mere common law action the very severe procedure of the Court of Chancery. When before this court the defendants did not press for an injunction, but asked for a declaration that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the occasion in question. Of what possible use can it be? The judge would have to direct the jury as to the law, and the declaration would be wholly misplaced in such a case after the direction of the judge laying down the law. In equity a declaration is useful in working out a decree. I think, therefore, that the verdict and judgment on the counter-claim should be entered for the defendants for nominal damages, but I differ from my brothers in thinking that there should be no declaration.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—This to my mind is a case of great importance, which must be my excuse for delivering a somewhat lengthy judgment. This is an action of trespass to the person brought by the plaintiff against the defendants claiming damages and an injunction. The defendants justified, amongst other defences, the alleged trespass on the ground that the plaintiff was trespassing upon the soil of the defendant, the Duke of Rutland, for the purpose of interfering with the legal right of shooting belonging to the said duke, which by his friends and keepers duly authorized in that behalf he was then exercising, and alleging the use of no greater force than was necessary for the purpose of abating such trespass. The defendant, the Duke of Rutland, also counter-claimed against the plaintiff in respect of a trespass by the plaintiff to the soil of the said duke, and for his interference with the exercise by the said duke of his legal right of sporting over the said lands, alleging threats to continue and repeat such unlawful interference, and claiming an injunction and damages. Alternately the defendants brought into court the sum of 5s. in satisfaction of all the causes of action of the plaintiff. The plaintiff joined issue on the defendants' defence, and denied the allegations in the counter-claim.

The case came on to be tried before the Lord Chief Justice. So far as material, the facts may be stated as follows:—At the times in question the Duke of Rutland was lawfully exercising sporting rights over certain moors belonging to him. These moors were in certain parts intersected by certain highways; the soil of such highways, subject only the easement of passing and repassing, which belonged to the public, was vested in the said duke, he being the owner of the lands on each side adjoining the said highways. Butts were erected at some places near the said highways, at other places at a distance of 200 yards from the highways, for the purpose of the sportsmen concealing themselves from the grouse which were to be driven towards them. The vision of the grouse is signally acute, and very little will induce them to shy away from the butts and follow a course which would be out of reach of the guns of the sportsmen occupying the butts. The plaintiff, knowing this and believing that he had cause of annoyance with the duke or with his predecessor in title, placed himself, avowedly and admittedly, on the highway in such a position and so acted as to prevent the grouse from approaching the butts. The plaintiff had done this on former occasions, and had threatened to continue so to act whenever the duke drove his moors. Some years before the moors had been let to a tenant. During that time the plaintiff, who had been paid by the tenant, had desisted from any interference with the shooting on the moors; but so soon as the duke resumed the shooting on his moors so soon did the plaintiff renew his interference with the sport. It was an undisputed fact in the case that the plaintiff did not use the soil of the highway as one of the public for passing and repassing, or for the legitimate purpose of travel, but was at the times in question using it for the purpose of interfering with and obstructing the legal right of the duke to exercise sporting rights over the said moors. There was a conflict of evidence as to the amount of force used by the defendants in their attempts to prevent the plaintiff interfering with the sport. In these circumstances the Lord Chief Justice directed the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser, and that therefore what the defendants did could not be justified; that the defendants had no cause of action on their counter-claim; and that the only question which they would have to consider was whether 5s. was enough to compensate the plaintiff for the acts of the defendants. The Lord Chief Justice said: "I do not think the plaintiff was a trespasser. I do not think, therefore, that what was done to him was lawful"; and again, "The trespass is hardly denied, and is attempted to be justified on grounds that, in my judgment, fail. The trespass, therefore, remains a trespass, not a lawful act. It is an unlawful act; 5s. has been paid in respect of that unlawful act. In your judgment is 5s. enough; if 5s. is enough, verdict for the defendants; if 5s. is not enough, then verdict for the plaintiff, with such an addition to the 5s. as you think on the whole necessary." The jury thereupon found a verdict for the defendants on the claim, thinking 5s. enough, and the Lord Chief Justice ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants on the claim, and for the plaintiff on the counter-claim and pleas justifying the trespass. The result is that, while the defendants succeed on the issue raised as to the 5s. paid into court, the plaintiff has had entered for him the issues raised by the pleas of justification, and has judgment on the counter-claim. This arises from the holding of the Lord Chief Justice that the plaintiff was not, under the circumstances, a trespasser. The plaintiff and defendants have both appealed to the court, the plaintiff seeking judgment for him on the claim so far as the issue with regard to 5s. being enough to satisfy the claim is concerned, alleging the 5s. to be contemptuous and inadequate; and the defendants seeking to have judgment entered for them on the pleas justifying the trespass and on the counter-claim.

I am of opinion the Lord Chief Justice was wrong in directing the jury that on the facts as admitted the plaintiff was not a trespasser. In my opinion the Lord Chief Justice ought to have told the jury that the plaintiff, on the admitted facts, was a trespasser, and that the pleas justifying the trespass and the counter-claim must be found for the defendants, and that the only question they had to consider was whether there had been an excess of force used in abating the trespass, and, if so, whether 5s. was enough to compensate the plaintiff for such excess. The Lord Chief Justice ought further to have told the jury that if there was no excess then they must find everything for the defendants; but if there was an excess, then if 5s. was enough they ought still to find everything for the defendants; but if, on the other hand, they thought 5s. was not enough, then they should find for the plaintiff for such sum as in their opinion he was entitled to beyond the 5s. The jury were of opinion that 5s. was enough to cover everything to which the plaintiff was entitled. Their finding on that issue is therefore conclusive, and the verdict and judgment in that respect must stand. But ought the Lord Chief Justice to have told the jury that the plaintiff was not a trespasser?

The interest of the public in a highway consists solely in the right of passage; the soil and freehold over which that right of way is exercised is vested in the owner or owners of the adjoining land, who may maintain actions of trespass against persons infringing his or their rights therein; as, for instance, by permitting cattle to depasture thereon: Dovaston v. Payne, 2 H. Bl. 527. Buller, J., says: "Whether the plaintiff was a trespasser or not depends on the fact whether he was passing and repassing and using the road as a highway, or whether his cattle were in the road as trespassers." Again, Heath, J., says: "If it be a way, he must show that he was lawfully using the way; for the property is in the owner of the soil subject to an easement for the benefit of the public." In the case of Reg. v. Pratt Pratt had been convicted by justices under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, of committing a trespass by being in the daytime on land in the occupation of B. in search of game. On appeal, a case was reserved by the sessions for the opinion of the court, and the facts appeared to be that Pratt was in the daytime on a public road (the soil of which as well as the land on both sides belonged to B.) carrying a gun and accompanied by a dog, that Pratt sent the dog into a cover by the roadside which was in the actual occupation of B., and that a pheasant flew across the road from the cover and was fired at by Pratt, who was still standing upon the road. Upon these facts the court held that the conviction was right, the road being land in the occupation of B. subject only to the right of way of the public; and the evidence showed that Pratt was not on the road in the exercise of the right of way, but for another purpose—namely, the search for game—and that thus he was a trespasser. "On these facts," said Lord Campbell, C.J., "I think the magistrates were perfectly justified in concluding that Pratt was trespassing on land in the occupation of B. in search of game. He was, beyond all controversy, on land the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land—that is, B. It is true the public had a right of way there, but subject to that right the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in B. The road, therefore, must be considered as B.'s land. Then Pratt, being on that land, was undoubtedly a trespasser if he went there, not in exercise of the right of way, but for the purpose of seeking game and that only. If he did go there for that purpose only, he committed the offence named in the Act; he trespassed by being on the land in pursuit of game. The evidence of his being there for that purpose is ample. He waved his hand to his dog; the dog entered the cover and drove out a pheasant, and Pratt fired at it. The magistrates were fully justified in drawing the conclusion that he went there, not as a passenger on the road, but in search of game." Erle, J., in the same case, says: "There can be no doubt, in fact, that Pratt was on the land, and that he was in search of game; but it is said he could not be a trespasser because it was a highway. But I take it to be clear law that, if in fact a man be on land where the public have a right to pass and repass, not for the purpose of passing and repassing, but for other and different purposes, he is in law a trespasser, like the cattle in Dovaston v. Payne." Crompton, J., in the same case, says: "I take it to be clear law that if a man use the land, over which there is a right of way, for any purpose lawful or unlawful other than that of passing and repassing, he is a trespasser." I do not think the language used by the learned judges in that case too large or that it in any way impeaches the legitimate use of highways by the public. The Lord Chief Justice, however, appears to have thought that this decision was founded on the fact that Pratt was committing an offence on the highway. The Lord Chief Justice says —I quote his own words—"As he was using the highway not to pass and repass, but to be guilty of a criminal offence, the judges held that his being on the highway for the purpose of committing that criminal offence, he was none the less doing that criminal offence because he was on the highway; but they could not take exception and say he had a right to be there, as he had for all purposes, and try to make that a defence for being there for a criminal purpose."

In my opinion that is not the ground of the decision. The ground of the decision is that Pratt was using the highway for purposes other than those of legitimate travel, and was, therefore, a trespasser on the soil and freehold of the adjoining owner; he could not have been convicted unless he had been a trespasser. The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that if a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that in respect of which the dedication was made and the easement acquired he is a trespasser. The easement acquired by the public is a right to pass and repass at their pleasure for the purpose of legitimate travel, and the use of the soil for any other purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, is an infringement of the rights of the owner of the soil, who has, subject to the easement, precisely the same estate in the soil as he had previously to any easement being acquired by the public. If this is the law, the plaintiff, on the admitted facts, was a trespasser. He was using the soil of the highway, not for the purpose of passing and repassing, but for the purpose of interfering with the exercise of a legal right by the defendant, the Duke of Rutland. In these circumstances the defendants are entitled to judgment on the pleas of justification, and also on their counter-claim for nominal damages. The plaintiff's appeal will, therefore, be dismissed, and the defendants' appeal be allowed with costs. Sir H. James, on the part of the duke, does not press for an injunction; if he had I should have thought it ought to be granted; but he asks for a declaration that the plaintiff, on the facts appearing, was, at the time when he interfered with the legal right of the duke, a trespasser. This I think he ought to have. An injunction is constantly granted by the Queen's Bench Division for trespasses threatened to be repeated. It is the effect of the Judicature Act, and a most wholesome remedy. This action might have been brought in the Court of Chancery, and an injunction on the facts appearing would, in my opinion, have been readily granted; and under ord. 25, r. 5, there is full power to make a declaration such as we make.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The soil of a highway belongs, primâ facie, to the owner of the land adjoining it. If the land on either side is the property of different owners, each is owner of the soil on his side ad medium filum of the highway. But this ownership is subject to the right of the public to use the highway. Any use of the soil of the highway other than the legitimate use of it for the purposes of a highway is a trespass upon that soil as against the owner to whom it still belongs. These propositions are amply established by judicial decisions. The only difficulty in applying them is in determining whether the particular act complained of is or is not a user of the soil as a highway.

The legitimate use of a highway is generally described as a "right of passage" or a "right of passing and repassing." In 1 Rolle's Abridg. 392, B, pl. 1, 2, referred to and adopted by Lord Mansfield in Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr. 133, at p. 143, the law as to highways is thus stated: "The king has nothing but the passage for himself and his people, but the freehold and all profits belong to the owner of the soil." In the last-mentioned case it was held that trespass would lie for any interference with the owner's rights in the soil of a highway, and that he may maintain ejectment for an exclusion as by a building upon the soil of the highway. In Sir John Lade v. Shepherd, 2 Str. 1004, an action of trespass was brought by the owners of the soil for building a bridge across a ditch, "the end whereof rested on the highway." The plaintiff had judgment, the court saying: "It is certainly a dedication to the public so far as the public has occasion for it, which is only for a right of passage. But it never was understood to be a transfer of the absolute property in the soil." Following these decisions, the grass or trees growing on the sides of the highway are held to be the property of the owners of the soil: Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board, 18 W. R. 424, L. R. 9 Eq. 418; Curtis v. Kesteven County Council, 39 W. R. 199, 45 Ch. D. 504.

The right of the public upon a highway is, in the language of the judges which I have quoted, described as a right of passage. In other cases it is defined as a right of passing and repassing. Probably this is sufficiently accurate and precise to enable anyone to determine what, in each particular instance, is an improper use of the soil. Many of such instances may be too trivial to justify any action or prosecution. That is so in the case of every trespass. If a man walks into the field of another without permission he is a trespasser; but an action for such a trespass, unless it were in assertion of a fancied right, would not be very likely to succeed. So, if by the side of a highway an artist set up his easel and made a sketch, he might be a trespasser; but no one in his senses would bring an action against him for an occasional trespass of that kind. There is no more danger of abuse of the law in the one case than in the other, and it is no argument against this well-settled law relating to highways to say that it is capable of such abuse. The answer is that the law of trespass, whether on the soil of a highway or on land over which the public have no rights at all, may be pushed to an extreme in certain cases. But the discretion of a court of justice is as capable of controlling any excessive assertion of right in the case of a highway as in any other case.

In Dovaston v. Payne cattle were taken by the defendant damage feasant on his land, which adjoined a highway. It was pleaded that, being on the highway, they had escaped into the land by reason of the owner not having kept the fence which divided it from the road in repair. The plea was held bad because it did not aver distinctly that the cattle were using the highway for the purpose of passing and repassing. So that they might have been trespassing upon it, and an escape from land on which they were trespassing would not be a defence. Heath, J., said that it was no excuse that the fences were out of repair if the cattle were trespassers, and it was necessary to show that they were lawfully using the road; for "the property is in the owner of the soil subject to an easement for the benefit of the public," and on the plea it did not appear "whether the cattle were passing and repassing, or whether they were trespassing on the highway." In Stevens v. Whistler, 11 East, 51, it was held by the Court of King's Bench that depasturing cattle upon a highway on one side of which the plaintiff had land was a trespass on that part of the soil of the highway which belonged to the plaintiff. In Reg. v. Pratt it was decided that a person who went upon the high road with a gun and attempted to shoot a pheasant which flew over it was properly convicted of a trespass in search of game under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, upon the soil of the highway, which belonged to the owner of the close adjoining such highway. "He was on land," said Lord Campbell, C.J., "the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land. It is true the public had a right of way there, but subject to that right the soil and every right incident to the ownership of the soil was in" the owner of the adjoining land. Wightman, J., said: "Though the public have a right to pass and repass on land which is a highway they have no right to use the land for any other purpose than as a highway; and the appellant, being on such land in pursuit of game, was primâ facie a trespasser." Erle, J., said: "It is said he could not be a trespasser because it was a highway. But I take it to be clear law that if in fact a man be on land where the public have a right to pass and repass, not for the purpose of passing and repassing, but for other and different purposes, he is in law a trespasser like the cattle in Dovaston v. Payne." Crompton, J., said: "If a man use the land over which there is a right of way for any purpose, lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and repassing he is a trespasser." These authorities were considered and followed by the Court of Queen's Bench in St. Mary, Newington v. Jacobs, 20 W. R. 249, L. R. 7 Q. B. 47, where the law is stated thus: "The owner who dedicates to public use as a highway a portion of his land parts with no other right than a right of passage to the public over the land so dedicated, and may exercise all other rights of ownership not inconsistent therewith." Mellor, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, comments thus on Reg. v. Pratt: "Whether or not that case is open to doubt as to the construction put upon the Game Act, it truly expresses, as we think, the true limit of the public rights over a highway." The court held that the owner of premises adjoining a highway, who had offered to take up the flags of a footpath and replace them by hard materials to enable him to cart heavy machinery into his yard, was not liable for damage done to the flags by carting the machinery over them, when his offer had been refused. According to these authorities the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and repassing over land the soil of which may be owned by a private person. Using that soil for any other purpose, lawful or unlawful, is a trespass. I understand those words to mean that the purpose need not be unlawful in itself; as, for example, to commit an assault or a felony upon the high road. It is enough that it should be a user of the soil of the high road for a purpose other than that which is the proper use of a highway, namely, that of passing and repassing along it.

The peculiarity of the decision of Reg. v. Pratt is that the trespasser was passing along the highway, but his purpose in doing so made that passing a trespass. The purpose, however, was to do an act upon the highway itself which was beyond his right merely to pass and repass. If he had gone along the highway with the purpose of reaching a covert near the highway and taking game in that covert, though he might be a trespasser in that covert, I should not think he was a trespasser upon the highway. But if a man goes along a highway for the purpose of cutting down the trees or bushes which grow along the side of it, or taking the grass, or setting up a show upon the highway, or doing upon the highway itself—in the words of Crompton, J.—any act, "lawful or unlawful, other than that of passing and repassing, he is a trespasser." The words must be read with the obvious qualification that the "purpose" they refer to must be a purpose of using the soil of the highway itself otherwise than by merely passing and repassing.

In this case the highway was a cart or carriage-road across a moor. The Duke of Rutland had a right of sporting over the moor. The soil in it and in the highway, I understand, belonged to him. He had butts in which people stood to shoot grouse driven over them from the moor. These butts were some 200 yards from the road, so that shooting from them would not infringe the provisions of section 72 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, which prohibits any person from wantonly firing off any gun within fifty feet of the centre of any carriageway or cartway. Some old butts were within the prohibited distance. It was proved that the plaintiff went upon this high road during a grouse drive for the express purpose of preventing the grouse from flying towards the butts, and thus interfering with the right of sporting which was being exercised by the duke and his friends. On this point the evidence was so conclusive that we are told that the Lord Chief Justice said it was superfluous to produce any more witnesses to prove it. The keepers seized the plaintiff, threw him upon the road, and held him there during the grouse drive to prevent his further interference. The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury that the plaintiff was not trespassing. Under that ruling they found that a nominal sum of 5s. paid into court was sufficient damages for the assault upon him. Counsel then said that, after his lordship's ruling, he could hardly press the counter-claim, which asserted that the act of the plaintiff was a trespass and sought for an injunction to restrain him from repeating it. This counter-claim is, in fact, an equitable cross-action, which may now be brought in the Queen's Bench Division: see section 24, sub-section 3, of the Judicature Act, 1873. Where a trespass is committed in assertion of a fancied right, and it is shown that it will be repeated unless prevented, the Court of Chancery has constantly granted injunctions to prevent a repetition of the trespass.

Upon this point there is now before us a cross-appeal by the defendants. They asked for an injunction; but upon being pressed by me on that point, counsel said he would not insist upon the injunction, but desired the decision of this court by declaration whether or not the act of the plaintiff was a misuse of the soil of the highway which amounted to a trespass. It is not unusual in the Chancery Division to make such a declaration without going on to grant an injunction. It clearly may be done under ord. 25, r. 5. Whatever may be thought of the so-called sport of standing in a butt and shooting at grouse driven over, it is not prohibited by law; and, subject to the provisions of the statute to which I have referred for the protection of wayfarers upon the high road, it is a not unlawful exercise of the right of the owner of the land. The plaintiff went upon this highway, not for the purpose of exercising as one of the public his right of passage, but of interfering with the grouse drive by placing himself upon the soil of the highway so as to prevent the grouse from flying over the butts. In his own language, taken from his evidence, he says: "I certainly meant to take up my position in front of the butts." "I went there to defend the public right." With great deference I am unable to agree that this was a use of the right of passing along the highway. I think it was an abuse of that right. In other words, it was a use of the soil of the highway for another purpose, which use interfered with, and was intended to interfere with, a right which was then being exercised by the owner of the soil, and was incident to that ownership. Such a misuse of the soil of a highway is a trespass. There seems to have been sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was not only asserting a right to do what he did, but also that his intention was to repeat his interference. This strictly would entitle the defendants to the assistance of the court by injunction to prevent a repitition of the act. But this is not pressed for; and I think that the defendants are entitled at any rate to a declaration under ord. 25, r. 5, upon their counter-claim, that under the circumstances the plaintiff upon October 8, 1890, when stopped by the duke's keepers, was trespassing upon the soil of the highway. I am not so much impressed with the consequences of granting an injunction. The court exercises the power of enforcing such an order by imprisonment with very great care and caution. The damages given to the plaintiff for the alleged assault upon him by the keepers on the assumption that he was not a trespasser were only 5s. They would not be more on the ruling that he was a trespasser, and the defendants do not ask to alter the amount. The plaintiff's appeal fails, and must be dismissed. The defendants' appeal succeeds. The plaintiff's claim is dismissed with costs. The defendants' counter-claim is allowed with costs.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Hood Barrs & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, G. L. P. Eyre & Co.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Dec. 9.

"THE LANCASHIRE." (a.)

Shipping—Admiralty—Collision—Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

By article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary."

During a fog the whistle of the steamship A., bound eastward, was first heard by the master of the steamship L., bound westward, a point or a point and a half on his starboard bow, and the sound of the whistle gradually broadened until it reached two and a half to three points on that bow. As the next whistle did not seem to broaden, the master of The L. stopped his engines. The next whistle satisfied him that A. was porting and closing on his starboard bow, and he thereupon reversed his engines. The two vessels came into collision; but if A. had not ported, they would have passed starboard to starboard on nearly parallel and opposite courses.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the judgment of Barnes, J.), in an action of damage, that The L. was to blame for the collision as well as The A.

The Ceto, 14 App. Cas. 670, followed.

Appeal by the owners of the steamship Lancashire from the judgment of Barnes, J., in an action by the owners of the steamship Ariel against the owners of The Lancashire, arising out of a collision between the two ships which took place on the 10th of June, 1892.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Barnes, J.:—The Ariel was a steamer of 1,452 tons net and 2,020 tons gross register. At the time of the collision she was on a voyage from Varna to Hamburg with a cargo of wheat. The Lancashire was a larger vessel of 2,712 tons net and 4,193 tons gross register, and her cargo was about 3,500 tons of dead weight. She was on a voyage from London to Liverpool. The collision took place in the neighbourhood of The Owers lightship in the English Channel shortly after 8 p.m. on the 10th of June. The evidence of the master of The Ariel was that about 3.40 p.m. she passed St. Catherine's light, that her course was about E. by S.; that about 4.30 it came on foggy and her engines were reduced to half-speed; and at 4.50, when the fog became denser, the engines were reduced to dead slow. Shortly after 7 p.m. The Ariel was in the neighbourhood of The Owers lightship. At 8 p.m. the captain gave the order to proceed as slow as possible, and after that the speed was only two knots an hour. The master of The Ariel stated that at five minutes past eight he heard a steam whistle, apparently right ahead a long way off, that that whistle was heard from time to time and his own whistle was sounded in answer to it, and after listening for about ten minutes he ported to about E.S.E. After porting, as the vessels were getting close, he heard the whistle of The Lancashire on his port bow. He steadied at E.S.E. and the whistle did not get any broader. About five minutes after he had steadied on the E.S.E. course he saw the steamer about two points on his port bow a length or two off, and he thereupon reversed his engines and put his helm hard aport, but was struck about 15 feet abaft the stern on the port bow, the time of the collision being about 8.20 p.m. The Ariel was so much damaged that she sank early the next morning. The account given by the master of The Lancashire was that at 5.7 p.m. his ship was abeam of Beachy Head, proceeding on a course of N. 82° W. magnetic. At 6.15 fog ahead was noticed. At 6.30 he ordered the engines to be slowed, and at 6.35 he proceeded dead slow. At 7.46 he heard a steam whistle a point or a point and a half on his starboard bow. He continued to hear this whistle, and it gradually broadened on his starboard bow. He repeated the order dead slow, and the last blast before his suspicions were aroused was from two and a half to three points on his starboard bow. He then heard a whistle which aroused his suspicions because it seemed to come from the same direction as the previous whistle, and not to be continuing to broaden. He thereupon stopped his engines, his speed up to that time being about three and a half knots through the water. The next whistle satisfied him that The Ariel was porting and closing on his starboard bow, and he therefore reversed his engines full speed. He heard two more blasts, and as the last one was dying away The Ariel come into sight, crossing him at an angle of about forty degrees. When first seen, The Ariel was about 150 yards off, two and a half to three points on The Lancashire's starboard bow. According to the evidence of the captain of The Lancashire the collision took place at seven minutes past eight.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Article 18 of the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea provides that "every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary." The learned judge found that The Ariel was to blame for porting, and not slacking; with reference to The Lancashire he put the following question to the nautical assessors:—"Were the indications by the whistle from The Ariel, under the circumstances, such as to convey distinctly to a master of reasonable skill in the locality in which the vessels were that the two vessels were so approaching that they would pass well clear of each other without risk of each other, until The Ariel ported?" The nautical assessors answered that question in the negative. The learned judge was therefore of opinion that The Lancashire, in not having slackened speed sooner than she actually did, had not complied with article 18, and he held that The Lancashire, as well as The Ariel, was to blame for the collision.

The owners of The Lancashire appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and Bucknill, Q.C. (A. D. Bateson with them), for the owners of The Lancashire.—The learned judge in the court below was wrong in holding that The Lancashire was to blame. The evidence shows that the master of The Lancashire complied with article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. He stopped his engines as soon as there was any indication of risk of collision, and reversed them when it became necessary. The question asked by the learned judge of the nautical assessors ought to have been put affirmatively in the terms of article 18; put as it was in the negative form, it places the test too high. [KAY, L.J., referred to the dictum of Lord Watson in The Ceto, 14 App. Cas. 670, 38 W. R. Dig. 187.] That case is distinguishable, because there both vessels were at the material time on crossing courses, and both vessels had indications of risk of collision. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question put by the learned judge seems to have been taken from the judgment of Lord Herschell in The Ceto, who said: "I think that when a steamship is approaching another vessel in a dense fog, she ought to stop, unless there be such indications as to convey to a seaman of reasonable skill that the two vessels are so approaching that they will pass well clear of one another."] Two duties are imposed by article 18, first, to slacken speed when the vessels are approaching so as to involve risk of collision; and, secondly, to reverse if necessary. The evidence shows that the master of The Lancashire fulfilled both these duties. There is no hard and fast rule in these cases, but each case must depend on its own circumstances: The Vindomora, [1891] A. C. 1, 39 W. R. Dig. 211.

Pyke, Q.C., and T. F. Dawson Miller (Sir Walter Phillimore with them), for the owner of The Ariel, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think we are bound in this case by the decision of the House of Lords in The Ceto. It is clear that the second whistle, heard on the same bearing as the one before showed, considering the way in which the vessels were approaching, that The Ariel had ported. We have asked our assessors this question, "When The Lancashire stopped, were the indications such as to show to the captain of The Lancashire distinctly and equivocally that if both vessels continued to do what it appeared they were doing (that is, the one proceeding slowly on and the other porting towards the other), they would pass clear without risk of collision?" The answer is, "No." I think, therefore, that, in obedience to the decision of the House of Lords, the learned judge was right in holding that The Lancashire was to blame as well as The Ariel. I think, however, that this construction of the rule, so far as it relates to steamers approaching each other in a fog, is a new one, but it is binding on this court.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. There are two alternatives prescribed by the rule, and in the circumstances, according to the construction put upon the rule in The Ceto, the captain of The Lancashire ought to have stopped and reversed. He did not reverse, but only stopped. He is, therefore, to blame for not obeying the rule.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard & Sons, for Bateson, Warr, & Bateson, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Crump & Son.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } North, J. } June 1; Dec. 20.

In re ADAMS.
ADAMS v. ADAMS. (a.)

Infants — Contingent interest — Intermediate income — Maintenance — Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.

Infant contingently entitled to a share of residue can be allowed maintenance out of the income thereof until one of them attains a vested interest.

In re Jeffery, 39 W. R. 234, [1891] 1 Ch. 671, and In re Burton, Banks v. Heaven, [1892] 2 Ch. 38, 40 W. R. Dig. 97, considered.

Adjourned summons.

The testator, J. G. Adams, who died in 1890, by his will, dated March 22, 1887, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for sale and conversion, and directed his trustees, after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, to stand possessed of the proceeds of sale of his residuary estate in trust, as to one-third part thereof, in equal shares for all the children of the testator's brother, Thomas Adams, who should survive him, the testator, and, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry.

Thomas Adams died before the date of the will leaving six children, all of whom survived the testator. None of them had attained as yet a vested interest, the eldest being eighteen years of age.

This was an originating summons on behalf of the six infant children of Thomas Adams as plaintiffs, to which the trustees of the will and the next of kin of the testator were made defendants, asking for a declaration that, under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43, the trustees of the will might be authorized to apply the income of one-third of the residue for the maintenance of the plaintiffs.

W. F. Webster, for the plaintiffs.—The infants are entitled to maintenance under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43. Chitty, J.'s decision in In re Burton, Bankes v. Heaven, [1892] 2 Ch. 38, 40 W. R. Dig. 97, was correct.

He also referred to In re Cotton, 24 W. R. 243, 1 Ch. D. 232; Furneaux v. Rucker, W. N., 1879, p. 135; In re Jeffery, 39 W. R. 234, [1891] 1 Ch. 671; Shepherd v. Ingram, Amb. 448; Mills v. Norris, 5 Ves. 335; Scott v. Earl of Scarborough, 1 Beav. 154; Rochford v. Hackman, 9 Hare, 475; Brandon v. Aston, 2 Y. & C. Ch. 30; Green v. Ekins, 2 Atk. 473; Kidman v. Kidman, 40 L. J. Ch. 259, 19 W. R. Dig. 4.

Southall, for the next of kin.—The infants are not entitled to the income accruing during their infancy.

He relied on In re Jeffery, and In re Dickson, Hill v. Grant, 33 W. R. 511, 29 Ch. D. 331.

Disturnal, for the trustees.

Dec. 20.—NORTH, J. [after reading the will as above set out].—Now what is the effect of this gift? Who takes the income of the one-third share of the residue? Can it be used for the infants' maintenance? It is said that In re Jeffery was not rightly decided, and I am asked to follow the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Burton, Banks v. Heaven. I have very fully reconsidered my decision in In re Jeffery, and I see no reason for departing from the view I then took. The distinction, however, between that case and the present is that here no child has attained a vested interest. As regards the case of Furneaux v. Rucker, which I referred to in In re Jeffery, I then thought it was a gift of residue, but I find, on referring to the registrar's books, that it was a specific gift. There it was decided that the income of the property fell into the residue until the eldest child attained twenty-one, when he would be entitled to it, the other children becoming successively entitled as they attained vested interests. The other case I wish to refer to is Shepherd v. Ingram. A testator gave his residue to such children as his daughter, who was then unmarried, should have of her body lawfully begotten. The income was directed to be accumulated. The daughter married and had three children. Shepherd v. Ingram was a bill by two of the children, the third being defendant, all of them being infants, to have it decided who was entitled to the accumulation, and prayed for an account of the income and a declaration that so much of it as became due from the birth of the first child till the second was born belonged to the first, and so much of it as became due from the birth of the second child till the third was born belonged to the first and second, and so on. There Northington, C., said he was very clear that the infants took a defeasible interest in the residue—defeasible in this sense, that other children might be born and diminish their shares—and decreed according to the prayer of the bill. That case seems to me very like the present. But it is said the vesting there took place at birth. Whether the vesting takes place on birth, subject to being divested on death under twenty-one, or whether it takes place only on the attainment of twenty-one, seems to me a matter of detail and not of principle. Suppose that in the present case Thomas had been alive, and the gift had been to all the children of Thomas; if Thomas had had one child at the testator's death, that child would clearly have taken a vested interest in the whole share of the residue left; if a second child was born after the testator's death, the vested interest of the first child in the whole would have been divested according to Shepherd v. Ingram, and he would have only been entitled to a vested interest in one-half, and so on. That is very like this case. I considered Shepherd v. Ingram in point in In re Jeffery, and I still consider that it is binding on me. Now with regard to the income. It is said the children take an interest in that also; but it is wrong to say they take it quâ income of the capital in which they have an interest. It is undisposed of income, and as such becomes part of the residue; but, being part of the residue, the income belongs contingently to the infants in the same way as the capital belongs contingently to them. That being so, in my opinion the income is income to which the infants are contingently entitled, and of property to which they are contingently entitled, and may be applied for their maintenance under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43, and I agree with Chitty, J., in In re Burton, Banks v. Heaven to this extent, that the income is applicable for the maintenance of the infants until a vested interest comes into existence. But I do not see my way to go beyond that point. While there is no vested interest then I hold that the income is applicable for maintenance of the infants. That will carry them on till about 1895. I will not decide what will happen then, and I declare that the income is applicable to the maintenance of all the children till one of them attains twenty-one, or, being a daughter, marries.

Solicitors for all parties, Ingle, Cooper, & Holmes.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Feb. 14, 15.

HOPE v. D'HÉDOUVILLE. (a.)

Tenant for life and remainderman—Lands settled on trust for sale—No power of postponement—Enjoyment of income in specie.

Where lands are vested in trustees upon trust for sale and investment of the proceeds, and payment of the income of the investments to a tenant for life, with remainders over, and without any power of postponement, the tenant for life is entitled to receive the net rents and profits until such conversion.

Further consideration.

By an indenture dated the 31st of October, 1854, the Comtesse d'Hédouville assigned to trustees the moiety of one-third of certain leasehold lands and hereditaments held under lease periodically renewable, upon trust during the lifetime of the Comtesse, to pay the annual profits unto her or her appointees for her separate use and with restraint on anticipation, and immediately after her decease upon trust to sell and convert into money the whole of the said moiety of one-third, and out of the clear moneys to arise from such sale to pay the sum of £4,000 to her husband, the Comte d'Hédouville, and invest the surplus in stocks or funds therein authorized, and to pay to the Comte, if he should survive her, the annual dividends and profits of the trust stock during his life, and subject thereto in trust for such persons as she should by deed or will appoint. In the year 1870 the freehold reversion of part of the leasehold premises was conveyed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the trustees in exchange for the surrender of another part of the premises comprised in the lease. The plaintiffs are the present trustees of the said indenture of the 31st of October, 1854.

By a deed poll dated the 3rd of August, 1880, the Comtesse exercised her power of appointment after the life estate of her husband in favour of the various defendants.

The Comtesse died on the 5th of March, 1889, and the Comte, her husband, died on the 28th of February, 1890, and the defendant, Louis Comte d'Hédouville, is his legal personal representative.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiffs.

Warmington, Q.C., and Warrington, for the defendant Louis Comte d'Hédouville and François d'Hédouville.—The only question is whether the late Comte d'Hédouville took a share of the rents and profits, and whether the present comte is also entitled to a share. The trustees have received the rents while waiting to realize the property. Is the capital or income to benefit by it? There is no intestacy. Neither corpus nor income should gain by the non-conversion. The deed of appointment deals with corpus. Why should the tenant for life be deprived of the actual income in order to increase the capital? In re Thomas, Wood v. Thomas, 40 W. R. 75, [1891] 3 Ch. 482.

Marten, Q.C., and Yardley, for the defendant Mrs. Harris, one of the appointees.—We contend the deed of appointment sweeps up all that does not go to the tenant for life. The rents do not go as income for this period, but as capital. We are entitled in specie, or no one is, as there is no gift of the income.

Ashton Cross, for the defendants, the Contessa di Quigini Puliga and her infant children, who were also appointees, urged that this was a clear case of equitable conversion.

McSwinney, for another appointee, Miss Sansom.—The trustees are bound to make the fund as large as possible, to sell at once and invest. The tenant for life is not entitled to the intermediate rents.

Norton, for a mortgagee of Contessa di Puliga's share.

Warmington replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The point I have to decide is one of novelty. It is closely connected with the point decided in In re Thomas, Wood v. Thomas, but essentially different. In that case there was an express authority to postpone conversion; here the question is how far the tenant for life can claim to enjoy in specie without any such express direction. In that case I held some direction must be found for such enjoyment. Here I find there is one thing wanting, namely, no power of postponement and no indication that any party contemplated any postponement. It is conceded that there has been no wilful delay. Under these circumstances what ought to be done? If the delay had been blameworthy, another question would arise; but I assume that conversion has been effected as soon as circumstances would permit. Putting aside the £4,000, it is simpler to treat the Comte as tenant for life. He is to have the proceeds of authorized investments, but there is nothing to suggest that anyone else should take any income which he does not.

The Comtesse has purported to appoint more than she could: there is no power for her to appoint more than the proceeds of sale. If I cannot extract from the documents a gift of the rents to some one, they are undisposed of and revert back to the settlor. Now as the object of conversion is to turn land into invested money, so long as that is not defeated there is nothing inconsistent in holding that the tenant for life is to receive the rents. I am driven to the conclusion that the settlor intends that the income shall belong to the donee. The alternative is a notional conversion as an investment in Consols or in a 4 per cent. security, in either case taking away something from the cestui que trust, taking out of capital to give to the tenant for life. This does not solve the difficulty. It really works a disadvantage to the remaindermen, who may or may not get the rents to compensate them. I hold that the intention is for the tenant for life to take the income, whatever it may consist of.

Solicitors, Shoubridge & May; Caprons, Dalton Hitchins, & Brabant; Denton, Hall, & Burgin; Lawrence, Graham, & Co.

(a.) Reported by FRANCIS T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Feb. 17.

LISTER v. HENRY LISTER & SON (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture—First and second issue—Priority—Reissue—"Outstanding"—Series of debentures.

A limited company had power under its memorandum to raise money by the issue of debentures secured by mortgage or otherwise upon all or any part of its property. The company shortly after its incorporation issued a series of debentures headed "Issue of £10,000 Six per Cent. Mortgage Debentures." Each debenture was to secure £100, and the company charged all its property, subject to the conditions indorsed thereon. The conditions stated that the debenture was one of a series issued or about to be issued by the company upon and subject to the like conditions for securing an aggregate sum and interest, and that the debentures as and when respectively issued should operate as creating continuously-overriding floating charges upon the undertaking and property of the company, subject to a certain mortgage for securing to the holders rateably and equally inter se, and without any preference or priority one over another, but in priority to all other debts for the time being owing by the company (save as aforesaid), of the principal moneys and interest owing upon the debentures, and as precluding the company, whilst any of the debentures should remain in force, from creating or making any further mortgage, charge, incumbrance, or security upon or over its undertaking or its property, in competition with or otherwise than subject or in subordination to the debentures then outstanding. Subsequently the company issued a second series of debentures in similar form to the first, except that the conditions stated that these latter debentures were "subject and in subordination to the debentures which have already been issued by the company for securing an aggregate principal sum of £10,000 and interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, or such of them as are now outstanding." Neither series of debentures was secured by a trust deed. Some of the first series of debentures were issued before the date of the second charge, and others of the first series were issued subsequently to the second charge.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the words "debentures already issued" meant the series of, and not the particular debentures already issued, and that the words "or such of them as are now outstanding" meant such of them as, having been issued, had not been paid off, and that, consequently, all the second debentures were postponed to all the first debentures, whenever issued, except such of them as had been reissued.

Debenture-holders' action.

Henry Lister & Co. (Limited) (hereafter called the company) was incorporated in 1890 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a company limited by shares.

The memorandum of association of the company gave power to borrow or raise money by the issue of debentures secured by mortgage or otherwise upon all or any part of the property of the company. The company commenced in 1890 to raise a sum of £10,000 by the issue of a series of mortgage debentures for that amount. These debentures were headed:—"Issue of £10,000 Six per Cent. Mortgage Debentures." Each debenture was for £100, and the company thereby acknowledged itself to owe, and bound itself to pay, to the registered holder the sum of £100 and interest at £6 per cent. per annum, and charged with such payment the undertaking of the company and all its property, real and personal, both present and future (including its uncalled capital for the time being), subject to indorsed conditions. The conditions stated, among other things, that the debenture was one of a series issued, or about to be issued, by the company upon and subject to the like conditions for securing an aggregate sum of £10,000 and interest at £6 per cent. per annum. The conditions also provided (condition 2) that "the debentures as and when respectively issued shall operate as creating continuously overriding floating charges upon the undertaking of the company, and all the within-mentioned property" (subject to a certain mortgage), "for securing and providing for the payment to the registered debenture-holders, rateably and equally inter se, and without any preference or priority one over another, but in priority to all other debts for the time being owing by the company (save as aforesaid), of the principal moneys and interest owing upon the debentures, and as precluding the company, whilst any of the debentures shall remain in force, from creating or making any further mortgage, charge, incumbrance, or security upon or over its undertaking or its property in competition with or otherwise than subject and in subordination to the debentures then outstanding."

The company commenced to issue debentures of this issue on the 25th of July, 1890, on which date they issued twenty debentures, numbered 1 to 20 inclusively, to some of the plaintiffs. On the same day the company issued six debentures, numbered 21 to 26 inclusively, to Messrs. Clayton, Marsden, & Co., and five debentures, numbered 27 to 31 inclusively, to Mr. Joseph Law. On the 30th of September, 1890, the company issued to Messrs. William Arnold & Son three debentures, numbered respectively 82, 83, and 84. These debentures all remained unpaid. On the 30th of September, 1890, the company issued to Messrs. Broadbent & Sons ten debentures, numbered 85 to 94 inclusively. These debentures (85 to 94) were repaid on the 2nd of June, 1891; and on the 1st of October, 1891, seven new debentures, numbered 85 to 91, were issued to another of the plaintiffs, and three, numbered 92, 93, and 94, were issued on the 24th of December, 1891, to Mr. Jessop. These ten new debentures also remained unpaid. The company, on the 13th of November, 1891, issued to Mr. Joseph Boden five debentures, numbered 95 to 99 inclusively. On the 24th of December, 1891, the company also issued to Mr. Jessop the debenture numbered 100. These debentures also remained unpaid.

In 1891 the company raised money on a "second issue of £10,000 six per cent. mortgage debentures" of £100 each. These debentures were in a form similar to that of the prior series, except that condition 2 contained these words: "And also subject and in subordination to the debentures which have been already issued by the company for securing an aggregate principal sum of £10,000 and interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, or such of them as are now outstanding."

The facts with reference to this second issue of debentures were as follows:—On the 19th of January, 1891, the company issued six of the second debentures to Mr. Joseph Boden. These debentures were numbered through inadvertence 100 to 105 inclusively, instead of 101 to 106. These debentures were still unpaid, and there were, therefore, two debentures numbered 100, one being of the first issue and held by Jessop, and the other of the second issue and held by Boden. On the 9th of March, 1891, the company issued fifty second debentures, numbered 106 to 155 inclusively, to Messrs. F. Heilborn & Co., and on the 15th of September, 1891, four second debentures, numbered 156 to 159, were issued to Mr. Joseph Law. On the same date two second debentures, numbered 160 and 161 respectively, were issued to one of the plaintiffs. All these debentures remained unpaid. On the 10th of October, 1891, nineteen debentures of the second issue, numbered 162 to 180 inclusively, were issued by the company to Mr. Joseph Law, and on the same date nineteen second debentures, numbered 181 to 199, were issued to Mr. William Blackburn. These debentures also remained unpaid. The company had issued no debentures save those mentioned. Neither series of debentures was covered by a trust deed.

This was a debenture-holders' action, and the question was raised as to the priorities inter se of the second debentures and the first debentures which had been issued in the place of paid-off first debentures.

This case had been argued in chambers on the above facts, and his lordship now delivered judgment in court.

Alexander Young, for the first debenture-holders.

Arthur Young, for the second debenture-holders.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have come to the conclusion that all the first debentures have priority over any of the second debentures. By the terms of the first debentures the holders are to have priority over all debts of the company, except a certain mortgage debt. This priority will prevail in favour of all the first debentures issued before the company had given a fresh charge or mortgage secured on the same property as that charged by the first debentures. So soon as that is done each first debenture subsequently issued would be postponed to any fresh charge or mortgage of earlier date, unless such fresh charge or mortgage was expressly made subject to further debentures of the first series still to be issued. It follows that the real question which I have to determine is whether the second debentures have in fact been made expressly subject to further first debentures still to be issued, and I have arrived at the conclusion that the second debentures are expressly made so subject. It is true that the words of condition 2 of the second debentures are somewhat ambiguous. These words are "in subordination to the debentures which have already been issued by the company for securing an aggregate principal sum of £10,000, or such of them as are now outstanding."

Now "debentures already issued" may mean the series of debentures already issued, or it may mean the individual debentures already issued. It is said that the words "or such of them as are now outstanding" show that the word "debentures" means the individual debentures which are now outstanding, or, in other words, which have already been individually issued, but I think not. I think that the words "or such of them as are now outstanding" mean "or such of them as, having been issued, have not been paid off." In other words, I think that these words are directed against a reissue of debentures which have been paid off. I am led to this construction because any other construction would be inconsistent with the second debentures being paid "rateably and equally inter se, and without any preference or priority one over another"; for it is plain that, as there is no assignment here to a trustee for the second debenture-holders, the only tenable claim which the second debentures could make would be that each debenture, whether of the first or second series, should rank according to its individual date. But in such case it is plain that, if the dates of individual first debentures interposed between the dates of individual second debentures, the second debentures would not get payment rateably and equally inter se, and without any preference or priority over one another. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the condition of the second debentures, according to its true construction, postpones the whole of the second debentures to the whole of the first debentures, whenever issued, provided they are not reissued.

Solicitors, Ramsden, Radcliffe, & Co., for Ramsden, Sykes, & Ramsden, Huddersfield; Henry.

C. C. R.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.) Jan. 17.

REG. v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Criminal law—Offences against the person—Male under the age of fourteen—Indictment for carnal knowledge of girl under the age of thirteen—Acquittal—Conviction for indecent assault—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), ss. 4, 9.

A boy under the age of fourteen years, who has been put on his trial under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for carnally knowing a girl under the age of thirteen years, although, by reason of his age, he is entitled to be acquitted of that offence, may yet, under section 9 of the same Act, be convicted of an indecent assault.

Case stated by Vaughan Williams, J., as follows:—

Robert John Williams was indicted for having, at the parish of Holywell, on the 30th day of November, 1891, feloniously, unlawfully, and carnally known a girl under the age of thirteen years, to wit, one Mary Hannah Jones, of the age of nine years.

The case came to be tried before me at Mold at the Spring Assizes, 1892.

It was suggested on behalf of the prisoner that he was under fourteen years of age, and I, after hearing the evidence, put the question to the jury, who found that the prisoner was under fourteen.

I directed the jury that the prisoner could not be convicted of the felony charged, or of an attempt to commit such felony.

The prosecution insisted that, under section 9 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, the prisoner was liable on the indictment for felony to be tried for indecent assault. I so held, and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty of indecent assault. I reserved this case on the question of law which arose at the trial whether a male under the age of fourteen years, indicted for an offence under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, who by reason of his age cannot be tried or convicted for such offence, can, under the provisions of section 9 of the said Act, be found guilty of an indecent assault, and I ordered the prisoner to be released on bail until this point should be decided.

The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, provides: Section 4. "Any person who unlawfully and carnally knows any girl under the age of thirteen years shall be guilty of felony." Section 9. "If, upon the trial of any indictment for rape or any offence made felony by section 4 of this Act, the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty . . . of an indecent assault, but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment, or of an attempt to commit the same, then, and in every such case, the jury may acquit the defendant of such felony and find him guilty of . . . an indecent assault."

No counsel appeared.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case the prisoner was indicted under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for the carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of thirteen years. It was proved that he was under the age at which, by the law of England, he can be convicted of that offence, and he was, therefore, very properly acquitted; nor could he, in my opinion, have been properly convicted of an attempt to do what by our law he must be deemed to have been physically incapable of doing. But I am of opinion that section 9 of the same Act says that under these circumstances a prisoner may properly be found guilty of an indecent assault. I think, therefore, that the conviction ought to be affirmed.

HAWKINS, J.—I also think that this conviction ought to be affirmed. But I cannot agree that a boy cannot be convicted of an attempt to commit an offence which, according to a presumption of law, he is incapable of completing. But this case is free from any such question. The prisoner was indicted under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act for having carnally known a girl under the age of thirteen years. It was proved that he was under the age of fourteen years, and therefore he could not have been found guilty of the crime of rape. The offence created by section 4 is of the same character as that of rape, and a recent case (Reg. v. Waite, ante, p. 80, [1892] 2 Q. B. 600) has decided that a boy under the age of fourteen years cannot be convicted under section 4 of carnally knowing a girl under the age of thirteen years. Therefore the learned judge was right in allowing the objection on the ground of the prisoner's age to prevail. The prisoner, however, was rightly upon his trial for the felony under section 4. Then there is section 9. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] I am of opinion that the jury, although not satisfied that the prisoner was guilty of the main offence charged under the earlier section, could find him guilty under section 9 of having committed an indecent assault.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, for the reasons given by my lord and my brother Hawkins, the prisoner was properly convicted of an indecent assault. The question of whether a person can be convicted of an attempt to do what he is by law deemed to be incapable of doing has not yet been settled, and does not arise here. I will not deal with it until it does arise, but I am very much inclined to agree with the opinion expressed by my brother Hawkins.

DAY, J.—I agree that the conviction should be affirmed. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Hawkins. I agree also with what my brother Cave has said.

COLLINS, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). July 25, 1892.

BARNARDO v. FORD.
GOSSAGE'S CASE. (a.)

Habeas corpus—Appeal against issue of writ—Excuse for non-compliance with writ—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal against an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, but the order should not be set aside unless, in the opinion of the court, there are unquestionably no grounds for its issue.

The appellant, without authority from the parent, who had placed her child in his institution, handed over the child to a gentleman to be taken to Canada. This, it appeared, had taken place before the application by the parent for a writ of habeas corpus, and the appellant alleged that it was impossible for him to find the child.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 38 W. R. 315, 24 Q. B. D. 283), that the writ ought to issue, so that the facts might be further inquired into.

The law as laid down in Reg. v. Barnardo, Tye's case, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, as to what is a valid excuse for not producing a person in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus, discussed and disapproved by Lord Halsbury, L.C., and by Lords Watson, Herschell, and Hannen.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J.), reported as Reg. v. Barnardo, Gossage's case, 38 W. R. 315, 24 Q. B. D. 283, affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division, whereby it was ordered that a writ of habeas corpus should issue directed to the appellant commanding him to have the body of Harry Gossage before the court.

The facts and the whole course of the proceedings are set out in Lord Herschell's judgment.

They are shortly as follows:—The respondent, who is the mother by a former marriage of the boy Harry Gossage, in the autumn of 1888 intrusted him to the care of an organ grinder, by whom he was left destitute in the streets of Folkestone. By the intervention of a local clergyman he was received into a home belonging to the appellant. The mother was informed of the arrangement and expressed her satisfaction with it, but she declined to sign the usual agreement authorizing the removal of the boy to one of the colonies. Subsequently, in the same year, a Roman Catholic gentleman intervened, and with the mother's consent it was arranged that the boy should be placed in the St. Vincent's Home, Harrow-road, a Catholic institution. On the 16th of November application was made at Dr. Barnardo's Home for the transfer of the boy. Previously to that date Dr. Barnardo had accepted an offer made by Mr. Norton, a Canadian gentleman, to adopt the boy, and the boy was delivered to him on the 16th of November. For the purpose of avoiding interference on the part of the boy's relatives Mr. Norton had stipulated that he should leave no address. Correspondence followed between the appellant or his representatives and the persons interested in securing the transfer of the boy to the St. Vincent's Home, and at length an application was made for a writ of habeas corpus against Dr. Barnardo. In an affidavit filed by Dr. Barnardo he he stated that he had delivered the boy to Mr. Norton before any application was made to him by the mother, and that he did not know where Mr. Norton or the boy was and had no means of communicating with either of them.

The application came on for hearing before Mathew, J., on the 14th of March, 1889, when the learned judge, having read the affidavits filed, and heard the cross-examination of the appellant, refused to order the writ to issue. No further steps were taken till the 23rd of November, 1889, when a rule nisi was granted for a writ of habeas corpus by the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench.

The Queen's Bench Division made absolute the order for the issue of the writ, and this order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Dr. Barnardo appealed.

The appeal was heard in the first instance before Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lords Bramwell, Herschell, Field, and Hannen, when a preliminary objection was taken that the order made by the High Court that a writ of habeas corpus should issue was not a "judgment or order" within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and consequently that there was no right of appeal, and the argument was confined to this point at the hearing on the 24th of April, 1891.

Sir W. Phillimore (Joseph Walton and Forbes Lankester with him), for the respondent.—There is no right of appeal to the Court of Appeal.

They referred to Wade's case, reported in a note to Blake's case, 2 M. & S. 428; The Hottentot Venus, 13 East, 195; Guérin v. Bank of France, 5 Times L. R. 160; Bell-Cox v. Hakes, 39 W. R. 145, 15 App. Cas. 506.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rigby, Q.C. (Finlay, Q.C., Cock, Q.C., and W. Baker with him), for the appellant.—Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, extends the right of appeal: Overseers of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 30; Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214; Allcroft v. Bishop of London, [1891] A. C. 666.

Sir W. Phillimore replied.

The HOUSE took time for consideration as to the preliminary objection.

The appeal was afterwards heard on the 4th and 5th of April and 6th of May, 1892, upon the merits before Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lords Watson, Herschell, Macnaghten, Morris, and Hannen.

Rigby, Q.C., and Cock, Q.C. (Finlay, Q.C., and W. Baker with them), for the appellant.

Joseph Walton and Forbes Lankester (Sir W. Phillimore with them), for the respondent.

R. v. Viner, 2 Lev. 128; Reg. v. Roberts, 2 F. & F. 272; In re Matthews, 12 Ir. C. L. Rep. 233; 56 Geo. 3, c. 100, s. 3; Reg. v. Barnardo, Tye's case, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, were referred to.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—As to the preliminary point in this case I have entertained grave doubts, and I cannot say that even now those doubts have been entirely removed; but it does not seem to me a question upon which I should insist so strongly on my own opinion that I should differ from the rest of your lordships.

As to the merits I was for a considerable time under the impression that both parties were arguing this question upon the view that the facts were already ascertained and that whatever the form of procedure, it was upon a substantially agreed state of the evidence, though, of course, they differed upon the question what inference should be drawn from the state of the evidence so already ascertained. Very late in the argument it turned out that the parties (at least, one of them) did not acquiesce in that view, but desired a return to the writ, so that upon the return further questions of evidence might be raised.

I think it was unfortunate that some indication of that contention did not earlier appear, either before your lordships or in the courts below.

Of course it is true to say that the respondents, when they found the court was in their favour upon the state of the evidence as it then appeared, were not bound to raise the further question as to what might appear on the return, and what might happen when the return was made. I do not, therefore, think that they have prejudiced their right to a return.

As, therefore, there is to be a return, and more evidence may be adduced to show what is the real state of the facts, I designedly abstain from saying anything which may preclude me from forming a perfectly unbiassed judgment when all the facts have been finally ascertained. But it is of importance, I think, to say, since it may tend to shorten the inquiry which the respondents suggest that they propose to make, that I cannot acquiesce in the view that some of the learned judges below seem to have entertained—that if a court is satisfied that illegal detention has ceased before application for the writ has been made, nevertheless the writ might issue in order to vindicate the authority of the court against a person who has once, though not at the time of the issue of the writ, unlawfully detained another or wrongfully parted with the custody of another. This is a view that I cannot agree to. I think, under such circumstances, the writ ought not to issue at all, as it is not the appropriate procedure for punishing such conduct.

Of course, where a counterfeited release has taken place, and a pretended ignorance of the place of custody or of the identity of the custodian is insisted on, a court may, and ought, to examine into the facts by the writ of habeas corpus, because the detention is, in fact, being continued by someone who is really the agent of the original wrongdoer to continue and persist in the unlawful detention. But assume the fact that the detention has ceased, then the writ of habeas corpus is, in my judgment, inapplicable.

For the reasons I have given I say nothing about the facts in this case; but, treating the facts as still open to inquiry, I think this appeal should be dismissed, upon the ground that the respondents have a right to the return, and I so move your lordships.

Lord WATSON.—I concur in the judgment which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor. Seeing that the writ must go, and that the appellant will have the opportunity of making further explanations, I refrain from comment upon the facts already in in evidence; but I wish to make it clear that my reasons for agreeing with the judgment moved are not quite the same with those by which some of the learned judges in the court below were influenced.

The remedy of habeas corpus is, in my opinion, intended to facilitate the release of persons actually detained in unlawful custody, and was not meant to afford the means of inflicting penalties upon those persons by whom they were at some time or other illegally detained. Accordingly, the writ invariably sets forth that the individual whose release is sought, whether adult or infant, is taken and detained in the custody of the person to whom it is addressed, and rightly so, because it is the fact of detention, and nothing else, which gives the court its jurisdiction.

I find that in The Queen v. Barnardo, Tye's case, Lindley, L.J., said: "As a matter of law, I think that it is no valid excuse for not producing a child or other person in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus to state inability to obey, if such inability is the result of the previous illegal conduct of the person to whom the writ is addressed." His lordship added: "Persons who illegally put a child out of their power do so at their peril, and if they are ordered to produce the child, no excuse founded on their own inability to comply with the order will be held a sufficient answer to the writ." The circumstances of that case were not altogether the same with those with which your lordships have to deal. The Master of the Rolls does not appear to have differed in opinion from Lindley, L.J., whilst Cotton, L.J., seems to have treated the case as one of contempt in parting with the custody of the child. In the present case Lord Esher has adopted and repeated, in forcible language, the view expressed by Lindley, L.J., in The Queen v. Barnardo, although his lordship's observations are mainly directed to the case of a child. I venture to doubt whether the law laid down by Lindley, L.J., in these broad terms is sound. If it be so, then the writ may be used as a convenient process for punishing a gaoler who has connived at the escape of one of the prisoners under his charge. I see no difference in principle between the case of a gaoler so misconducting himself and the case of a man who unlawfully parts with the custody of an infant. To order the latter to recover the custody of the child, and to place its person at the disposal of the court, may, and probably will, necessitate the employment by him of agents and detectives, and application for the assistance of foreign courts, which, in my opinion, are neither more nor less than penalties imposed in respect of his breach of duty. I do not for a moment suggest that there is not a legal wrong committed in both cases; but that wrong is the very reverse of illegal detention, for which alone the writ of habeas corpus was meant to give a remedy. If there be no other remedy in such cases, I am satisfied that it is for the Legislature, and not for any court, either of law or equity, to provide one; and I cannot see the propriety of the court applying to these cases a remedy which was enacted for a totally different purpose. It is, in my opinion, a grave objection to the use of habeas corpus for punitive purposes that the prosecutor would have the unusual privilege of hunting the offender from court to court until he found a tribunal willing to convict. Although that privilege has, with much propriety, been conceded in all cases where there is actual detention, I can hardly conceive that the Legislature would tolerate it in cases where detention has ceased.

Where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the person charged with unlawfully detaining a child or adult had de facto ceased to have any custody or control, I am of opinion that the writ ought not to issue. A man who parts with the custody of a child after he is served with the process of the court, or who evades service in order that he may get rid of such custody, commits a plain contempt, for which he is answerable to the court. Even in that case I doubt whether it is competent, and I do not doubt that it is inexpedient, to enforce the writ de plano. The case ought to be dealt with, in such circumstances, as one of contempt; and the court has power to pronounce an order which will compel the quondam custodian to choose between placing himself in a position which will make him liable to the writ, and bearing the consequences of his contumacy. I think it right to add that, in my opinion, no contempt is committed by a person who, lawfully or unlawfully, absolutely gives up the custody and control of a child from the mere apprehension that, by retaining it, he may became liable to a writ of habeas corpus, and without any notice that such a proceeding will be taken.

In March, 1889, eight months before this proceeding commenced, a similar application was made to Mathew, J., who, after hearing the cross-examination of the appellant by counsel on behalf of the respondent, came to the conclusion that he had ceased to have the custody or control of the boy, Harry Gossage, in November, 1888. In these circumstances the learned judge, taking what I conceive to be the right view of the law, refused to issue the writ. Four months afterwards the decision of the Court of Appeal was given in The Queen v. Barnardo, Tye's case; and it is difficult to resist the impression that the present proceedings were brought in order to get the benefit of the novel doctrine laid down in that case, which had found no favour with Mathew, J. Had there been no other reasons for sustaining it I should not have hesitated to reverse the judgment appealed from. But I willingly defer to those of your lordships who are of opinion that the case may be more conveniently disposed of after a return has been made to the writ, although I am not inclined to prolong litigation of this kind, which is little calculated to advance the interests of institutions engaged in the useful work of reclaiming children from the streets. When a waif has been taken up and cared for by one of them, he apparently becomes an object of interest and competition; and funds are wasted in litigation which would be better employed in the rescue of children who are still uncared for.

Lord HERSCHELL.—At the hearing of this appeal the preliminary objection was taken that no appeal lay from an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue. It was pointed out that a rule or order calling on a person to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue is of modern origin, that application for the writ was formerly made ex parte, and that the service of the writ was the first step which affected the party alleged to be detaining another in illegal custody; and it was contended that the order made by a court or judge that a writ of habeas corpus should issue was not a "judgment or order" within the meaning of the appeal section of the Judicature Act. It was urged that it was merely a direction by the court or a judge that a process of the court should issue, and that from such an order or direction no appeal could lie. At the close of the argument I was disposed, in common, I believe, with those of your lordships who heard the appeal to accede to this view, but subsequent consideration has led me to the conclusion that it cannot be sustained.

The appeal section is very general in its terms, and it has received a wide interpretation in this House in the case of The Overseers of Walsall v. The London and North-Western Railway Co. I see no safe ground for holding that it is inapplicable to the issue of a writ of habeas corpus except that suggested; namely, that such an order merely directs the issue of a process of the court. But it seems to me that if on this ground it were held that no appeal lay, the decision must logically have a much wider scope. An order for the issue of a writ of mandamus might equally be said to be a direction for the issue of the process of the court. Before the Judicature Act no appeal lay from such an order, but it has been held that under the appeal section of the Judicature Act such an order may now be made the subject of an appeal.

I am unable to see on what basis the decision that the order now under consideration was not within the appeal section could be rested which would not logically apply to a writ of mandamus, and, indeed, to a writ of prohibition, and to other cases which might be mentioned. I think that the House would hesitate before arriving at the conclusion that no appeal lay in the class of cases to which I have referred, the view that they were within the appeal section having long been acted upon, and being obviously convenient, as tending often to expedite litigation, and to diminish its cost. On the other hand, I do not think there is any difficulty in holding that an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, even when made ex parte, is an "order" within the purview of the appeal section of the Judicature Act. It is to be observed that in the Act of George III., where duties were imposed on the judge in relation to writs of habeas corpus, the language used is that the judge is to "award" a writ of habeas corpus. And it is certain that the practice of proceeding by a rule or order nisi on the application for a habeas corpus was well established at the time the Judicature Act was passed. An "order" absolute for a habeas corpus was then a common order. I would further point out that if an appeal from such an order as this were held to be incompetent, considerable injustice might often result. The Court of Appeal, when entertaining an appeal, which, of course, they would, in general, be competent to do, from the order made by the court below on the return of the writ, might reverse that order on the ground that the writ ought never to have been issued, but they would be unable to deal with the costs incured in relation to the order for the writ, which would have to be borne by the party against whom the application for the writ had improperly been made.

Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be held to be competent.

I now proceed to deal with the merits of the appeal.

The appellant is the founder and director of certain institutions, comprising homes for destitute children. The respondent is the mother, by a former marriage, of a boy named Harry Gossage. In the autumn of 1888 a clergyman residing at Folkestone wrote to the appellant, requesting him to receive into his home the boy Harry Gossage, whom he had found in Folkestone destitute and homeless. The boy accordingly became an inmate of the appellant's homes. One of the officials of the homes wrote to the mother of the boy, and on the 29th of September received a letter from her, in which she said: "I shall be very pleased if you will keep my son Henry Gossage in Doctor Barnardo's Home, as I cannot afford to keep him myself." On the 11th of November Mr. Newdigate, a gentleman residing at Leamington, but who was a stranger to the appellant, wrote a letter to him, stating that Mrs. Gossage had called upon him to express her desire for a Catholic home for her boy, and informing him that St. Vincent's Home, Harrow-road, was prepared to receive him, and that he was writing to the Rev. D. Hope to arrange the transfer. On the 16th of November Mr. Hope accordingly wrote to Dr. Barnardo that he proposed sending for the boy, and inquiring what time of day he should send. Some correspondence followed between the appellant or his representatives and Mr. Newdigate, in which the appellant declined to consent to the transfer of the boy to the Roman Catholic institution. On the 1st of January, 1889, Mr. Newdigate enclosed a document signed by the mother, expressing her desire that her son should at once be transferred by Dr. Barnardo to Mr. Hope, who had undertaken to place him in St. Vincent's Home, Harrow-road, London. The letter informed Dr. Barnardo that unless the mother's order was complied with within seven days he should instruct his solicitor to take out a writ of habeas corpus. A letter followed from Mr. Hope, which was answered on the 8th of January by the secretary of the appellant's homes in these terms: "I am instructed to inform you that it is not possible to comply with your request, as the boy in question is not, and has not been for a considerable time, an inmate or under the control of these institutions." On the 1st of March following the appellant was served with a summons to attend a judge of the Queen's Bench Division to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus, commanding him to produce the body of the said Harry Gossage, should not be issued. Several affidavits were filed before the summons came on for hearing. In one filed by Dr. Barnardo he stated that before he received any application from the mother for the return of the child, he, on the 16th of November, 1888, transferred him to the care of a Mr. William Norton, an American gentleman, who was at that time on a visit to this country, and that he believed that the boy was taken by Mr. Norton to Canada a few days later. He further deposed that he had not, since he handed over the boy, heard either from him or Mr. Norton, that he did not know where he or Mr. Norton was, that he had no means of communicating with either of them. He further stated that before handing over the boy he satisfied himself that Mr. Norton was a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child. In an affidavit sworn a few days subsequently he deposed that the said Harry Gossage was not then, and since the 16th of November, 1888, when he transferred him to the care of Mr. Norton, had not been, in his custody or power.

The summons came on for hearing before Mathew, J., on the 14th of March, 1889, when the learned judge, having read the affidavits filed, and heard the cross-examination of the appellant, refused to order the writ to issue. No further steps were taken till the 23rd of November, 1889, when a rule nisi was granted for a writ of habeas corpus by the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench. In the meantime the case of The Queen v. Barnardo, Tye's case, had been decided in the Court of Appeal. This was a decision affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division quashing a return to a habeas corpus and granting an attachment against the defendant for contempt.

It was in consequence of the judgments given in the Court of Appeal, which laid down that it was not an excuse for non-compliance with a writ that the defendant had parted with the custody of the child to another person, if he had done so wrongfully, that the application was again made for a writ of habeas corpus in the present case. In addition to the affidavits used on the former application further affidavits were filed. I do not think it necessary, for reasons which I will state presently, to enter upon an examination of any of the affidavits.

It will be sufficient to state that Dr. Barnardo deposed that it was on the 10th of November, 1888, that he first made the acquaintance of Mr. Norton, into whose custody he delivered the boy, that Mr. Norton showed him letters of introduction from well-known people in Canada, and stated that his object was to discover if Dr. Barnardo could place a little boy under his care; that he was anxious to find a boy who would not be interfered with by his relations, as he wished, if he liked the boy, to adopt him as his son. Dr. Barnardo accordingly brought five of the boys in his home to see Mr. Norton, amongst whom was Harry Gossage. After talking with him for some time Mr. Norton asked to be allowed to adopt him. Dr. Barnardo accordingly arranged that he should be ready on the 16th of November, and on that day, when Mr. Norton again came to the homes, he took the boy away with him. According to Dr. Barnardo's statement, Mr. Norton expressed himself as very anxious that there should not be any interference on the part of the child's relatives, and his affidavits stated that he did not know where Mr. Norton or the boy then was, nor did he know their or either of their addresses, and that he had no means of communicating with them or either of them.

After hearing argument the Queen's Bench Division made absolute the order for the issue of the writ, and this order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

If in order to support this judgment it were necessary to give my adhesion to the law laid down in the case of The Queen v. Barnardo, Tye's case, I should hesitate much before doing so.

Having regard to the nature of a writ of habeas corpus, and the purpose for which it was designed and has hitherto been employed, I cannot feel satisfied, as at present advised, that it is not a good return to the writ that the person to whom it relates was not at the time it was issued in the custody, power, or control of the person upon whom it is served. The doctrine that he must also show that before the writ was issued, or before he had notice of the application for its issue, he had not wrongfully parted with the custody of the person named in the writ is novel, and appears to me to involve great difficulty. A gaoler who has allowed a prisoner to escape has wrongfully parted with the custody of that person; could he be commanded by a writ of habeas corpus issued after the escape to produce him and be committed for contempt of court if he failed to do so? Other illustrations might be given to show the difficulty of assenting to the broad proposition laid down in the Court of Appeal. The question is not whether one who has parted with the custody of a person committed to his care can be made amenable to the law if he wrongfully parts with that custody, but whether the writ of habeas corpus is the appropriate remedy. The terms of the writ require the recipient to have the body of the person named in it "taken and detained under your custody," as is said, "together with the day and cause of his being detained to undergo and receive all and singular such matters and things as the said court shall then and there consider of and concerning him in this behalf." This indicates that the very basis of the writ is the allegation, and the primâ facie evidence in support of it, that the person to whom the writ is directed is unlawfully detaining another in custody. To use it as a means of compelling one who has unlawfully parted with the custody of another person to regain that custody, or of punishing him for having parted with it, strikes me at present as being a use of the writ unknown to the law and not warranted by it.

But the question remains whether, even assuming that the decision in Reg. v. Barnardo was not well founded, the appellant is entitled to have the order that the writ should issue discharged. I have already given my reasons for thinking that this House cannot reject, as incompetent, an appeal against an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, but I feel most strongly that such appeals are not to be encouraged. Where any tribunal believes that a person is or may be under detention in unlawful custody, and issues a writ of habeas corpus accordingly, no court of appeal ought lightly to interfere with the issue of the writ. The order for its issue ought only to be set aside if there be, beyond question, no ground for it. If, for example, in the present case it had been an admitted fact that before notice of the application for the writ the appellant had ceased to have the custody of, or any control over, the boy alleged to be detained, that might have been ground for reversing the order of the Queen's Bench Division. But where the court entertains a doubt whether this be the fact, it is unquestionably entitled to use the pressure of the writ to test the truth of the allegation and to require a return to be made to it. Now it is impossible to read the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice without seeing that he did entertain such a doubt, and that he was not prepared, upon the affidavits, to accept as conclusive the statements of the appellant. At your lordships' bar the counsel for the respondent contended that they had a right to cross-examine the appellant, and that the proper occasion on which to try the question was when he had returned to the writ that he was not detaining the child, and that it was not, at the time the writ was issued, in his custody, power, or control. I think this view is the correct one; the truth of the return may, no doubt, be put in issue, and I feel myself unable to advise your lordships that the Queen's Bench Division were not in point of law justified in issuing the writ. I must not be understood as indicating that I think the story told by the appellant is untrue. But, as the matter is to undergo further investigation, it would obviously be improper to enter upon any discussion of the statements contained in the affidavits, or to express any opinion upon them. I come to this conclusion with some regret, as the question intended to be raised by this appeal is one of no small importance. But in my opinion it was premature to raise it at the present stage, and I think it very important not to set a precedent which might prove prejudicial to the liberty of the subject, of which the writ of habeas corpus is the most effectual safeguard.

For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I do not dissent from the motion which has been proposed. I cannot say that this is a case in which there ought not to be an opportunity of further inquiring into the circumstances under which Dr. Barnardo parted with the child, and ascertaining beyond all doubt whether the child is or is not still under Dr. Barnardo's control or within his reach. In a matter of this sort it would not, I think, be desirable to interfere with the discretion of the court below unless a stronger case for interference were made out than the one which the learned counsel for the appellant have been able to present.

Whether the child, if it can be got back, ought to be handed over to the mother or dealt with in accordance with her directions, or directions given in her name, is another question, upon which it would not be proper to intimate an opinion at present.

Whether or not Dr. Barnardo has rendered himself liable to an attachment may be a matter to be discussed hereafter. That question also ought, I think, to be left wholly unprejudiced by any comment upon facts or circumstances which have not as yet been thoroughly sifted or tested by cross-examination.

I desire, however, to state my concurrence with the opinion expressed by Sir Edward Fry. I entirely agree with him in thinking that the writ of habeas corpus ought not to be wrested from its proper purpose, and used as an instrument to punish a man for an illegal or unauthorized act complete before the jurisdiction of the court can be supposed to have attached. I will only add that it is very much to be regretted that the managers of a charitable institution, which has done and is, I have no doubt, doing an immense deal of good, should have tried to put off a troublesome correspondent by letters which, to say the least, were uncandid and misleading.

Lord MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved, but I desire to say that in doing so I adopt the reasons assigned and the views given of the law, both in the Queen's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal, as the foundation of my concurrence in the judgment.

Lord HANNEN.—I entirely concur in the conclusions at which your lordships have arrived, and I have only to add that the opinion expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Herschell, so exactly represents the view which I take of the case that I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has fallen from the noble and learned lord.

Solicitors for the appellant, Nisbet & Daw.

Solicitors for the respondent, Leathley & Phipson.

Court of Appeal.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) — Feb. 24.

In re POTTS.
Ex parte TAYLOR & SONS. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Judgment creditors — Appointment of receiver of equitable interest — Secured creditors — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 45, 168.

In July, 1891, judgment was obtained by the appellants in an action for £316, under which execution was issued against the debtor's goods with no effect. In January, 1892, the debtor became entitled, under the will of his mother, to a share in her residuary real and personal estate. In March, 1892, the appellants obtained on an ex parte ap- plication an order appointing a receiver in respect of such share. In May, 1892, the debtor was adjudged bankrupt. The appellants moved for a declaration that they were secured creditors in respect of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under his mother's will by virtue of the order appointing the receiver.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the decision of Vaughan Williams, J., ante, p. 255), that the order did not constitute them secured creditors.

Per Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.—An order appointing a receiver ought not to be made on an ex parte application to the judge in chambers.

Appeal from a decision of Vaugham Williams, J. (ante, p. 255).

In July, 1891, the appellants recovered judgment against the debtor for £316 15s. and costs. The appellants issued a writ of fi. fa. under this judgment against the goods of the debtor, but failed to recover anything.

In January, 1892, the debtor became entitled under the will of his mother to a share in the residuary real and personal estate of the testatrix; and on the 31st of March, 1892, the appellants obtained from the judge in chambers on an ex parte application an order appointing a receiver of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate of his mother. (The terms of this order are fully set out in the report of the case below).

On the 4th of April the appellants gave notice of this order to the executors of the will. On the 16th of May, 1892, a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition, upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt.

The executors were now in a position to distribute the estate to the beneficiaries under the mother's will, but no payment had been made either to the receiver or to the trustee in bankruptcy. The appellants applied to Vaughan Williams, J., for a declaration that by virtue of the appointment of the receiver they were secured creditors of the debtor of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under his mother's will.

Vaughan Williams, J., dismissed the application.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Micklem, for the appellants.—The effect of the order appointing the receiver was to deliver the debtor's share under the will of his mother to his creditors in equitable execution, and there has been a completion of execution as required by section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: see Mitford on Pleadings in Chancery, 5th ed., p. 148; Angell v. Draper, 1 Vern. 399; Davidson v. Foley, 1 Vern. 399 (a); Dillon v. Plaskett, 2 Bli. N. S. 239; Watts v. Jefferyes, 3 Mac. & G. 422; Smith v. Hurst, 1 Coll. 705; Thornton v. Finch, 4 Giff. 515, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 414; Macnicoll v. Parnell, 35 W. R. 773; In re Peace, 31 W. R. 899, 24 Ch. D. 405; Crowe v. Price, 37 W. R. 424, 22 Q. B. D. 429; Fuggle v. Brand, 11 Q. B. D. 711, 32 W. R. Dig. 160; Westhead v. Riley, 32 W. R. 273, 25 Ch. D. 413; Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 27 W. R. 3, 9 Ch. D. 275; Tillett v. Pearson, 22 W. R. 209; In re Cooper, 37 W. R. 330; Rapier v. Wright, 28 W. R. 827, 14 Ch. D. 638; Brereton v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 47, 21 Q. B. D. 226; Ex parte Evans, In re Watkins, 28 W. R. 127, 13 Ch. D. 252. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—You must show that this order is a "mortgage, charge, or lien" within section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.] Section 168 is not exhaustive, for section 45 is required to limit the rights of execution creditors. The "equitable interest" in section 45 (2) is not intended to mean equitable interests in land only, for receivers are now appointed over other things besides land. Vaughan Williams, J., based his decision on In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington & Co., 37 W. R. 130, 22 Q. B. D. 187, but that case does not apply here, for there the receiver was appointed in respect of goods only. That decision is no authority for saying that the appointment of a receiver can never make the judgment creditor a secured creditor.

Levasseur v. Mason & Barry, 39 W. R. 596, [1891] 2 Q. B. 73; Smith v. Cowell, 29 W. R. 227, 6 Q. B. D. 75; and Booth v. Hutchinson, 21 W. R. 116, L. R. 15 Eq. 30, were also referred to.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent.—Section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not apply to this case. Under that section it is only in the case of an equitable interest in land that execution is completed by the appointment of a receiver. The appointment of this receiver merely amounted to an order directing to whom payment was to be made of the debtor's share in his mother's estate, and it did not effect a transfer of any interest in property which could make the creditor a secured creditor. The creditor has neither a mortgage, charge, or lien, and therefore the right of the trustee in bankruptcy prevails.

He cited In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington; In re Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131; Ex parte Evans, In re Watkins.

Reed, Q.C., in reply, referred to Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the appellants, Messrs. Taylor & Son, who are judgment creditors, are asking for a declaration that they are secured creditors in the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor. The judgment debtor, before he became bankrupt, became entitled under the will of his mother to a share of her residuary estate, and the appellants obtained ex parte an order appointing a receiver; and that order contained an order to the receiver that if the executors of the will should pay the money to him, he should not pay it to the judgment debtor, but to the appellants. There was nothing in the order requiring the executors to pay the money to the receiver, and it did not bind them; it would not have been just if it had, because they were not parties to the summons on which the order was made. Then, before anything else had been done, a receiving order was made against the judgment debtor, and the official receiver became his trustee in bankruptcy. The question now arises as to whether this money, to which the judgment debtor is entitled under his mother's will, passes to the trustee in bankruptcy or to the appellants.

It is a question of bankruptcy law, and the governing section is section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section provides that "on the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose." Now in this case the appellants are seeking to enforce a remedy against the property of the debtor, and if that section stood alone it would be clear that all the property of the debtor is to pass to the official receiver, and no creditor is to have any remedy against it. But sub-section 2 of section 9 contains a proviso that section 9 shall not affect the power of any secured creditor to realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if the section had not been passed. The definition of "secured creditor" is found in section 168, which says that "secured creditor" means a person holding a mortgage, charge, or lien on the property of the debtor, or any part thereof, as a security for a debt due to him from the debtor. The appellants have not got a mortgage or a common law lien on the debtor's property. Can it be said that this order appointing a receiver amounts to either an equitable lien or an equitable charge? A charge is a well-known thing; if a debtor has money owing to him by a third person, the creditor can charge the debt in the hands of the third person. If in the present case the order had charged the fund in the hands of the executors, and had been an order on them to pay the fund to the receiver, then, although that might not amount to a common law charge, it might possibly be an equitable charge. But suppose that the man who holds the money and who is obliged to pay it has no notice of the order charging the money, and has no opportunity of answering, it would in such a case be most unjust to say that a charge was created, and subsequent notice would not remedy the injustice. Even if the order in this case had been directed to the executors I do not think it would be binding on them. It does not, however, profess to be binding on them, and therefore it does not create a charge on the money in their hands, and the appellants do not bring themselves within the definition of "secured creditors" in section 168.

I think that in In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington the proper interpretation was placed on sections 9 and 168.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—The question is, does this order appointing a receiver and the subsequent notice given to the executors of the will create an equitable charge on the share of the residuary estate to which the debtor was entitled, so as to make the appellants secured creditors? It is said that the effect of the order was to deliver to the appellants the debtor's interest under the will in equitable execution. There is in reality no such thing as equitable execution, it is only a short phrase for describing a certain procedure by means of which a judgment creditor can in some cases obtain payment. Under the old practice it was necessary to file a bill in chancery against the debtor, and also to join as a party the person who held the property which the judgment creditor wished to attach. What has been done in the present case is an incomplete process of obtaining payment, and no charge is created on the fund in the hands of the executors because there has been no order on them to pay the fund to the receiver. The appellants are in the position of having the right to obtain an equitable interest in the fund, but have not as yet actually obtained the equitable interest. I therefore agree that the appellants are not secured creditors, and I do not think that the judge in chambers, when making the order appointing the receiver, ever intended that a charge should be created. It was, moreover, very irregular for the appellants to get such an order on an ex parte application.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree. This is an attempt to procure a charge in a way which was never intended by the Act of Parliament. As a matter of practice the order was improperly obtained, it having been obtained ex parte, but as between the appellants and their debtor it is a good order. It does not, however, amount to the creation of a charge on the fund in question. It is only one step in the proceedings, a direction to the receiver to receive the money and to pay it over to the judgment creditors. To create a charge it would have been necessary to make the persons in whose hands the fund was—that is, the executors—parties to the application. I cannot conceive the judge in chambers creating a charge on property in the hands of a third person without giving that third person an opportunity of appearing.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Leyton, Sons, & Lendon.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Dec. 19; Jan. 14.

In re DENVER HOTEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Purchase by company of its own shares—Sale by company of assets for good consideration—Shares in excess of wants of company—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.

A company was registered in 1889 to carry on the business of hotel proprietors, with a capital of £130,000, divided into 26,000 shares of £5 each. In 1891 the company took on lease the M. Hotel, and increased their capital by creating 5,000 new shares of £5 each. Debentures to the amount of £75,000 were issued, all of which were outstanding, and there were very few other creditors. Upwards of £23,000 was expended on the M. Hotel, and it was worked at a loss. The company agreed with B., who was one of the lessors of the M. Hotel, to hand over the possession of the M. Hotel to B., who should pay the rent and carry on the hotel. The directors undertook to obtain, and obtained, from the shareholders the necessary resolutions for reducing the capital of the company by writing off £23,710 of fully-paid ordinary shares held by B. and his associates, and undertook to obtain the sanction of the High Court of Justice in England to such reduction, whereupon such shares should be extinguished. B. was to pay to the company, for stores and goodwill, 15,000 dols. The company had power, under its articles of association, to reduce its capital by cancelling capital.

Held, that this transaction was not a purchase by the company of its own shares, but was a sale by the company of some of its assets for less than their cash value, in consideration of a release from heavy burdens and of a surrender of shares.

Held, also, that the sanction of the court to the transaction was only necessary for the permanent extinguishment of the shares, and that the court had jurisdiction to, and would, sanction the transaction.

Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409, distinguished.

This was an appeal by the company from a decision of North, J., refusing to sanction a scheme for the reduction of the company's capital. The company was registered in November, 1889, and was established for the purpose of carrying on the business of hotel proprietors, and in particular to purchase the Windsor Hotel at Denver, State of Colorado, United States of America. The original capital of the company was £130,000, divided into 26,000 shares of £5 each. The Windsor Hotel was accordingly purchased on the incorporation of the company, and carried on successfully by the company, which had paid substantial dividends until 1892. In May, 1891, the company took on lease a second hotel in Denver, called the Metropole Hotel, at a rental of £7,000 per annum. In order to meet the cost of fitting, furnishing, and establishing this hotel the company increased its capital by the creation of 5,000 new ordinary shares of £5 each, of which 3,474 shares had been issued and fully paid up, making the total subscribed capital £147,370. Debentures to the amount of £65,000 to bearer, and of £10,000 to registered holder, had been issued by the company, all of which were outstanding, and beyond these there were very few other creditors. The outlay on the Metropole Hotel had been upwards of £23,000, and the fitting and furnishing of it had been placed in the hands of the company's managing director, Mr. Wm. Hy. Bush, who had largely exceeded the expenditure sanctioned by the directors. The Metropole Hotel was worked by the company at a loss. In consequence of this, differences arose between the company and its managing director, who was one of the lessors of the Metropole Hotel, and ultimately it was agreed that, upon the special resolution hereinafter stated being duly confirmed, he, and the holders of the shares mentioned in the resolution would take over the Metropole Hotel and furniture at cost price on having the shares held by them cancelled, and the capital paid up by them set off as against the purchase price. It was stated that this proposal, if carried out, would be a very beneficial one for the company, and would avoid a considerable loss, and that on relinquishing the Metropole Hotel the capital proposed to be extinguished would be in excess of the company's wants. The lease of the Metropole was an onerous one, and it was estimated that the furniture and fittings would not realize anything approaching £23,000 (the sum which the company had spent upon the hotel) if sold.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At general meetings of the company, held respectively on the 30th of March and the 14th of April, 1892, the following resolution was unanimously passed and confirmed as a special resolution:—"That the conditions contained in the memorandum of association of the company be modified by reducing the capital from £155,000, divided into 31,000 shares of £5 each, by paying off the capital represented by the following 4,742 ordinary shares of the company—that is to say, the shares numbered 17,531 to 20,080, 22,154 to 22,587, 25,001 to 26,000, and 28,046 to 28,803 inclusive (such capital being in excess of the wants of the company), and by extinguishing altogether the liability thereon, so that the capital may, as reduced, consist of £131,290, divided into 26,258 shares of £5 each." At the meeting of the 30th of March there were present, either personally or by proxy, holders of 19,995 shares of the company of the nominal value of £99,975, in addition to the 4,742 shares the subject of the special resolution, and together amounting to 24,737 shares of the nominal value of £123,685 out of a total sum of £147,370.

The agreement, dated the 8th of March, 1892, and made between the Denver Hotel Co. (Limited) of the one part, and W. H. Bush, of the other part, was in the following terms:—

(1) The company shall deliver over to the said W. H. Bush possession of the hotel, situate in the City of Denver, and known as the Metropole Hotel, together with the furniture, fittings, household effects, and other chattels of the company now being in or about the same. (2) The said W. H. Bush shall carry on the said hotel as heretofore as a first-class hotel on the English system, and shall keep the building and the said furniture and effects duly insured against fire, and will pay all rent, taxes, and other outgoings in respect of the said hotel, and all municipal and other taxes, and will pay all debts incurred in carrying on the same, and will not do or suffer anything to be done whereby the lease of the said hotel may become forfeitable or whereby any of the said furniture or effects may be liable to be taken in execution. (3) The directors of the company will forthwith take all necessary steps to obtain from the shareholders the necessary resolutions for reducing the capital of the company by writing off the £23,710 of fully-paid ordinary shares"—which were therein specified—"standing in the name of W. H. Bush and his associates, and, if and so soon as such reduction is confirmed by the High Court of Justice in England, will make over to the said W. H. Bush by bill of sale the fittings, furniture, and effects belonging to the company in or about the said Metropole Hotel, in full discharge of all money paid up upon and all other claims and demands whatsoever of the registered holders in respect of the shares above mentioned, which shall thereupon be extinguished, the said W. H. Bush procuring all proper discharges for the same. (4) If the said resolutions shall be confirmed as aforesaid, the said hotel shall be deemed to have been carried on as from the 1st of February, 1892, for and on account of the said W. H. Bush, and the accounts between him and the company shall be adjusted on that basis, he being debited with all rents, taxes, wages, and other outgoings, and being credited with all receipts, provided that the said W. H. Bush shall in that event pay to the company as and for the stores upon the said premises and the goodwill of the business the sum of 15,000 dols., such sum not being intended to be covered by the extinguishment of the said shares, and to be paid as to 5,000 dols. in cash, as to 5,000 dols. by note of the said W. H. Bush at six months' date, and carrying interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and as to the balance by a like note at twelve months' date, such notes to be acceptable for discount to the company's bankers in Colorado, without recourse upon the company."

The articles of association provided as follows:—4. The 13,000 shares of the original capital numbered 1 to 13,000 inclusive shall be preference shares, and the 13,000 shares numbered 13,001 to 26,000 inclusive shall be ordinary shares. In the event of the winding up of the company the holders of the preference shares shall be entitled to receive in full out of the assets of the company the amounts paid up on such shares in priority to the claims of the holders of the ordinary shares to be paid any amount in respect of such shares, and in the event of the capital being written off on a reduction of capital amounts paid or credited on the ordinary shares shall be written off before the amounts paid or credited on the preference shares. Each class of shares shall respectively be entitled to rank for the purposes of dividend in the manner hereinafter declared. 9. The funds of the company shall not be expended in the purchase of or lent upon the security of its own shares. 27. The directors may at any time accept a surrender of a share or shares on such terms and conditions as they may think fit. Any share or shares so surrendered may be disposed of in the same manner as a forfeited share. 45. The company may in general meeting reduce its capital by paying off capital, cancelling capital which has been lost or is unrepresented by available assets, reducing the liability on the shares, cancelling shares not taken or agreed to be taken by any person, or otherwise, as my seem expedient, and capital may be paid off upon the footing that it may be called up again or otherwise.

When the petition presented by the company for the confirmation of the special resolution came before the court, North, J., refused it, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction under the Companies Act, 1877, being of opinion that the arrangement amounted to a purchase by the company of its own shares, and an appreciable number of shareholders had not given their consent to the scheme.

The company appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kirby, for the company.—The shareholders unanimously approve of the scheme—that is, all who were present at the meeting, about six-sevenths of the whole number. If we bring ourselves within the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, ss. 9 and 3 respectively, the court can sanction the reduction.

They relied upon the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409, at p. 436. They also cited In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., 37 W. R. 249, 39 Ch. D. 582; In re Union Plate Glass Co., 37 W. R. 792, 42 Ch. D. 513; In re Quebrada Railway, Land, and Copper Co., 40 Ch. D. 363, 37 W. R. Dig. 34; In re Gatling Gun (Limited), 38 W. R. 317, 43 Ch. D. 628; and In re Agricultural Hotel Co., 39 W. R. 218, [1891] 1 Ch. 396.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the COURT was delivered by

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the refusal by North, J., to sanction a reduction of capital by a limited company, he being of opinion that he was precluded by decided cases from so doing. [His lordship referred to the company's memorandum and articles of association, the petition, and the agreement of the 8th of March, 1892, and continued:—] The arrangement referred to has been sanctioned by a special resolution of shareholders; all the shareholders were not present, but no shareholder has dissented. The debenture-holders and other creditors assent. The arrangement is deemed beneficial by every one. The substance of that arrangement, apart from the reduction of capital which the court is asked to sanction, is as follows—viz., that, in consideration of £3,000, to be paid by Mr. Bush to the company, and of his taking upon himself the obligations of the company under the lease, and of indemnifying the company against loss in respect of the Metropole Hotel since February, 1891, and in further consideration of his surrendering his shares to the company, the company will sell to him the lease and goodwill and furniture and stores of the hotel.

This appears to us to be a transaction which the company can carry out, with the consent of the debenture-holders, under the company's memorandum and articles of association, without the sanction of the court. The company can sell part of its assets, and it can accept a surrender of its shares under article 27. No doubt a surrender of shares in consideration of a payment in money or money's worth by the company is a purchase by it of its own shares, and is ultrà vires, as pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in Trevor v. Whitworth. But, as we understand this transaction, the company is giving nothing in the shape of money or other available assets for the shares which it acquires. The assets it parts with are the consideration for the release of the company from the heavy obligations and liabilities involved in the retention of the onerous lease of the hotel, and, on the other hand, the company is compromising a dispute with its managing director. The company might, no doubt, sell the stores and furniture for more than £3,000, but it would not in that way get rid of its liabilities under the lease. The bargain would be a good one for the company, even if the shares were not surrendered. The surrender of them is pure gain to the company. The buyer of the hotel no doubt hopes to make the hotel pay; he is himself one of the lessors, and may be able to make terms with the other lessors, and obtain a less onerous lease. His expectation of profit in some way induces him, not only to pay £3,000 in cash, but also to surrender his shares, and we see no reason why the company should not accept the surrender. The shares being fully paid up, their surrender involves no release by the company of any of its rights against the surrenderor. Under these circumstances the transaction is not really a purchase by the company of its own shares; the transaction is really a sale by the company of some of its assets for less than their cash value, in consideration of a release from heavy burdens and of a surrender of shares, for which, however, it is parting with no saleable assets whatever. The aid of the court is not wanted to sanction the transaction, except so far as the company desires to treat the shares when surrendered as permanently extinguished. Unless the capital is formally reduced the surrendered shares may be again issued; they will still be part of the company's nominal capital, and so affect the nominal rate of dividend.

The company will not want so large a nominal capital if the transaction is carried out. The case is thus brought within the Acts which authorize a reduction of capital with the sanction of the court (see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 131, ss. 9 et seq.; 40 & 41 Vict. c. 26, s. 3). If this transaction really was a purchase by the company of its own shares from one shareholder only, we are of opinion that the court could not sanction it. The purchase by the company involves the possession by the company of sufficient assets to pay for the shares bought, and the capital represented by such shares would not be lost, nor unrepresented by available assets. The capital might be in excess of the wants of the company within the words of section 3 of the Companies Act, 1877. But these words cannot, in our opinion, be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself by buying up his shares, and we cannot regard Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Trevor v. Whitworth as intimating that any such transaction is within the statute. His remarks were made to enforce his view that, apart from the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, it is ultrà vires of a limited company to buy its own shares, even if its memorandum and articles expressly authorize it to do so. But he was not contemplating preferring one shareholder to another of the same class as himself. All that the court is asked to do in this case is to authorize the company to reduce its nominal capital to the extent of the shares which it will not want when the proposed sale of the hotel is carried out. This, we think, the court can do, the sale itself being one which the company can effect without invoking the aid of the court. The cases upon reduction of capital are not in a satisfactory state, but none of them conflict with our present decision, having regard to the peculiar facts with which we have to deal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the company, Andrew, Mellor, & Smith.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Aug. 1, 1892.

BARBER v. MACKRELL. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Renewal—Guarantee—Variation—Discharge of surety.

This was a claim in an administration action. The following letter was sent to the claimant's firm by the testator, dated the 24th of December, 1866:—"In reply to your letter of the 22nd inst., I hereby guarantee the payment by F. of two bills you intend to renew for him, one for £1,048 10s. 5d. and the other for £462 6s. 6d., due respectively the 28th inst. and the 4th prox." Two bills were drawn by the claimant's firm on F. for three months, both dated the 22nd of December, 1866, one for £1,025 6s. 11d., and the other for £485 10s. These bills were not met.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

North, J., held that a "renewed" bill meant a bill between the same parties for the same amount for the same period as and commencing from the date of expiration of the original bill; and that, in this case, there was such a variation of the liability guaranteed that the guarantor's estate was released.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the word "renew" was not used in its technical sense by the testator, but that he meant to guarantee the payment of the amount of the old bills, and that nothing had happened to discharge him from his guarantee.

Decision of North, J. (40 W. R. 618), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported 40 W. R. 618).

This was a claim by the holder of two bills of exchange to prove in a suit for the administration of the estate of the late Mr. W. Mackrell, who died in 1867.

The firm of Messrs. Young, Sons, & Magnay were the holders of two bills of exchange for £1,048 10s. 5d. and £462 6s. 6d. respectively (amounting in the aggregate to £1,510 16s. 11d.), drawn by a Mr. Finch on and accepted by the London Quays, &c., Co. in favour of the said firm. The bills themselves having been lost, it did not appear for what period they had been drawn, but it was assumed to have been for three months.

On the 22nd of December, 1866, the said firm wrote as follows to Mackrell: "Dear sir,—We have received a . . . letter from our friend Mr. Finch to renew the bills for £1,048 10s. 5d. and £462 6s. 6d. due respectively on the 28th inst. and the 4th prox. He tells us you are quite willing to guarantee their payment, and as it is proposed that we draw on him solely in exchange for the above, which carry his draft and the acceptance of the London Quays, &c., Co., we must ask your confirmation of the assurance . . ." On the 24th of December Mackrell wrote: "Dear sirs,—In reply to your letter of the 22nd inst. I hereby guarantee the payment by Mr. Finch of two bills you intend to renew for his, one for £1,048 10s. 5d. and the other for £462 6s. 6d., due respectively the 28th inst. and the 4th prox.—Yours, WM. MACKRELL."

Two bills, both dated the 22nd of December, 1866, were then drawn by the firm upon and accepted by Finch for the respective sums of £1,025 6s. 11d. and £485 10s. (amounting together to £1,510 16s. 11d.), at three months in favour of the firm. These bills were not met, and there was no evidence that they were ever presented or that notice of dishonour was given to Mackrell. In July, 1868, Finch mortaged certain property to secure the repayment of £750, together with interest at 5 per cent., the balance then due on the bills. The claim in the suit was carried in in 1867, but the assets had in the first instance been swallowed up by specialty creditors, and an unexpected fund had subsequently become available, whereupon the chief clerk had disallowed the claim. There was a balance of £510 still due on the bills, and Finch was totally unable to pay. The claimant took out a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate. North, J., dismissed the summons on the ground that by a "renewed" bill was meant a bill between the same parties for the same amount for the same period as and commencing from the date of the expiration of the original bill, and that there was such a variation of the liability guaranteed that Mackrell's estate was released. The claimant appealed.

Brice, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the appellant.—These bills are renewals of the old ones, and were guaranteed by Mackrell, and his estate remains liable. If there is any variance in the liability it is immaterial: Holme v. Brunskill, 3 Q. B. D. 495, 26 W. R. Dig. 194; Bonar v. McDonald, 3 H. L. Cas. 226. Presentment was not necessary, nor notice of dishonour to Mackrell: Walton v. Mascall, 13 M. & W. 452.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and R. Whitehead, for the respondents.—The arrangement is in writing, and is not a guarantee for an old debt, but for new bills to be accepted by Finch, and by him alone. The old bills were to be given up and we were to draw on Finch as acceptor. The liability on the new bills must depend on the determination of the old liability. If this were a guarantee of the debt, Mackrell might have been immediately called on to pay, although the bills fell due in March. There is therefore a material variation and a liability different from that agreed to. There is no authority as to the meaning of renewal in bills, although there is as to the renewal of leases: Rickards v. Rickards, 2 Y. & C. (Ch.) 426. The term renewal implies currency. The renewal of the bills was of the very essence of the contract, and the smallest alteration in its form is sufficient to release the surety: Whitcher v. Hall, 5 B. & C. 269; Bonser v. Cox, 4 Beav. 379, 6 Beav. 110.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case is, what is the meaning to be given to the word "renew" as used in two letters referring to certain bills of exchange? The position of affairs was this: Messrs. Young, Sons, & Magnay were in December, 1866, the holders of two bills of exchange drawn by Mr. Finch upon, and accepted by, the London Quays Co., one of them, for £1,048 10s. 5d., falling due on the 28th of December, 1886, and another, for £462 6s. 6d. falling due on the 4th of January, 1887.

Apparently, for some reason or other, the acceptor did not intend to pay. It is equally obvious that Finch could not pay. Messrs. Young & Co., the holders of the bills, wrote on the 22nd of December, 1886, to Mr. Mackrell as follows:—[His lordship read the letter.] What does that mean? There is an ambiguity as to the meaning of the word "renew" used there. A bill is renewed when another bill is taken in its place, the parties being the same and the amount being the same, though perhaps in some cases the interest due on the first bill is added. The bill which is renewed is the old bill. Nothing is more common than to talk of a bill given by way of renewal of an old bill as renewed.

You see by the context in this letter that renewal in the accurate sense of the word is not meant. You are not going to have the same acceptors; you are going to throw the holders of the bill upon Finch. The drawer is to accept this time, and these bills are to be taken in exchange for the old ones. This is the transaction disclosed by the letter. Mackrell is asked to guarantee payment. I think the letter shows that he was to guarantee the payment of the debt, which was the amount of the old bills, but for which new drafts were to be drawn. The letter does not say anything about the amount for which these drafts are to be drawn or the time for which credit is to be given to Finch. It leaves all that obscure. Finch is to be the only person to be drawn upon. Mackrell writes: [His lordship read the letter of the 24th of December, 1886.] What bills did Messrs. Young & Co. intend to renew? The old bills. Mackrell now knows how it is to be done. He knows that "renewed" does not mean "renewed" in the proper and technical sense, and that the new bills were to be in substitution for the old, and that the parties were to be different. I think he was content that it should be so, provided the amount was the same. Can there be any doubt that it was a guarantee for the credit of the amount of these two bills? It does not appear that Mackrell made any demand on Finch when these bills became due. It is as old, at least, as the case of Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. 733, and it is apparent from the recent case of Carter v. White, 32 W. R. 692, 25 Ch. D. 666, that it was not essential that the holder of a bill should give notice of non-payment to the surety in order to recover the amount from him. There has been nothing to discharge Mackrell. It appears to me that North, J., put too narrow a construction on the letter of guarantee, and wrongly considered the new bills to be renewals of the old. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, and that this claim must be admitted to proof, with costs in the usual way.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I put the same construction on these letters as Lindley, L.J. North, J., was misled by the use of the word "renewal." He thought it was used in the ordinary meaning when it is mentioned in this letter. I think the bills in question were not given by way of renewal, but in substitution for the old ones. I am of opinion that North, J.'s decision was wrong, and that nothing has happened which would relieve Mackrell from his suretyship.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I differ from North, J., in this, that I think he has read the word "renewal" in its technical sense, and not in the sense used in both these letters. I cannot see how these two letters are not to be treated as a guarantee of the old debt. It was a guarantee of a debt due, and represented by whatever bills might be drawn at that time by the parties. The claim ought, in my opinion, to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Tathams & Pym.

Solicitors for the respondents, Mason & Edwards.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 18.
North, J. }

In re STANLEY'S TRUSTS. (a.)

Trustee—Trustee Act, 1850, s. 9—Vesting order—Service of petition on adult heir of sole trustee residing abroad.

The trustees of a will conveyed all their beneficial interest in a certain property to a purchaser. The legal estate in the property was in the heir, who was abroad, of a deceased sole trustee to whom the legal estate had been conveyed to prevent merger. On petition for a vesting order, Held, that, under the circumstances, service of the petition on the heir might be dispensed with.

By an indenture dated the 25th of June, 1858, the Crown Hotel in Leamington, of which John Stanley was lessee, was, to prevent merger of the lease, conveyed, subject to the lease, to and to the use of Joseph Stanley in fee in trust for John Stanley, his heirs and assigns. Joseph Stanley died on the 25th of February, 1870, intestate, and the legal estate in the property vested in his eldest son and heir-at-law, Joseph Bird Stanley. John Stanley, who died in 1876, by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon the trusts therein mentioned, and gave the trustees power to sell all or any part of the trust estate. Joseph Bird Stanley went to Queensland in 1873, and was last heard of in 1892, when he was living at Brisbane. In 1892 the trustees of the will sold the hotel and conveyed all their beneficial interest therein to the purchaser. This was a petition under the Trustee Act, 1850, s. 9, by the trustees of the will, the purchaser of the hotel, and the beneficiaries under the will, that the hotel might vest in the purchaser for the estate of Joseph Bird Stanley therein. The petition had not been served on anyone.

L. Field, for the petitioners.—The court will dispense with service of the petition on the heir. He is only a bare trustee.

He referred to In re Little, L. R. 7 Eq. 323, 17 W. R. Dig. 138; Purvis v. Abraham, W. N., 1866, p. 126; In re Oxenham's Trusts, W. N., 1875, p. 6.

NORTH, J.—Considering that the heir has been absent so long a time, and considering the nature of the trust, I think the chance of his having any claim as to costs is infinitesimal. I shall, therefore, dispense with service of the petition on him.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 20.
North, J. }

EDWARDS v. STANDARD ROLLING STOCK SYNDICATE. (a.)

Company — Debenture — Debenture-holders' security in danger—Interest on debentures—Time for payment—Receiver and manager.

In a debenture-holders' action, where the security was endangered, but no interest was due on the debentures, and the time for payment had not arrived, the court, on the motion of the debenture-holders, made an order for the appointment of a receiver and manager.

The plaintiffs, who were holders of debentures, applied by motion for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the company's property.

The debentures in this case took the form of a warrant by the company to pay to the holder thereof on the 30th day of June, 1894, £100 with interest at £6 per cent. by half-yearly payments of £3 free from income tax, the first of such half-yearly payments to be made on the 1st of January next, and the company did "thereby charge with payment of the said sum, and interest, its undertaking, and all its property, real and personal, present and future, including book debts and its uncalled capital, if any, for the time being." This debenture was issued upon and subject to the conditions indorsed thereon.

These conditions, so far as the circumstances of the case were concerned, were as follows:—

This debenture is one of a series of fifty like debentures, numbered consecutively from 1 to 50 inclusive, issued by the company on the day of 18 for securing principal sums, amounting to £5,000, and registered in the books of the company.

The said debentures of the said series shall rank pari passu as a first charge upon the whole of the undertaking and property of the company as within mentioned without any preference or priority one over the other.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charge created by the debentures shall be a floating security, and accordingly the company may, in the course of its business, and for the purpose of carrying on the same, deal with the property hereby charged in such manner as the company shall think fit, and may lease the same and may pay and receive money and declare and pay dividends out of profits. But the powers hereby given shall cease if default is made in payment of any principal moneys secured by any of the series of debentures at the time when the same become payable, or if default is made in the payment of any interest payable on any of the said series of debentures at the time fixed for payment thereof, or if an order of some court of competent jurisdiction is made, or a special or extraordinary resolution is passed, for winding up the company. The debentures shall constitute and be a first charge on the undertaking and property of the company, and nothing herein contained shall be taken to authorize the creation of any mortgage or charge on the undertaking or any of the property for the time being of the company, in priority to the charge hereby created. If the company make default for a period of one calendar month in the payment of any interest hereby secured, the registered holder hereof may at any time thereafter, before such interest is paid, by notice in writing to the company, call in the principal moneys hereby secured, and if in case any such notice is clearly given, or if an order of some court of competent jurisdiction is made, or a special or extraordinary resolution is passed, for the winding up of the company, the principal moneys hereby secured shall immediately become payable.

There was, at this time, no interest due in respect of the debentures, nor had the time for payment arrived; there were judgments, however, against the company, and there was reason to believe that the security was endangered.

Macnaghten, for the motion.—We are entitled to protect our security, and it has been settled that we can have both a receiver and a manager. The question of a receiver is covered by the decision in Wildy v. Mid Hants Railway, a case reported only in 16 W. R., at p. 409. For a manager there is the decision of Kay, J., in Makins v. Percy Ibotson & Sons, 39 W. R. 73, [1891] 1 Ch. 133, which followed Peek v. Trimsaran Iron Co., 24 W. R. 361, 2 Ch. D. 115.

He also referred to Macmahon v. North Kent Iron Works, 39 W. R. 349, [1891] 2 Ch. 148; In re Opera (Limited), 39 W. R. 705.

Oswald, for the company, said he did not oppose.

NORTH, J.—I feel considerable difficulty in this case. I doubt whether I ought to give the debenture-holders priority over the creditors, and I doubt still more whether I have a right to do it. However, the decision in Wildy v. Mid Hants Railway is an authority that I must follow as to the appointment of a receiver; and following the decision of Kay, J., in Makins v. Percy Ibotson & Sons, I also will make an order for the appointment of a manager, although in doing so I must adopt the language used by the learned judge in that case, and say that I make the order with great hesitation.

Solicitors, Bower, Cotton, & Bower; G. Weller.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 19.
Stirling, J. }

LEAROYD v. HALIFAX JOINT-STOCK BANKING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Production of documents—Privilege—Bankruptcy—Examination by solicitor of trustee in bankruptcy—Transcript of notes of examination—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 27.

A trustee in bankruptcy had, under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, obtained an order for the examination of certain persons, including the bankrupt and the manager of a bank with whom the bankrupt had entered into an arrangement in reference to his business, and had obtained a transcript of the shorthand notes of the examination by his solicitor of those persons. He subsequently brought an action against the bank to set aside the arrangement, and in that action he made the usual affidavit of documents, in which he objected to produce the transcript, on the ground that it had "come into existence for the purpose of furnishing to his solicitors evidence to be used in this litigation, or information which might lead to the obtaining of such evidence for the use of his solicitors, to enable them to conduct this litigation and advise him in reference thereto."

Held, that the transcript was a privileged document.

Summons.

Cyrus Brook had up to July, 1891, carried on business at Halifax as a worsted manufacturer, but in that month the Halifax Bank, the defendants in the action, to whom Brook was largely indebted, and who held securities given by him, closed his account with them. An arrangement was thereupon entered into between Brook and his three sons, who had previously assisted him in the business, that he should retire from the business, and that it should be transferred to them, and the bank, to facilitate the arrangement, opened a fresh account with the sons. In March, 1892, Brook was adjudicated a bankrupt, and Learoyd, the plaintiff, was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy. In June, 1892, the plaintiff brought this action, in which he claimed that certain agreements, deeds, and documents by which the arrangement in June, 1891, was carried out, might be set aside as being fraudulent and void, on the alleged ground that such arrangement was made for the purpose of defeating, delaying, and defrauding creditors. Upon an order obtained by the bank the plaintiff made the usual affidavit of documents, and in it he objected to produce one document mentioned—namely, a transcript of the shorthand notes of the examination by his solicitor of Brook, two of his sons, and the manager of the bank under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—on the ground that the transcript had come into existence for the purpose of furnishing to the plaintiffs' solicitor evidence to be used in the litigation, or information which might lead to the obtaining of such evidence for the use of his solicitor to enable the solicitor to conduct the litigation and advise in reference thereto. Mr. Booth, the plaintiff's solicitor, stated in his affidavit that the examination took place on the 18th and 19th of May, 1892, in the private room of the district registrar at Halifax, with closed doors, and was of a strictly private character, and that no person was present except the witnesses and their solicitors, together with the plaintiff and the deponent as his solicitor and the shorthand writer. He further stated: "I then called the attention of the registrar to the decision of Chitty, J., in the case of In re Grey's Brewery Co., 32 W. R. 381, 25 Ch. D. 405, 406, and objected to the solicitors for the witnesses taking any notes, and intimated that I did not intend to file the evidence when taken. The said examination took place solely for the purpose of enabling me to ascertain the facts in connection with the assignment by the bankrupt to his sons of over £30,000 worth of property before advising the trustee to bring an action, so as to avoid incurring the expense of some hundreds of pounds in entering into litigation respecting the matter."

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The bank then took out this summons for the determination by the court of the question whether the transcript was a privileged document.

Buckley, Q.C., and Eyre, for the applicants.—This document is not privileged. It was not obtained privately for the purpose of the action, but was the result of an examination by the court: Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia, 24 W. R. 724, 2 Ch. D. 644; Wheeler v. Le Marchant, 17 Ch. D. 675, 29 W. R. Dig. 72; In re North Australian Territory Co., 38 W. R. 561, 45 Ch. D. 87. Although an examination under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act is a private proceeding, yet if the trustee becomes a party to an action he cannot refuse to make discovery. Under rule 12 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, the evidence taken at an examination by the trustee has to be filed: Yate-Lee and Wace on Bankruptcy, 3rd ed., p. 611. The onus is on the plaintiff to show that the document is privileged, and he has not done so. He does not say in what way it is privileged: O'Shea v. Wood, [1891] P. 286, 39 W. R. Dig. 184; Gardner v. Irvin, 27 W. R. 442, 4 Ex. D. 49.

Hastings, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiff.—This document is clearly privileged. It came into existence after litigation for the purpose of obtaining advice as to it, or information which might lead to the obtaining of evidence to be used in the litigation, and therefore is within the definition of protected documents given by Jessel, M.R., in Wheeler v. Le Marchant. If the information had been given to the solicitors in their office as a proof of what the witnesses could say, it would have been privileged, and the fact that it was given upon an examination under section 27 makes no difference. Such an examination is a private proceeding, and the trustee has a discretion as to whether or not he will file the evidence: The Palermo, 32 W. R. 403, 9 P. D. 6; In re Grey's Brewery Co. As a matter of fact, it has not yet been filed. The plaintiff ought not to be compelled to disclose the information which he has obtained by means of what is a privileged communication: Kennedy v. Lyell, 31 W. R. 691, 32 W. R. 497, 23 Ch. D. 387, 9 App. Cas. 81.

Buckley, Q.C., in reply.—In re Grey's Brewery Co. merely shows that the examination is a private proceeding. The depositions in question in The Palermo were taken upon an inquiry under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 32. The evidence there was obtained to form part of the brief. No doubt proofs of witnesses are privileged from production. The plaintiff cannot intend to call as witnesses all the persons whom he has examined, and how can it be said that the document came into existence for the purpose of giving the solicitor information to be used at the trial. [STIRLING, J.—The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. v. Quick, 26 W. R. 328, 3 Q. B. D. 315, is a better illustration of the principle than Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia, because in the former case some of the documents were never submitted to the solicitor at all.] The solicitor says in his affidavit that he asked the questions to get information, not with a view to advising his client, but before advising his client.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:—The affidavit of documents made by the plaintiff is not quite as clear as it might have been as to the grounds upon which privilege is claimed, but the court cannot say that it is insufficient. Upon the law applicable to the question, the authority most usually referred to is the case of Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia, which has been cited by counsel in his opening. In that case, before the action was actually commenced, but after litigation had become highly probable, the London manager of the bank had telegraphed to the manager in Oregon to send full particulars of the transaction in question, and on an application by the plaintiff for production of documents the bank resisted production of the letter sent in answer as being privileged. It was held that the letter was not a privileged document, as it had not been shown that the agent had been informed that the communication was to be a confidential one for the purpose of being laid before the solicitor for advice, or that the communication was in fact made with a view to his advice being obtained. The judgment of Jessel, M.R., in that case seems to me to be a clear and satisfactory exposition of the law, but the case which shows the length to which the principle has gone is The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. v. Quick. The head-note in that case is as follows:—"Documents prepared in relation to an intended action, whether at the request of a solicitor or not, and whether ultimately laid before the solicitor or not, are privileged if prepared with a bonâ fide intention of being laid before him for the purpose of taking his advice; and an inspection of such documents cannot be enforced." In that case Cotton, L.J., said the principle was that "if a document comes into existence for the purpose of being communicated to the solicitor with the object of obtaining his advice or of enabling him either to prosecute or defend an action, then it is privileged, because it is something done for the purpose of serving as a communication between the client and the solicitor." That was a case where the document was obtained by the client, not the solicitor, and the case is à fortiori where (as is more usual) the document is obtained by the solicitor himself. I do not think that either Sir George Jessel or Cotton, L.J., who were members of the Court of Appeal which decided Wheeler v. Le Marchant, meant to depart from the principles which were laid down by them in the cases to which I have referred. That case is a peculiar one. In an action for specific performance of a building contract to take on lease building land from the defendants, they sought to protect from production letters which had passed between their solicitors and their surveyors, and it was held on appeal that the defendants must produce the letters, except such of them, if any, as the defendants should state by affidavit to have been prepared confidentially after dispute had arisen between the plaintiff and defendants, and for the purpose of obtaining information, evidence, or legal advice with reference to litigation existing or contemplated between the parties to the action. What was contended for there was that all communications to a solicitor for enabling him to advise his client were privileged. The Master of the Rolls said that it had never been decided that documents were protected merely because they were produced by a third party in answer to an inquiry made by the solicitor, and he repeated, in other words, what he had said in Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia were the grounds on which a communication to a solicitor may be protected from production. I do not think that the Court of Appeal intended in Wheeler v. Le Marchant to limit the rules of the court with regard to communications to solicitors in contemplation of litigation, or to obtain evidence with reference to it. Let us look at the practical effect of that rule. A person apprehensive of an action goes to consult his solicitor. He says that before advising he should like an interview with a third party who is acquainted with the matter. That person is invited to come to the solicitor's office. He comes, and the solicitor writes down what he says, and that is preserved. Such a document would plainly fall within the rules laid down by the Master of the Rolls, and would be privileged against discovery.

In the present case the client is not an ordinary litigant; he is a trustee in bankruptcy, and he has power to compel information to be given which an ordinary litigant has not. In such a case as that which I have just referred to the client could only rely upon the voluntary statements by a person acquainted with the case. Trustees in bankruptcy and liquidators of companies have wider powers. Section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that the court may, on the application of the official receiver or trustee, summon before it the debtor or his wife, or any person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects belonging to the debtor, or supposed to be indebted to the debtor, or any person whom the court may deem capable of giving information respecting the debtor, his dealings or property, and the court may require any such person to produce any documents in his custody or power relating to the debtor, his dealings or property, and may examine such person on oath. Official liquidators, as is well known, have similar powers in the winding up of insolvent companies. The nature of this section was explained by Chitty, J., in In re Grey's Brewery Co., which was a case under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. That learned judge said that the object of all those sections was to enable the court to obtain information which might be useful in the conduct of the proceedings in the winding up, and, looking at the section and the purpose for which the provisions of that section were inserted, an examination of that kind must be considered in the nature of a secret proceeding. The client, then, in this case, having that power, goes to his solicitor and asks for his advice. The solictor says: "You have the power of getting information which I advise you to avail yourself of, so that I may have the means of advising you." The trustee then took out a summons, and got leave to examine certain persons named. His solicitor personally conducted the examination and got a transcript of the proceedings. That transcript is a private document. It is true that the Rules in Bankruptcy provide that the evidence so taken is to be filed, but they do not say that it was to be filed immediately. If that was done the main object of the examination might often be defeated. The point has often been considered by me and by other judges with reference to depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. The practice under that section in all branches of the court is that the depositions, when taken, shall be returned to the chief clerk for use in the liquidation, but they are not filed until the court is satisfied through the chief clerk that no harm can be done by their publication. These depositions are accordingly regarded as private documents, and why should not a document obtained by a trustee in bankruptcy for his own information in order to enable his solicitor to advise him as to future proceedings be privileged? If, instead of putting the Court of Bankrupcy in motion under section 27, the trustee had, at the instance of his solicitor, written to the bank manager making inquiries, and had got a letter stating the facts, that would have been a privileged communication, and I fail to see why a document such as a transcript giving the information obtained at an examination for the same purpose should not be privileged likewise. This examination has been conducted by the solicitor himself, which makes the case stronger; and he has stated the purpose of it in his evidence. That statement amounts to this—that the examination has taken place with the view of enabling the solicitor in his professional capacity to advise the trustee in bankruptcy whether this action should be brought or not. So if privilege has been sufficiently claimed this document is one which is capable of being privileged. In my view privilege has been sufficiently claimed, and the application fails and must be refused with costs.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the applicants, Jaques & Co., for J. Norton Dickons, Halifax.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Walter Helliwell, for Jubb, Booth, & Helliwell, Halifax.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) Jan. 17.

THAMES AND MERSEY MARINE INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. PITT, SON, & KING. (a.)

Insurance — Marine insurance — Average damage — Stranding—Liability of insurer—Goods insured in ship and in craft—Policy—Construction—Valuation stated—"Included" advance on freight.

By a policy of insurance certain maize was insured, as to part, from San Nicolas, and, as to the remainder, from Buenos Ayres, for a voyage to the United Kingdom, free from particular average unless the ship or craft should be stranded, sunk, or burned.

The policy included all risks of steam navigation, and in craft, transhipment, or while waiting transit. The maize was valued in the policy at £7,940 "(included £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance on freight)." Between San Nicolas and Buenos Ayres the ship stranded, and a portion of the cargo was discharged into lighters, and part was wetted, and part lost. The ship got off, and at Buenos Ayres was surveyed, and was admitted by both parties to be seaworthy to continue her voyage, and thereupon the discharged cargo was reshipped, together with the Buenos Ayres portion of the maize, which had been awaiting the ship in lighters. On the voyage to Europe a large part of the cargo was lost and the remainder damaged owing to perils of the seas. In an action raising the question as to the amount of damage recoverable by the assured under the policy,

Held, that, the stranding having occurred before the Buenos Ayres portion of the maize was on board, the assured were not entitled to recover for particular average loss in respect of it, but only in respect of the maize shipped at San Nicolas.

Held, also, that the assured were entitled to have the particular average loss calculated on the valuation stated in the policy, without deduction of the amount of the freight advanced.

Special case.

The plaintiffs sued the defendants for money had and received, and the facts found by the special case were as follows:—

By a policy of insurance dated the 17th of September, 1890, the defendants insured with the plaintiffs and other insurers certain maize, valued at £7,940, by the steamship Craigton for a voyage at and from San Nicolas and Buenos Ayres to St. Vincent for orders to a port of the United Kingdom or Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive. The subject-matter of the insurance was described in the policy to be 26,910 bags of maize from San Nicolas, £6,065 1 per cent.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8,299 ,, ,, Buenos Ayres, £1,875 ⅞ per cent.

and it was therein stated that the goods were by agreement to be valued at £7,940 (included £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance on freight). The policy included all risks of steam navigation and in craft or transhipment or while waiting transit, and it contained a warranty that the risk should be free from particular average unless the ship or craft should be stranded, sunk, or burnt, or in collision—the collision to be of such a nature as may be reasonably supposed to have caused the damage.

The Craigton had on the 2nd of April, 1890, been chartered to E. A. Bunge and J. Bern to load a cargo of wheat and (or) maize in bags (but not exceeding 2,550, ten per cent. more or less, tons English) to be loaded in the River Parana at not more than two safe loading ports to be named by the charterers, not higher than Rosario, all of the cargo with the exception of 550 tons, which were to be shipped in Buenos Ayres Roads. The freight was to be at the rate of 30s. for cargo loaded up the river, and at 22s. for cargo loaded at Buenos Ayres, all per ton of 2,240lbs. gross of maize, and was to be paid as follows:—viz., sufficient costs for ship's use at port of loading (if required by the master) at current rate of exchange, subject to 5 per cent. to cover insurance and other charges, and the balance on the right and true delivery of the cargo in cash.

The charterers shipped on board The Craigton at San Nicolas 26,910 bags of maize under the charter-party, and the vessel sailed for Buenos Ayres. On the 21st of July, 1890, while proceeding down the river, The Craigton stranded on the Don Hermanos bank. About 800 tons of the cargo was discharged into lighters, and she floated off on the 2nd of August, and arrived at Buenos Ayres the same day. Owing to the stranding, part of the cargo was lost and other portions were wetted and damaged. At Buenos Ayres The Craigton was surveyed and found to be seaworthy to continue her voyage, whereupon 8,299 bags of maize, which were at the time of the stranding awaiting her in lighters at Buenos Ayres, were shipped, together with the 800 tons previously discharged in consequence of the stranding, but no distinction or separation was made while storing the different lots, and there was consequently no means of distinguishing them. The bills of lading referring to the whole of the above cargo were assigned by Messrs. Bunge & Bern, the charterers, to the defendants. On the 13th of August The Craigton sailed for the United Kingdom, but on the voyage encountered severe weather, and a considerable portion of the cargo was lost and a large part of the remainder damaged by water owing to perils of the seas. The Craigton arrived at Plymouth on the 22nd of September, and a claim for damage to the cargo was made upon the plaintiffs. A considerable portion of the damage was attributed by the expert who examined the cargo directly to the effects of the stranding, and it was also stated that had it not been for the results of the stranding the water would not have got into the hold in the storm off Cape Finisterre.

The plaintiffs, on the 16th of December, without prejudice, paid to the defendants the sum of £250 in respect of the damage. Average statements were prepared and dated June 2, 1891, and September 25, 1891, by which it appeared that there had been a particular average loss on the whole of the maize, and that if the defendants were entitled to claim in respect of the cargo shipped at Buenos Ayres as well as that shipped at San Nicolas, the liability of the plaintiffs was £269 11s. 3d., but if on the latter portion only, it amounted to £217 13s. 10d. only.

The plaintiffs contended that the defendants were only entitled to claim in respect of the cargo shipped at San Nicolas, and claimed the difference between the latter amount and the £250 paid to the defendants. The defendants claimed in respect of both portions, and the question raised by the case was as to which of these contentions was correct.

The second question was raised upon the contention of the defendants that the above average statements did not correctly show the amounts they were entitled to claim, inasmuch as, in estimating the particular average loss the value of the cargo was taken under the policy at £7,940, less £1,361 6s. 6d., the freight advanced by the charterers at the ports of loading in accordance with the charter-party, whereas it should have been taken at the full amount of £7,940 stated in the policy. The second question, therefore, was whether the amount of freight advanced was so correctly deducted.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Synnott, for the plaintiffs.—(1) No liability attaches to the underwriters in respect of the goods shipped at Buenos Ayres. Independently of the clause in the policy covering the risk of craft, the claim for particular average is not let in by a stranding before the goods were on board, for if the policy did not cover risk of craft the adventure had not commenced. But the effect of the words "in craft" is to show that, in the contemplation of the parties, risk anterior to the time when the goods were on board was separately covered, and if the goods were at risk "of craft" at the time no damage arising from the stranding of the ship is recoverable. (2) Damage occasioned to the cargo through perils of the seas on the voyage from Buenos Ayres to Europe cannot here be related back to the effects of the stranding, inasmuch as both parties admitted that the ship was seaworthy to continue her voyage. (3) The average statements correctly estimate the particular average loss by deducting the amount of the advanced freight from the valuation in the policy. The effect of writing in "included £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance on freight" was to make the policy a separate insurance of the goods and of the advanced freight, though if the words had not been put in the valuation would have bound the parties. In an ordinary policy the assured gets no indemnity for having to pay the same freight on damaged goods as on those in sound condition, and in an open policy the result is the same, so that in both cases he gets no such indemnity unless he has covered it in his valuation. By paying advanced freight, therefore, he buys the right of putting his goods on board and an undertaking to have them carried, and as there may be a total loss on freight and not on cargo, as well as vice versâ, it is clearly to his interest to insure the advanced freight. This difference between the interests is illustrated in several events which may happen; for instance, the ship may be lost but the cargo landed, when there would be a total loss of the freight but none on the cargo; again, if the ship puts in to reload from perils of the seas the expense of reloading is charged against advanced freight, and, if that is insured, is recoverable.

Channell, Q.C., and Carver, for the defendants.—The doctrine of liability to average loss is that if the ship strands then the warranty is gone and the policy is construed as if the warranty was not in it; and although it may be proved that the damage did not arise from the stranding, it is recoverable. The reason for the rule is the difficulty of saying how the damage arises, and the case was for convenience assumed by the underwriters. In order to apply the rule here the limit to that assumed liability must be ascertained, and it is submitted that the principle upon which it should be done is to limit to such "strandings" as might have caused the damage. The condition must, however, be construed strictly, and, the doctrine of proximate cause not applying, it is immaterial whether the stranding is connected with the actual loss, it must be a potential cause. Here a large part of the damage to the whole cargo was directly attributed, in fact, to the effects of the stranding; but for that there would have been no loss from perils of the seas. The text-books no doubt for the most part say that the goods are not at risk until actually on board, but the only authority for that is the case of Roux v. Salvador, 1 Bing. N. C. 526. One event is mentioned in the margin of this policy, and it ought not to be construed distributively to mean two policies. The only reason for the insertion of the words "in craft" was that in Hoffman v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N. C. 383, it was held that under the usual clause, unless the ship stranded, a partial loss in one of the lighters was not brought in. The calculation of the loss in the average statements is wrong. The assured are entitled to recover upon the whole valuation in the policy without deduction. The object of putting in "included £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance on freight" was to show how the value of the goods was arrived at. An advanced freight on particular goods stands on the same footing as commission or insurance of premiums, it is an element in the value of the goods: the assured has paid a sum down which he is not entitled to get back if the goods are lost, and the value of the goods is increased.

They cited Usher v. Noble, 12 East. 639.

DAY, J.—This is an action brought by underwriters to recover back money paid to the assured in respect of an alleged loss under a policy of insurance. Two questions are submitted to us by the special case:—first, whether the money so paid is recoverable by the plaintiffs on the ground that the goods were not on board the ship at the time of stranding, and, secondly, whether, on the construction of the policy, the advanced freight ought to be considered as separately insured, or whether it formed part of the value of the goods.

I deal first with the question as to the stranding. Now we have, under this policy, two different lots of maize, to be loaded at two different ports and at different rates of insurance. The facts are simple. On the passage down from San Nicolas to Buenos Ayres the ship, having on board some 26,910 bags of maize, stranded. She was got off and taken down to Buenos Ayres, where she took on board 8,299 bags and proceeded to Europe, and on the voyage the whole of the bags were damaged by perils of the seas. The assured thereupon claim against the underwriters in respect of the damage. The policy contained as usual a warranty against particular average, but with one exception—viz., unless the ship or craft be stranded. Now the ship was stranded. It is said that because she stranded the assured are entitled to recover, not only damages in respect of the goods on board, but also in respect of average loss sustained by the 8,299 bags not on board, but put on board after the ship had been surveyed and certified seaworthy. This maize was at the time of stranding lying on board lighters at Buenos Ayres, and was not damaged or affected there by delay or by stranding. This maize, however, being put on board, sustained damage by perils of the sea. Now the question therefore is this: is the claim of the assured to recover in respect of this quantity of maize well founded? I am of opinion that it is not. I have carefully considered the character of this policy. You have one paper, one assuring, one underwriter, but you have in a sense two voyages—one from San Nicolas to Buenos Ayres, and the second from Buenos Ayres to Europe—although in one sense the risks are the same, yet one extends from San Nicolas to Europe, while the other is a limited risk from Buenos Ayres to Europe only. Moreover, there are two different rates of assurance.

I suppose that hardly any argument would have been offered by the assured but for the words in the policy that it is to cover any loss "in craft." The insurance, no doubt, therefore does apply to maize in craft, and if any misfortune had happened to it while there, within the terms of the policy, it could have been recovered under the policy. But the two things, to my mind, must be consecutive: the maize is insured first in the craft, and then afterwards in the ship. While the goods are in the craft they are affected by policy risks to the craft, and while in the ship then by the risks which refer to the ship. But a stranding to affect goods in craft must be a stranding of the craft. To construe it otherwise, to my mind, would be to put an unreasonable and inconvenient construction upon the policy. It seems to me that the warranty and exception are incidental to the risk, and the principal thing to be considered is the risk. Here, in my judgment, there were two insurances, and the defendants, therefore are only entitled to take advantage of the stranding in respect of the bags of maize which were shipped at San Nicolas, and not in respect of the 8,999 taken on board at Buenos Ayres.

On the second question I am inclined to think that the defendants are right, and I agree with Mr. Channell's construction rather than with the ingenious alternative suggested by Mr. Walton. I think it is really an insurance on the value of the goods, and that it is not vitiated by the fact that ex abundante cautelâ, the merchant has shown to the underwriters how the valuation of the goods has been arrived at; that, desiring to get the profit on his speculation, he has valued them at the port of destination. I do not think he loses the benefit by stating that fact of the amount of the sum for the purposes of the valuation. I do not, therefore, consider this as a policy on the lesser amount, but really as a policy on the value of the goods explaining how it was made up. I think that the defendants, therefore, have made out their case as to that, and I desire to say how much we have been assisted by the able and interesting arguments on both sides.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and desire especially to concur in the last remark of my brother Day. The plaintiffs say that they are entitled to recover back money which they have overpaid in respect of a particular average loss caused by the stranding of the steamship Craigton.

The question is whether there has been such a stranding as renders them liable. I am of opinion that there was no such stranding. Now the claim arises in respect of the quantity of maize shipped at Buenos Ayres, and it is contended that, as might be the case in many policies of insurance, the stranding entitles the owner of the maize to recover with regard to that. The answer seems to me to depend on whether the stranding took place during the adventure. If it did, then it is clear that he can recover, although the actual mischief caused by it was nothing. But that is very different from saying that it is immaterial when the stranding took place. The principle by which parties agree in insurance to assume certain things within a certain time is sound sense and sound law. And the principle upon which it rests was examined in the case of Roux v. Salvador, by Tindal, C.J., who said (at p. 536): "The general principle laid down in Burnett v. Kensington, that if the ship be stranded the insurer is liable for any average damage, though quite unconnected with the stranding, is not disputed. The policy, after the stranding, must be construed as if no such warranty had been written on the face of it. But the question is, within what limits of time a stranding must take place to produce such effect." When you read the rule it is obvious that it must be so. The question whether the particular damage is attributable to the stranding is a different question, and therefore the underwriters and shippers by convention have agreed upon the rule. The stranding must, then, take place during the course of the adventure. But Mr. Channell says it was so, because at the time the goods were at risk. Is that so? We must see what the parties contemplated as to that. To my mind, what they meant to provide in the policy was that the risk commenced when the goods were put on board, for the time anterior to that —viz., "in craft"—is separately covered. Mr. Channell does not contend that average loss in respect of an anterior stranding, if the goods were not at risk, by risk "of craft" would be recoverable.

Now this covers this case, but for the fact that it was said that part of the damage was caused as the result of the stranding antecedent to the putting of the goods on board. Mr. Walton answers that by saying that both sides admitted the ship to be seaworthy, and that really comes back to the first point, and is an attempt to introduce something into the adventure.

The second point is whether the claim should be allowed for particular average loss in respect of the whole value, or only after deducting the sum of £1,361 6s. 6d. for advance freight. I think it is a question of construction as to what the parties meant. Did they intend to insure the cargo at a certain value, or the cargo, plus the advanced freight? Now I think they intended the former—if the latter, then the underwriters might reply to any claim for insurance in respect of advanced freight under such a policy that it was agreed that it should be taken as part of the value of the goods. On that part of the case, therefore, I think the defendants must succeed.

Channell, Q.C.—I suggest that the order should be that the claim be readjusted by calculating the particular average loss for £6,065 without deduction for advanced freight.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Crowders & Vizard, agents for Shelly & Johns, Plymouth.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (Ireland). Dec. 16.

MORGAN v. CASTLEGATE STEAMSHIP CO. (a.)

Ship — Charter-party — Disbursements by master on account of the ship—Maritime lien—Master's authority —Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.

The appellant, as master of the steamship Castlegate, and agent for the charterers, obtained cash advances and coals from W. & Co., for which he paid by bills drawn in their favour upon the charterers. The bills were dishonoured, and W. & Co. recovered judgment against the appellant as drawer, who thereupon applied to the High Court of Admiralty for a declaration that he had a valid lien for his disbursements, upon ship and freight. The charterers had undertaken to pay port dues, &c., and to provide and pay for coals, and the appellant had notice of these terms.

Held, that the appellant had no maritime lien given him by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889, either on the ship or freight.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (29 L. R. Ir. 55) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Lord Ashboune, L.C., Palles, C.B., and Barry, L.J.), reported 29 L. R. Ir. 55.

The facts are given very fully in Lord Herschell's judgment. By section 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), "Every master of a ship . . . shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages. . . ."

Pyke, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Hollams with them), for the appellant.—The disbursements intended by the Act of 1889 are all such obligations as the owner under like circumstances would himself enter into. The captain's lien does not depend on the contractual relations of third parties. If we can make out the absolute necessity of obtaining coals in this way, then there is a maritime lien. Here it was intended that the master should incur these liabilities in case the charterers would or could not obtain credit. The captain was really carrying out his owner's business: The Sara, 38 W. R. 129, 14 App. Cas. 209; The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10); The Edwin, 12 W. R. 992, Br. & Lush. 281; The Druid, 1 W. Rob. 391, 399; The Ticonderoga, Swa. 215, 217; The Lemington, 23 W. R. 421, 2 Asp. M. C. (N. S.) 475. The decisions in The Beeswing, 5 Asp. M. C. 484; The Turgot, 34 W. R. 552, 11 P. D. 21; and The Durham City, 14 P. D. 85, 37 W. R. Dig. 162, are wrong. At any rate, the master has a lien on freight, which would not have been earned but for these disbursements: Bristowe v. Whitmore, 9 W. R. 621, 9 H. L. Cas. 391; The Feronia, 16 W. R. 585, L. R. 2 A. & E. 65.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Aspinall, Q.C. (Satow with them), for the respondents as to the claim of a lien on freight, to which counsel were requested to confine their argument.—If no lien on ship, then none on freight, which follows the possession of the ship: Smith v. Plummer, per Lord Ellenborough, 1 B. & Ald. 575, 582; The Ringdove, Swa. 310; The Jonathan Goodhue, Swa. 524; The Edward Oliver, L. R. 1 A. & E. 379, 15 W. R. Adm. Dig. 27; The Orpheus, L. R. 3 A. & E. 308, 19 W. R. Adm. Dig. 16; The Dowthorpe, 2 W. Rob. 73.

Pyke, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HERSCHELL, L.C.—This appeal arises in a cause instituted in the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland by the master, or late master, of the steamship Castlegate against the vessel and freight, for disbursements made by him, or for which he was liable, to the amount of £1,391 11s. 9d.

On the 29th of November, 1889, a charter-party was entered into between the Castlegate Steamship Co., as owners of the steamship Castlegate, and Douglas H. Morgan & Co., whereby the vessel was chartered to the latter firm for a term of six calendar months, at the rate of £930 per calendar month for the use and hire of the vessel. The charter-party contained a stipulation "that the charterers should provide and pay for all the coals, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever except" certain charges with which I need not trouble your lordships. Of that charter-party the master of the vessel had notice.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vessel sailed on a voyage to Buenos Ayres under that charter-party. In the course of her outward voyage certain coals were required for The Castlegate, and at the Port of St. Vincent those coals were supplied to the vessel by the firm of Wilson, Sons, & Co. (Limited), and in respect of those coals a bill was drawn by the plaintiff as master, upon Douglas H. Morgan & Co. for the amount of £313 1s. In the month of February, 1890, whilst still on her outward voyage, and in April, 1890, on her homeward voyage, The Castlegate, at the Port of Monte Video, needed further supplies of coals, and these, again, were procured from the same firm, and the captain gave his draft upon the firm of Douglas H. Morgan & Co., the charterers, for the sum of £1,078 10s. 9d., the total of those two drafts being £1,391 11s. 9d., in respect of which the action was brought.

Douglas H. Morgan & Co. effected a sub-charter-party of the steamer for the homeward voyage with the firm of Samson & Co. They were to pay a freight of 22s. 6d., and they again sub-chartered the vessel to the firm of Arning, Brauss, & Co. at an advanced freight.

When the vessel arrived in this country an attempt was made by Messrs. Wilson & Co. (Limited), the firm who had supplied these coals, to enforce their claim against the vessel. They instituted a cause of necessaries in the local Admiralty Court of the Borough of Cork against the vessel, cargo, and freight. Thereupon the assignees of the bill of lading paid into court the sum of £1,392, which was the balance of the freight after deducting the advanced freight and the cost of loading; and the owners, to save the ship from arrest, paid into court £1,500. The case was subsequently transferred to the High Court of Admiralty, and was there heard and dismissed by the judge of the Admiralty Court. These two sums which I have mentioned, representing the freight and ship, were transferred with the cause to the High Court of Admiralty.

Under these circumstances the master of The Castlegate, the present plaintiff, having been made liable, in an action brought against him by Wilson & Co. upon his drafts, for the amount thereof—the firm of Douglas H. Morgan & Co., the charterers, having become bankrupt—he in his turn instituted these proceedings with the view of making the ship and freight liable in respect of the disbursements. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court gave judgment in his favour, determining that he was entitled to the lien which he claimed, and directed that the sum which represented the freight should first be made available, and that if it did not prove sufficient he should enforce his lien against the ship or those representing the ship. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the question which your lordships have to determine is whether the judgment so reversing it was right.

The claim of the plaintiff to maritime lien was rested upon the 1st section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889, which provides that "every master of a ship and every person lawfully acting as master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages." The case on behalf of the appellant was that these were disbursements and liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, inasmuch as they were incurred for the purpose of procuring coals, which were necessary to enable the vessel to prosecute her voyage as a steamer in the adventure in which she was engaged.

There can be no doubt that in a sense this expense may properly be said to have been incurred "on account of the ship" if you regard those words as including all disbursements which are necessary or desirable for the purpose of enabling the ship to be effectively used. But it is, in my judgment, impossible to treat the question of the construction of this section as if it had to be entered upon without any regard to previous legislation or decisions. The words to which I have called your lordships' attention were not new words; they had been used in legislation relating to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court and had received judicial construction. In the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and the 33rd section of the Admiralty Court (Ireland) Act, 1867, it had been provided that "the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship."

In The Mary Anne, 14 W. R. 136, L. R. 1 A. & E. 8, those words were held to give the master of the ship a maritime lien for disbursements made by him on account of the ship; and that decision remained unquestioned in this House, was treated as law, and had effect given to it for a considerable number of years. In The Sara, which came to your lordships' House, it was held that the decisions to which I have referred were erroneous, inasmuch as the Admiralty Court Act in England, to which I have alluded (and, of course, the decision applied equally to the Admiralty Court Act in Ireland), did not create any maritime lien which had not existed before, but merely conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Admiralty in cases in which it did not possess jurisdiction before.

Immediately following the decision that the maritime lien which it was supposed had been created by the Act of 1861 did not exist, the statute upon which the appellant relies was passed. There can be no doubt that it was passed for the purpose of creating the lien which it had been supposed existed by virtue of the section which gave jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty.

Whilst that lien was supposed to exist, the question arose in the courts within what limits the right was to be confined upon the true construction of the words to which I have called your lordships' attention, "disbursements made by the master on account of the ship." In The Turgot the question arose under circumstances almost precisely similar to those which have given rise to the present controversy. In that case the vessel was under charter. The charterers were bound (as in the present case) to provide, amongst other things, coals. The master had put his name to a draft in respect of the coals which had been provided, and he sought to enforce a maritime lien, in respect of that liability, against the ship and freight. The then President of the Probate and Admiralty Division held that he was not entitled to do so. Reliance was, of course, placed upon the very same words which are relied upon here. This liability, it was said, arises in respect of, and may therefore be regarded as, a "disbursement in respect of goods supplied on account of the ship." The learned President, after calling attention to the fact that "by the charter-party," while "the owners were to provide and pay for provisions and wages," "the charterer was to provide and pay for coals," and "the captain was to be appointed by, and to follow the instructions of, the charterer," said: "After the coals and provisions were supplied, the captain proposed to pay for them by drawing on the charterer," but believing, from a statement made to him, that there were instructions from the owners to that effect, "the captain did draw on the owners for the coals and provisions." The learned President then proceeded:—"I am of opinion that the captain is not entitled to recover in respect of the coals, as by the terms of the charter-party he had no authority to pledge the owners' credit in respect of them. It was argued that the master had an implied authority to pledge the owners' credit as their agent ex necessitate in order to enable the ship to sail." "But the authority of the master depends on the facts; and as the charterers were bound to pay for the hire of the vessel during its detention, the owners had no interest in obtaining its immediate departure." And he accordingly held that the plaintiff, whilst entitled to recover for the disbursements which he had made, in so far as they were disbursements which the owners under the charter-party were liable to pay, had no right against the ship or freight in respect of the disbursements which he had made for the supply of coals, which the charterers were bound to provide and pay for. It was, therefore, a distinct decision that disbursements made by the master on account of the ship must be limited to disbursements which he had a right to make on the credit of the owners of the ship, and did not extend to disbursements made by him for purposes for which the charterers ought to have made provision, even though in a sense they might be said to have been made on account of the ship.

That decision did not stand alone. The same conclusion was arrived at in other cases; and it seems to me that it would be contrary to all sound principle not to bear those facts in mind when construing the statute which was passed after the decision in The Sara. In relation to this very matter there had been what may without impropriety be called a course of decision in the Court of Admiralty putting a construction upon those words "disbursements on account of the ship."

When the Legislature altered the law as this House determined it to exist in the case of The Sara, and restored the law which was supposed to exist before, it cannot for a moment be supposed that the Legislature was ignorant of the construction which had been consistently put upon the words in the former Admiralty Court Act, which was supposed to create a lien. I cannot conceive that if it had been intended to create a wider lien than had been held to exist under the previous words, which were supposed to create it, the Legislature would not have used different words to those upon which this construction had been put, so as to make that intention clear and unambiguous. I do not for a moment suggest a doubt as to those decisions which had been arrived at upon the construction of the words used in the previous Act being correct; but it seems to me that, even if they could be shown to be more doubtful than I think they have been shewn to be, I should still feel myself compelled, in construing the section on which this case depends in the Act of 1889, to say that I cannot think the Legislature intended these words to have the effect of creating a maritime lien extending at all beyond that lien which had been held to be created by exactly similar words in the previous legislation. For these reasons I entertain a clear opinion that the judgment of the court below in respect of the alleged maritime lien on the ship must be affirmed.

But it is said on behalf of the appellant, and I own with very considerable force, that if it be true that inasmuch as there was no power to pledge the owner's credit there ought not to be and cannot be a maritime lien upon this vessel, which is the property of the owners, yet as regards the freight, which was the charterers', inasmuch as there was authority to pledge the credit of the charterers for these coals, a maritime lien ought to be enforced against the freight. As a matter of equity no doubt there is much to be said for that contention; and certainly, speaking for myself, if I could have seen my way to do so, I should have given effect to the contention of the appellant. But there appear to me to be insuperable difficulties to taking such a course as that. In the first place, one would have to say that whilst these disbursements, when regarded as affecting the owners of the ship, were not "disbursements on account of the ship," the very same disbursements, when you were looking at the case as affecting the charterers, were "disbursements on account of the ship," because those are the words and the only words, which could give the right insisted upon under the statute; and that appears to me of itself to be a very great difficulty. But besides that, no authority has been cited in which the Court of Admiralty has ever granted process against freight for the purpose of enforcing a maritime lien upon it, except as consequential upon and in connection with process against the ship. No case was cited to us in which the one had not been connected with the other, or in which, where there was no power to arrest the ship because there was no maritime lien enforceable against the shipowner, there had nevertheless been held to be a power to arrest the freight, or that from which the freight arose, for the purpose of enforcing a lien against the freight.

Under these circumstances, having regard to the difficulties which arise upon the construction of the Act of Parliament which alone gives any such maritime lien, and to the practice of the Court of Admiralty with respect to lien upon ship and freight, I do not see my way to giving, even in respect of the freight, where I should be fully inclined to do so if I could, the relief to the plaintiff which he seeks in this action.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision appealed from must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Halsbury, who is unable to be present to-day, has asked me to state that he concurs in the opinion which I have expressed to your lordships.

Lord WATSON.—The appellant was master of the steamship Castlegate during the six months following the 14th of December, 1889, whilst she was chartered to Douglas H. Morgan & Co. at the rate of £930 per month. He, as well as the officers, engineers, firemen, and crew were employed by the respondents, the owners of the vessel, who were bound by the terms of the charter-party to provide and pay their wages, for insurance on ship and engine-room stores, and to maintain the ship and machinery in an efficient state. The charterers undertook to pay port dues and various other charges, and "to provide and pay for all her coals."

Whilst the owners continued, through the appellant, to retain possession of the ship, they parted with all control over her movements, which were placed under the direction of the charterers. The lump sums stipulated for her hire were not dependent upon the freights which she might earn; and the charterers might have kept the vessel unemployed during the whole period covered by the charter-party if they had chosen to do so. In these circumstances the legal relations of the appellant to the owners and charterers respectively does not appear to me to admit of dispute. He was the agent of the owners in procuring necessaries which they were bound to supply, and the agent of the charterers only in providing coals or other necessaries for which they were responsible.

The charterers employed The Castlegate to carry a cargo, on their own account, from Antwerp to Buenos Ayres. They then sub-chartered to Samson & Co., at 22s. 6d. per ton, for a cargo of wheat or maize, to be carried from a port in the River Parana to certain ports on the Continent or in the United Kingdom. Samson & Co., by another sub-contract, parted with their right, at an increased freight of 24s. 6d. per ton, to Arning, Brauss, & Co., who directed the vessel to proceed to Cork Harbour, where she arrived on the 11th of May, 1890. Neither of these sub-charters affected the obligation of Douglas H. Morgan & Co. to provide coals for the use of the ship.

On the outward voyage the appellant obtained, as agent for the charterers, cash advances and coals from the firm of Wilson, Sons, & Co. (Limited), to the amount of £313 3s.; and on the homeward voyage he obtained from the same firm similar advances and a further supply of coal to the amount of £1,078 10s. 9d. For these sums he drew bills upon Douglas H. Morgan & Co., the first of which was dishonoured at maturity, and the second was not accepted. Wilson, Sons, & Co. (Limited), on the 19th of January, 1891, recovered judgment against the appellant as drawer for the amount of these bills, with interest.

On the arrival of The Castlegate at Cork both ship and cargo were attached, at the instance of Wilson, Sons, & Co. (Limited), under warrant of the local Court of Admiralty. The attachment was released upon payment into court of £1,500 as representing ship, and £1,392 as representing freight. The proceedings and the moneys paid into court were thereafter transferred to the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, whereupon the appellant applied to that court for a declaration that he had a valid lien for his disbursements upon ship and freight, and for payment of these disbursements out of the funds brought into court.

The learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty affirmed both liens claimed, and directed that the appellant's disbursements should be paid in the first instance out of freight money; the balance, if any, to be paid out of money representing ship. By the order appealed from that decision was reversed, and the present appellant's application dismissed, with costs.

It was conceded in argument that the master of a ship has no maritime lien for necessary disbursements on account of ship except in those cases where it is given him by section 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889. The difficulty of applying the provisions of the Act of 1889 to the present case arises from the fact that the respondents, who are under no liability to pay for the appellant's disbursements, are owners of the ship, and that the charterers, who are clearly responsible for them, are the owners of the freight.

As regards the appellant's alleged lien upon ship, I have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion with the Court of Appeal. It had been held by Dr. Lushington, in The Mary Anne, that the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, gave the master a lien on ship for necessary disbursements, and that decision was followed, though not always approved of by the Admiralty Court, in a series of cases ending with The Sara, in which the judgment of Butt, J., was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 826, 12 P. D. 158. These cases established the principle that there could be no lien upon ship in respect of disbursements for which the master had not authority to bind the owner, or, in other words, that no maritime lien could attach to the res for any sum which was not a personal debt of its owner. On appeal your lordships held that the rule which had been accepted by the courts below in the case of The Sara (Hamilton v. Baker), was not warranted by the Act of 1861, and it is matter of common knowledge that the object of the Legislature in passing the Act of 1889 was to give shipmasters a statutory lien for disbursements in place of the right which had been erroneously accorded to them in the Admiralty Court. Whether, as the appellant maintains, it was the intention of the Legislature to establish a wider lien than that which had been given effect to in The Mary Anne and subsequent decisions depends upon the language of the Act.

The clause upon which the appellant relies provides that every master of a ship shall, "so far as the case permits," have the same rights, liens, and remedies for recovery of "disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship," as a master of a ship has for recovery of his wages. In the case of lien for wages of master and crew the Legislature has recognized the rule that it attaches to ships independently of any personal obligation of the owner, the sole condition required being that such wages shall have been earned on board the ship. But that rule, which is founded upon obvious considerations of public policy, constitutes an exception from the general principle of the maritime law, which I understand to be that, inasmuch as every proceeding in rem is in substance a proceeding against the owner of the ship, a proper maritime lien must have its root in his personal liability. It was argued that the case of lien for damages by collision furnishes another exception to the general rule, and there are decisions and dicta which point in that direction; but these authorities are hardly reconcilable with the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Druid, or with the law laid down by the Appeal Court in The Parlement Belge, 28 W. R. 642, 5 P. D. 197, where Brett, L.J., with the assent of James and Baggallay, L.JJ., said: "In a claim made in respect of a collision the property is not treated as the delinquent per se, though the ship has been in collision, and has caused injury by reason of the negligence or want of skill of those in charge of her, yet she cannot be made the means of compensation if those in charge of her were not the servants of her then owner, as if she were in the charge of a compulsory pilot. That is conclusive to show that the liability to compensate must be fixed, not only on the property, but on the owner through the property."

The clause in question does not expressly, neither, in my opinion, does it by implication, enact that the master shall have a lien on ship, independently of the owners' personal liability. The qualifying words, "so far as the case permits," seem to indicate that, in the view of the Legislature, there might be cases in which master's disbursements, even if properly incurred in a question with some one or other, would not carry a statutory lien. Then the condition upon which a lien is given to the master is that the disbursements shall have been "properly incurred by him on account of the ship." The statute does not prescribe what disbursements shall be regarded as properly incurred on account of ship; it leaves that matter to be determined according to the existing law. Whether that reference relates to the general principles of the law maritime, or to the law as laid down by Sir James Hannen in The Turgot, one of the cases which, in so far as it concerned the existence of a lien, was overruled by your lordships in The Sara, is immaterial to the result of this case; because, in either view, no liability capable of carrying a lien on ship can be properly incurred by a master on account of ship in the absence of express or implied authority from the owner.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Act of 1889 does not empower the appellant to fix upon the respondents' ship a liability which he had not their authority to incur, or one which was not necessary for the protection of their interests. He had implied authority from the charterers because the disbursements were necessary in order to enable the vessel to prosecute her adventure, which was theirs; but he was at liberty to choose whether he would or would not pledge his personal credit for their debt. It was argued that the Legislature must presumably have meant to enforce the same policy in the case of disbursements as in the case of wages. It appears to me that any such presumption is excluded by the terms of the statute; and I can find no reasons, either of equity or of policy, for enabling the master of a vessel, who is not bound to incur a liability, to relieve himself, when he does choose to incur it, out of the property of his owners, although they may derive no benefit from it, and by the terms of his employment he is debarred from incurring it on their personal account.

The question whether the appellant has a statutory lien upon the freight brought into court is attended with more difficulty. If the respondents, instead of chartering, had themselves navigated The Castlegate, these disbursements, although made for the purpose of enabling her to earn freight, would have been properly incurred on account of ship, within the meaning of the Act, and the appellant would have had a statutory lien both upon ship and freight. Under the charter-party the interest which they previously had was divided, the respondents remaining owners of ship, whilst the charterers became the owners of any freight which she might earn. The appellant argued with much plausibility that, although the effect of that arrangement might be that he ceased to have a statutory lien on ship for disbursements which were not made in the respondents' interest, the charterers became quoad freight the owners of the vessel, and consequently that disbursements properly made in their interest were incurred "on account of ship" within the meaning of the Act, and must, therefore, carry a statutory lien upon freight.

If the Court of Admiralty were a court exercising equitable jurisdiction, in the sense of English law, the appellant would have a very strong equity to a lien upon the freight of The Castlegate. His disbursements were made in the interests of the charterers, and with their authority; and but for these disbursements the freight now in court would never have been earned. However cogent these considerations may be from an equitable point of view, it does not necessarily follow that the appellant is entitled to a maritime lien.

The difficulty which the appellant has to encounter, in this branch of his claim, is to be found in the fact that the Admiralty Court has never recognized the possibility of there being a proper maritime lien upon freight which is not associated with or founded upon a right to proceed in rem against the ship. No process having for its sole object the attachment of cargo in order to enforce a maritime lien for freight can issue from that court. The warrant to arrest cargo must apparently be accompanied by a warrant to arrest the corpus of the ship; an attachment of the ship being an essential preliminary to the courts exercising jurisdiction to enforce a proper lien on freight. These circumstances appear to me to necessitate the inference that no claim which cannot be enforced, either against the ship or her owners, can, according to the practice of the courts of admiralty, be attended with a maritime lien upon freight.

The absolute dependence of a lien on freight upon the liability of the ship to attachment for the same debt appears to me to have been recognized by the Court of Queen's Bench in Smith v. Plummer, where the captain of a vessel claimed a lien for wages upon ship and also upon freight. The court negatived both liens, the first on the authority of previous decisions, and the second for the reasons thus stated by Lord Ellenborough, C.J.: "Then if he has no lien on the ship, as appears from these cases, he can have no lien on freight, as the lien on the freight is consequential to the lien upon the ship."

I am, for these reasons, of opinion that the circumstances of this case do not permit of the appellant having a lien upon freight, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal on this point also must be affirmed. I have come to that conclusion with reluctance, because I feel that the appellant's claim for payment out of freight is supported by plain considerations of equity. But it rests with the Legislature to provide a remedy, should they deem it necessary, and not with the court, whose duty it is to administer the Act as it stands.

Lord MORRIS (whose opinion was read by Lord FIELD).—I concur; but on the question whether the appellant has a statutory lien on the freight brought into court I desire to add that the Court of Admiralty in Ireland for the present is not a part of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and its jurisdiction in reference to the matters in controversy in this case is purely statutory, vide 30 & 31 Vict. c. 114, s. 33, which provides: "The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." In my opinion, even if the disbursements claimed on account of freight, which were not on account of the ship, were a lien on the freight, such lien should be enforced in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and not in the Admiralty Court, which court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the question whether there was a lien on the freight when there was no lien on the ship.

Lord FIELD.—I concur in the motion which has been made with regard to the alleged lien upon the ship. I have nothing to add; but with regard to that claimed upon freight I agree that the question is not so free from doubt. If the principle that the "res," whether ship or freight, is only available for the master's lien in cases in which he has incurred the liability in respect of which the lien is claimed with the authority of the owner of the "res" is adopted, it should seem that inasmuch as, first, the freight now sought to be attached was earned for the charterers under their sub-charter, and was, in the first instance, payable to them, and, secondly, the liability incurred for the coals was incurred with their authority, the two necessary elements to the existence of the maritime lien here claimed do concur. Moreover, without the coals the ship could not have earned the freight now sought to be attached; and "service done" is of the very essence of maritime lien. On the other hand, the freight could not have been earned without the ship and her wages and necessary expenses which were to be contributed by the respondents; and the master incurred the liability in question with full notice of the condition of the charter. There seem to me to be equitable considerations on both sides, and I gladly take refuge in the conclusion arrived at by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in Smith v. Plummer, that the freight is an incident of the ship, and cannot be got at unless the ship can also be attached.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ingledew, Ince, & Colt.

Solicitors for the respondents, Maples, Teesdale, & Co., for Leitch, Dodd, Bramwell, & Bell, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) March 9.

HOLMES v. MILLAGE. (a.)

Practice — Receiver — Equitable execution — Future salary or earnings — Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 8.

The court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of the future salary or earnings of a judgment debtor.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division reversing an order of the judge at chambers.

The plaintiff had recovered judgment against the defendant for £500 for money lent. The defendant resided in Paris, being the Paris correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, and had no assets in this country. He was paid by agreement a salary of £8 8s. a week, and this sum he drew each week from a Paris banker who was instructed by the newspaper proprietors to pay it weekly. The defendant was liable to dismissal on a week's notice. Upon the application of the plaintiff the Divisional Court (Day and Collins, JJ.), reversing the decision of Mathew, J., at chambers, made an order, which, so far as material, provided that a receiver be appointed to receive the moneys receivable in respect of the following property, that is, all sums due and payable or to become due and payable to the defendant by the proprietors of the Daily Chronicle newspaper, and that the proprietors of the Daily Chronicle newspaper do pay all sums due and payable or to become due and payable to the defendant to such receiver, and that the receiver do pay such sums in or towards satisfaction of what shall for the time being be due in respect of the judgment debt.

The defendant appealed.

Forman (F. O. Robinson with him), for the defendant.

Philbrick, Q.C. (Arnold Herbert with him), for the plaintiff.

Hamilton v. Brogden, 35 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 296, W. N., 1891, p. 36; In re Mirams, 39 W. R. 464, [1891] 1 Q. B. 594; and In re Shine, 40 W. R. 386, [1892] 1 Q. B. 522, were referred to in addition to some of the cases mentioned in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 9.—The judgment of the COURT (LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was read by LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order appointing a receiver of moneys to become payable to the defendant by third parties, in consideration of services to be performed by him for them. The action is for money lent, and on June 4, 1889, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for £500 and costs. The defendant has no assets in this country. He lives in Paris. He is the foreign correspondent of a London daily morning newspaper, and under an agreement between him and the proprietors of the newspaper he receives from them weekly a sum of £8 8s., which is paid to him through a Paris banker. The plaintiff being unable to obtain payment of her judgment debt first applied for a garnishee order; but as no weekly payments were in arrear no order could be made. It is plain that the defendant's earnings cannot be reached by that process. The plaintiff then applied by summons in chambers for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution of all sums due and payable or to become due and payable to the defendant by the proprietors of the newspaper. The only party to whom the summons was addressed was the defendant. The proprietors of the newspaper were not parties to it. The judge at chambers dismissed the application with costs. The plaintiff appealed to the Divisional Court and that court reversed the order made in chambers and appointed a receiver in the following terms:—[His lordship read the order]. The present appeal is from this order.

The question raised by the appeal is one of great importance, not only to the parties immediately concerned, but to every wage-earning person in the country. The question to be considered in the appeal is whether a judgment creditor is entitled to a receiver of the future earnings of his judgment debtor.

Going back to the time before the Judicature Acts, it is clear that a judgment creditor had no such right. The common law writs of execution did not extend to future income. The garnishee process did not reach it; nor was the statutory process of charging orders applicable to wages or other remuneration for personal services. The courts of common law had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. The court of Chancery no doubt had; but the jurisdiction was confined to certain classes of cases within which such a case as the present cannot be brought. In considering the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to appoint a receiver we may dismiss from our minds all cases in which the court interfered to enforce its own decrees against property the subject-matter of a suit in equity. We have nothing to do here with a suit to enforce a charge created by the debtor; we have simply to deal with a case in which an ordinary judgment creditor sought the aid of a court of equity to enforce his judgment against property not capable of being reached by any common law process. The only cases of this kind in which the courts of equity ever interfered were cases in which the judgment debtor had an equitable interest in property which could have been reached at law if he had had the legal interest in it instead of an equitable interest only. This will be found explained by Sir George Jessel in Salt v. Cooper, 29 W. R. 553, 16 Ch. D. 544, and more recently by Chitty, J., in Wills v. Luff, 36 W. R. 571, 38 Ch. D. 197, and by the Court of Appeal in In re Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131. It is an old mistake to suppose that because there is no effectual remedy at law there must be one in equity. But the mistake, although old, and often pointed out, is sometimes inadvertently made even now. Courts of equity proceed upon well-known principles capable of great expansion, but the principles themselves must not be lost sight of. The principle on which alone the order in this case could be supported before the Judicature Acts is well explained by Cotton, L.J., in Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 27 W. R. 3, 9 Ch. D. 275; it is that courts of equity gave relief where a legal right existed, and there were legal difficulties which prevented the enforcement of that right at law. But the existence of a legal right is essential to the exercise of this jurisdiction. The judgment creditor here has a legal right to be paid his debt, but not out of the future earnings of his debtor; and the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to prevent him from earning his living or from receiving his earnings unless he had himself assigned or charged them. The court could not restrain him from receiving them until his creditor could attach them under the process of garnishment, nor did the court even presume to enlarge a judgment creditor's rights, nor, under colour of assisting him to enforce those rights, did the Court of Chancery attempt to reach by its process a kind of property which was not liable to execution. Before debts and money were made liable to execution by statute, they could not be reached by an ordinary judgment creditor in equity any more than at law. If the earnings could have been reached under a writ of sequestration a receiver might have been appointed as in Willcock v. Terrell, 3 Ex. D. 323, 27 W. R. Dig. 168, but a writ of sequestration was never issued before the Judicature Acts in order to attach a man's personal earnings. Supposing, therefore, that the defendant were in this country, the plaintiff would have no right, upon any principle of equity, to a receiver of his earnings. The defendant's absence abroad is not a circumstance on which the plaintiff can rely for assistance. That circumstance might avail him if he had a right to the defendant's earnings and could not get them by reason of the defendant's absence; but such absence does not create a right to the earnings; and it is the non-existence of that right which prevents the plaintiff from obtaining relief. For these reasons we are of opinion that the present case cannot be brought under any principle applicable to the appointment of receivers by the Court of Chancery, before the passing of the Judicature Acts.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Passing now to those Acts: The only section expressly applicable to receivers is section 25, clause 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, which says that a receiver may be "appointed by an interlocutory order of the court in all cases in which it shall appear to the court to be just or convenient that such order should be made." The order appealed from was made by the Divisional Court under the authority supposed to be conferred by this section.

There is no doubt that since the Judicature Acts receivers by way of equitable execution can be appointed in proper cases by all divisions of the High Court on a motion or summons without the necessity of a fresh action or suit on the judgment. This is plain from Salt v. Cooper; Smith v. Cowell, 29 W. R. 227, 6 Q. B. D. 75; Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies; In re Peace & Waller, 31 W. R. 899, 24 Ch. D. 405. In Smith v. Cowell and some other cases the jurisdiction seems to have been rested on section 25, clause 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873. In Salt v. Cooper the jurisdiction was based on those sections which abolish the old courts and transfer their respective jurisdictions to the High Court and empower every division of that court to give complete relief in every case which comes before it. But accepting the construction put upon section 25, clause 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, in Smith v. Cowell and later cases, according to which a receiver can be appointed in a proper case by way of equitable relief at the instance of a judgment creditor against his debtor, the question next arises whether it is "just or convenient" to appoint a receiver in a case of this description. The meaning of this phrase was considered in the North London Railway v. Great Northern Railway, 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B. D. 30, and it was there decided that the phrase did not justify the granting of an injunction in a case in which no injunction could have been granted by any court before the Judicature Act came into operation. The same reasoning obviously applies in the appointment of receivers, as well as to the grant of injunctions. Although injunctions are granted and receivers are appointed more readily than they were before the passing of the Judicature Acts, and some inconvenient rules formerly observed have been very properly relaxed, the principles on which the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery rested have not been changed. This has been laid down in several cases decided since those Acts came into operation, notably in The Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. v. Parkinson, 37 W. R. 264, 22 Q. B. D. 173. In Whittaker v. Whittaker, 30 W. R. 431, 7 P. D. 15, an order nisi was made for the appointment of a receiver to get in a debt which might be attached under the garnishee order, but this case was disapproved in The Manchester, &c., Banking Co. v. Parkinson, and cannot be relied upon. In the last mentioned case an order for a receiver was discharged because there was no difficulty in enforcing payment of a judgment by the ordinary legal methods. In the present case there is such a difficulty; but it does not arise from any impediment which the old Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to remove. The difficulty arises from the fact that future earnings are not by law attachable by any process of execution, direct or indirect. In Westhead v. Riley, 32 W. R. 273, 25 Ch. D. 413, and in In re Coney, 33 W. R. 701, 29 Ch. D. 993, receivers were appointed of a debtor's interest in personal property, but the property there in question was of a kind which the execution creditors had a right to reach; and those cases fall far short of being authorities for such an order as that now before us. In a popular sense, almost any mode of making a man pay his debts may be just and convenient, at least to the creditor; and in that sense it may be just and convenient to appoint a receiver in a case like this. But even in a popular sense such an order may be anything but just or convenient to the newspaper affected by it. The appointment of a receiver is a serious interference with its business. We cannot judicially hold the appointment of a receiver in a case in which no court could grant a receiver before the Act, to be just or convenient within the true meaning of section 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873. We cannot come to the conclusion that this section was intended to alter the law of debtor and creditor, and the relation of employer and employed, to such a very serious extent as the order appealed from, if upheld, would alter them.

We have carefully gone through the Judicature Acts and orders, including orders 42 to 46, relating to executions and similar matters, and we have examined the cases in the Law Reports in which receivers have been appointed since these Acts came into operation. But we can find no enactment, or rule, or authority on which the order appealed from can be supported. Ord. 42, r. 3, only enables a receiver to be appointed where one could be appointed before the Judicature Acts came into operation. The rules relating to sequestration have never been understood as extending to such a case as this. The Divisional Court did not allude to them, nor did counsel rely upon them. We only mention these to show that they have not been overlooked. Again, we have not to consider whether it would be possible to reach these earnings by proceedings under the Judgment Debtor Act, for no such proceedings have been taken.

The conclusion of the whole matter is that the order appealed from is not warranted either by the Judicature Acts and rules, or by any principle by which courts of law or equity were guided before these Acts were passed. It follows that there was no jurisdiction to make the order. Unless a man has assigned or charged his future earnings, or has made a sum payable out of them, they cannot be prospectively impounded by any of his creditors by any ordinary process of execution, whether legal or equitable. If the law in this respect is to be altered it must be done by the Legislature. But the law ought not to be altered by stretching what are called equitable executions, or, in other words, by appointing receivers in cases to which the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery had no application. Fry, L.J., was quite right when he warned the profession against supposing that the appointment of a receiver is a form of execution which can be obtained without showing to the court the existence of the circumstances creating the equity on which alone the jurisdiction arises (see In re Shephard, 43 Ch. D. 138). The order appealed from must be discharged, with costs both here and below.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Dixon, Weld, & Dixon, for Sewell & Maugham.

Solicitors for the defendant, Colyer & Colyer.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) Dec. 16.

SAUNDERS v. WIEL. (a.)

Design—Infringement—View of Westminster Abbey—Registration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 47, 60.

A design for the handles of spoons, consisting of a representation, taken from a photograph, of a particular view of Westminster Abbey, is properly registered under section 47 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

Adams v. Clementson, 27 W. R. 379, 12 Ch. D. 714, discussed and questioned.

The plaintiffs were the owners and registered proprietors of a design, No. 175,644, for the handles of spoons, and consisting of a representation, taken from a photograph, of Westminster Abbey as seen from a particular point of view. On the 18th of November, 1891, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant, under section 58 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, claiming £100 damages for alleged infringement. It was proved that the defendant had in at least two instances applied the plaintiffs' design to spoon handles, and sold spoons bearing that design.

The defendant contended that the plaintiffs' design was not one which could be registered under section 47 (1) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which enacts that "the comptroller may, on application by or on behalf of any person claiming to be the proprietor of any new or original design, not previously published in the United Kingdom, register the design under this part of this Act."

Cave, J., before whom the action was tried on the 3rd and 8th of August, 1892, held that the design was capable of registration, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 40s. (being 20s. in respect of each case of proved infringement), and costs.

The defendant appealed.

Aston, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The plaintiffs ought to have registered a fine art photograph, not a design. The drawing was made from the photograph, and from the drawing the model, which serves as a mould, was carved. There are important differences between the plaintiffs' view and the defendant's. The plaintiffs must strictly prove their case, and are confined to their registered design, which has four pinnacles not visible in the defendant's. [They cited Le May v. Welch, 33 W. R. 33, 28 Ch. D. 24; Lazarus v. Charles, L. R. 16 Eq. 117, 21 W. R. Dig. 77; Holdsworth v. M'Crea, 14 W. R. 374, 16 Ibid. 226, L. R. 1 Q. B. 264, 2 H. L. 380; Adams v. Clementson, 27 W. R. 379, 12 Ch. D. 714; In re Bach's Design, 38 W. R. 174, 42 Ch. D. 661.] There was no invention in making this patent spoon. "Design" involves an idea. Views of public buildings have often been used for such purposes, and the substitution of one well-known public building for another is not enough. "Pattern" here means a public building with the idea of a souvenir, not necessarily Westminster Abbey. If the plaintiffs may claim the Abbey, nobody else can now use it as seen from other points of view.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. (Morten with him), for the plaintiffs.—Section 60 defines "design" as "any design applicable to any article of manufacture, or to any substance, artificial or natural." [He was stopped by the court.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from Cave, J., and the question which is raised turns upon the true construction of that part of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which relates to designs. The case is this: The plaintiffs have registered under Part III. of that Act a drawing numbered 175,644, which is a representation of one side of Westminster Abbey, and they applied to register it under section 47, sub-section (1). Their design is a representation of a particular view of Westminster Abbey, and this is what is registered. When you come to look at it you find that there is the shaft of a spoon or a fork and then on the top of it there is a drawing of Westminster Abbey seen from a particular point of view. You will find the Abbey towers and the four pinnacles on the top of each, and the transept. It takes a glass to see all that. There is something, therefore, which answers both to "shape" and to "pattern." Photographers have been making photographs of the Abbey, and one photographer has taken a photograph of the Abbey seen from the point of view of the plaintiffs' artist. The artist says that he made this drawing from a photograph, and he carved a die from the drawing, which die forms a mould in sand, and then the metal of the spoon is run into the mould. The plaintiffs are silversmiths, I suppose, and that is what they have done. As regards the defendant's case you have only to look at the two things to see that there is no substantial difference. The defendant has certainly infringed the plaintiffs' rights, if the plaintiffs have any substantial rights at all. It has been put in this way, that there is no substantial right in the plaintiffs. The two sections which are important are sections 47 and 60. [The Lord Justice read the sections, and continued:—] Taking these sections together, what we have to consider is, whether this design is a design applicable to articles of manufacture like forks and spoons, and whether it is a new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom. Why is it not? Has such a design, applicable to metals, ever been seen before? If you ask that, you get the answer, Yes, if you mean by the design public buildings or cathedrals and churches; and therefore there is no novelty in the idea. But if you ask whether anybody has put this particular aspect of Westminster Abbey on any article of manufacture, the answer is, No. That answer seems to me to bring the plaintiffs' case within the Act of Parliament. I think the answer to the argument of counsel on behalf of the defendant is this: they go by steps; the Abbey is not a design within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, and yet the photograph is. The answer is the same as to the photograph: No, until you apply it to something the photograph is not a design. I do not think there is any case there which militates against anything I have said, or against the view which I think is right, unless it is Adams v. Clementson. That case turned on the older Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100, s. 3, which was worded somewhat differently; and I strongly suspect that the point which was not brought out with sufficient prominence, as appears in the case of Adams v. Clementson, has led to a slight variation of the wording of this Act of Parliament. But, however that may be, the language of that Act was by no means so pointed as is the language of this, and I suspect that it has been made more pointed by reason of that decision. I am of opinion that the judgment in this case is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BOWEN, L.J.—We have to begin by asking ourselves, what is the meaning of the term "a new and original design," which is the term used in section 47. What the Act requires is a novelty in the idea itself. It says there must be novelty in the design, that is, in the combination calculated to produce a special thing. When you come to section 60 it makes it even more clear, because the word "design" is defined as limited to designs which are applicable to any article of manufacture. When you come to the words of the clause as to copyright, you find that copyright in design is defined as the exclusive right to apply a design to any article of manufacture. You cannot, therefore, wander away from the sections, and consider whether an idea which is totally remote from that subject-matter is a novel idea or not. When you get thus far it is obvious that Westminster Abbey is not a design, and that the photograph is not a design, but only that from which the design is taken. If the artist had gone straight to the Abbey, and made his design from it, that would not have converted the Abbey into a design. Novelty and originality in a design is not destroyed by its being taken from a source common to mankind. The novelty must, then, consist in the applicability to an article of manufacture of an idea from a source to which all the world may resort. Otherwise it would be impossible to take any natural or artistic object and to reduce it into a design applicable to an article of manufacture without having this consequence follow, that you could not do it unless you were to alter the design so as not to represent exactly the original, because the thing from which it was taken was not "new." An illustration which it seems to me may fairly be taken is the "apostle spoon." The figures of the apostles are figures which have been used for centuries, and there is nothing new in the figure of an apostle; the novelty was in placing that on a spoon. It is not the natural object which is the design, nor is it the photograph. The novelty does not consist in your contriving a copy or mutation of a figure which itself may be common to the world, but in your employing the figure in such a manner as to be applicable to an article of manufacture. As to Adams v. Clementson, I can only say that unless there is some distinction between the two Acts I should doubt whether it is not wrongly decided, and I doubt whether in any case it can be right. It seems to me that section 60 makes the matter clear, and that the same might be made out from section 47 itself.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Maddisons.

Solicitors for the respondents, Gresham, Davies, & Dallas.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Nov. 29.

In re PAGE.
JONES v. MORGAN. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Statute of Limitations—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.

A testatrix gave all her residuary estate to two trustees in trust for an infant, to be paid to him at twenty-one. He attained twenty-one in 1880. In 1892 he took out a summons against the two trustees for administration of testatrix's estate. Only one of the defendants, who had been acting trustee, appeared. Plaintiff made no allegation of fraud. There was no evidence that defendant still retained any part of the trust funds, or had converted them to his own use. Defendant admitted that he had rendered no account to the plaintiff, but deposed that he had spent all the trust funds in maintaining the plaintiff during his infancy.

Held, that the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, applied, and that the summons must be dismissed, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

Ann Page, who died in May, 1875, by her will gave all her real and personal estate to the defendants, Thomas Morgan and Richard Jones, her executors and trustees, upon trust for sale and conversion, and after payment of certain legacies to invest the residue and hold the same in trust for her nephew C. H. Jones, the plaintiff, to be paid and transferred to him on his attaining twenty-one. At her death the testatrix was entitled, as one of the next of kin, to one-third of the residuary estate of William Page, who died in 1861. The testatrix's will was proved by both her executors, whose account submitted to the Inland Revenue showed that her residuary estate amounted to £153. The plaintiff attained twenty-one in 1880.

This was an originating summons taken out by him on the 26th of May, 1892, which claimed an order for the administration of the real and personal estates of Ann Page and William Page. The defendant Jones did not appear. The plaintiff made an affidavit to the effect that after the death of Ann Page he resided with the defendant Morgan, at his request, for over three years, during which time he was maintained by Morgan. On attaining twenty-one he was informed by Morgan that, so far from anything being due to him under Ann Page's will, he was in Morgan's debt, and he therefore took no steps in the matter. Morgan never gave him any account. Morgan never told him that he was entitled to one-third of William Page's estate, which he only ascertained in March, 1892, when he at once instructed his solicitor to claim an account. Morgan had received the whole of the trust moneys and never consulted his co-trustee. There was no allegation of fraud against Morgan. In his affidavit in reply Morgan stated that about twelve months before the plaintiff came of age he explained to him the position of the trust estate, and of what it consisted, and told him there was a small sum due to himself, which the plaintiff promised to pay. The plaintiff then left him, as he had no further means of his wherewith to maintain him. The plaintiff had never raised any question about the estates of Ann or William Page for over eleven years. The whole of plaintiff's share in those estates had been expended in his maintenance and education; no part thereof had at any time since been in his (Morgan's) control, custody, or possession, and he claimed the benefit of the Statute of Limitations and the Trustee Act, 1888. Richard Jones was consulted by him and assisted him in managing the trusts. The plaintiff made a further affidavit denying that Morgan had given him any explanation or that he had expended on his maintenance even half the moneys due to him, and claimed to set off services rendered by him to Morgan.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

L. Ryland, for the plaintiff, asked for an account.

Gatey, for the defendant Morgan.—The defendant has expended the whole of the plaintiff's interest in his maintenance and education, and no longer retains any part of the trust property. There is no allegation that he has converted any part of it to his own use or has been a party to any fraud: In re Swain, Swain v. Bringeman, [1891] 3 Ch. 233, 40 W. R. Dig. 269. He is, therefore, protected by the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8.

Ryland, in reply.—The Act does not apply. Although there is no allegation of fraud the evidence shows that the defendant made fraudulent representations to the plaintiff. The defendant admits that he has received the trust property, and even if he did expend it on the plaintiff's maintenance it was a voluntary expenditure, as he was not the plaintiff's guardian, and he must be treated as having applied it to his own use. The Act does not relieve trustees from the necessity of accounting to their cestuis que trust, it only bars an application for payment.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the Act applies. I repudiate the suggestion that the court could be justified in inferring that there has been fraud on the part of the defendant Morgan. There is no evidence nor is there any allegation of any fraudulent breach of trust to which Morgan was party or privy, and even if there had been it could not be dealt with on an originating summons. The plaintiff seeks to deprive Morgan of the protection of the Act by asserting that he still retains part of the trust fund, and that he has converted it to his own use, but there is no evidence to prove this; while Morgan swears that he has expended the whole of the trust funds in the maintenance and education of the plaintiff during his minority. In my opinion Morgan is entitled to the benefit of the protection given by section 8 of the Act. I shall, therefore, dismiss the summons, but without costs, because Morgan admits that he has received £150 of which he has given no account or explanation, except that while the plaintiff was an infant he told him how he had applied the fund.

Solicitors, Woodcock, Ryland, & Parker, for Arthur Smith, Birmingham; Ellis, Munday, & Clarke, for Whatley & Lambert, Great Malvern.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Dec. 21.

FURNIVALL v. HUDSON. (a.)

Bill of sale—Execution by attorney—Grantee of bill appointed attorney—Payment on demand—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 1; 1882, s. 10.

Debtors covenanted, in case of default of payments, to execute such a bill of sale as their creditor's solicitor might reasonably require on its being tendered to them, and in case of non-execution appointed their creditor their attorney for the purpose. Creditor presented a bill in which the money owing was payable on demand.

Held (following Hetherington v. Groome, 33 W. R. 103, 13 Q. B. D. 789), that the bill presented was invalid, as not in statutory form, but that the creditor was entitled to tender, and, if necessary, to execute, a proper bill of sale.

Interlocutory injunction.

By an indenture dated the 12th of May, 1871, and made between the plaintiff, W. R. Truman, and his wife, and the defendant, W. C. Hudson, it was witnessed that Furnivall and Truman (the plaintiffs in this action), covenanted to pay to the defendant a principal sum of £1,957, with interest at 5 per cent., and a bonus of £1,000 owing to the defendant by the said W. G. Furnivall under an indenture which was expressed to be cancelled by the indenture now under recital. It was agreed that payment should be by instalments, but in the event of any default the whole sum should become payable. The same indenture witnessed that the principal, interest, and bonus were charged on the lease, goodwill, and other assets, other than furniture and chattels, of a club therein named, of which the plaintiffs were proprietors; and the said plaintiffs agreed with the said defendant that they would when called upon, so long as any part of the said principal and interest and bonus remained unpaid, execute to the said defendant a legal mortgage of the premises hereinbefore charged, and after failure in the payment of any instalments mentioned in the said indenture would execute a bill of sale or bills of sales of the furniture and all other chattels which now are, or shall at any time during the period aforesaid be, in, upon, or about the said club premises, or any other premises where the said club may be carried on, or used in connection with the business thereof; and such mortgage or mortgages, bill of sale or bills of sale to be in such form as the solicitors for the time being of the said W. C. Hudson may reasonably require; and should the said W. G. Furnivall and W. R. Truman neglect or refuse within seven days after notice in writing requiring them so to do, the indenture provided that the said W. G. Furnivall and W. R. Truman irrevocably appointed the said W. C. Hudson their attorney for the purpose.

Default having been made in payment, and two instalments being, it was stated, in arrear, the defendant, on the 2nd of December, 1892, sent a bill of sale to the plaintiffs' club for them to execute. The plaintiffs did not execute the bill, and the defendant's solicitor gave them notice that the defendant intended to execute it himself on the 10th of December, 1892, unless it was previously executed by them.

The bill of sale tendered provided, inter alia, that the plaintiffs should pay the principal sum, bonus, and interest on demand in writing.

The plaintiffs moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from executing the bill as their attorney, and the question came before the court on an interlocutory motion for an injunction.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Corner, for the plaintiffs.—The bill is bad for three reasons. In the first place, it is contrary to all the scope and purpose of the Bills of Sale Acts that a bill should be executed otherwise than by the grantor in person. The power professed to be given was a violation of the statute. By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 1, it is enacted: "The execution of every bill of sale shall be attested by a solicitor of the Supreme Court, and the attestation shall state that before the execution of the bill the effect thereof has been explained to the grantor by the attesting solicitor." Section 10 of the Act of 1882, which repeals so much of the clause of the Act of 1878 which requires attestation by a solicitor, would seem to imply that the bill must be executed by the grantor in person. In the second place, it is bad because it is unreasonable and contrary to the objects sought to be effected by the Bills of Sale Act that the grantee of the bill should have power to put himself in the shoes of the grantor. In the third place, it has been settled by authority that a bill of sale is invalid if by it money is made payable on demand: Hetherington v. Groome, 33 W. R. 103, 13 Q. B. D. 789.

After calling on counsel for defendants to reply to the third point, NORTH, J., said: The bill before me is not, according to the decision in Hetherington v. Groome, in legal form. I must on that ground restrain the defendant from executing it.

Counsel for the plaintiffs requested that the other two objections might be also disposed of, as otherwise the defendant might tender to the plaintiffs another bill in which the sum due was not made payable on demand.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Spence, for the defendant.—In principle there is no reason why a bill of sale should not be executed by an attorney. It does not matter who executes deeds. By section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1884, when a person refuses or neglects to execute an instrument the court may nominate a person to execute it for him. Nor is there anything in the Bills of Sale Acts to prevent a bill being executed by an attorney, and there is no reason why the grantee of such bill should not himself be the attorney.

Corner, in reply.—The Bills of Sale Acts do not authorize the grantee of the bill to be the grantor's attorney. It is intended by the Acts that the grantor should exercise his discretion before executing the bill.

NORTH, J.—I am of opinion that the first two points are not well founded. The first point is that a bill of sale must be executed by the grantor and not by attorney; and the second point is that, even if the bill can be executed by attorney, the grantee of the bill cannot be that attorney. By the indenture now before me the principal sum advanced by the defendant to the plaintiff is charged on the lease, goodwill, and other assets belonging to the plaintiffs, and it is provided that the plaintiffs will, when requested, while any part of the principal, interest, and bonus remains unpaid, execute to the said defendant a proper legal mortgage of the said premises, and after default in the payment of any of the instalments therein mentioned, a bill of sale of the furniture or other chattels which are or shall be on the club premises, or other premises where the said club may be carried on, and such mortgage or bill of sale shall be in the form required by the solicitor of the defendant, and if the mortgage or bill is not executed the plaintiffs appoint the defendant their attorney for the purpose. A bill of sale is tendered to the grantors for their execution.

I have held that such bill of sale, if executed by the grantors, would be bad; but this decision, though stopping further proceedings on the present bill, would not prevent the grantee from tendering another bill in proper form to the grantors, and, if necessary, from executing it himself as their attorney. Now, as to the other two points, I do not find anything in the Bills of Sale Acts which says a bill of sale must be executed by the grantor in person. Section 10 of the Act of 1882 says: "The execution of every bill of sale by the grantor shall be attested by one or more credible witness or witnesses not being parties thereto." This is undoubtedly the strongest section on the subject, but it does not say that the bill must, unlike any other deed, be executed by the grantor in person, and not by attorney. Nor is there anything in the schedule to the Act that says the bill must be executed by the grantor in person. Under section 10 of the Act of 1878 the question would have been more difficult to decide, as under that section it was necessary that the meaning of the bill should be explained to the grantor; but that, section having been repealed, no argument drawn from it can apply here.

Then, on the second point, it is said that the grantee cannot be such attorney. But on this subject the instrument appointing him attorney must be considered. The instrument can only apply to a statutory bill of sale, for that is the only sort of bill the plaintiffs can be compelled to execute. It says also that it must be in such form as the grantee's solicitor may reasonably require; but it must also be presented to the grantor, and thus there is no danger of the grantee executing the bill behind the back of the grantor. Under section 14 of the Judicature Act of 1884 the defendant could come to the court and obtain an order to compel the plaintiffs to execute a bill, and in case of refusal the court could nominate a person to execute it for them. The arrangement between the parties merely renders such an application unnecessary, and I see nothing inequitable in it. I think, therefore, that neither to the first or second point do the objections hold.

Solicitors, Saunders, Hawksford, Bennett, & Co.; Heather & Sons.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 24.
Kekewich, J. }

CAVE v. CREW. (a.)

Practice—Pleadings—Striking out pleadings—Statement of claim seeking relief not asked by writ—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 27; ord. 20, r. 4.

By the writ in a partnership action the plaintiff claimed an account of the partnership dealings between himself and the defendant, and an injunction restraining the defendant from dealing with the partnership assets. The plaintiff delivered a statement of claim, in which he alleged that the defendant had made certain representations to him, on the faith of which he paid to the defendant a premium of £1,500. He also alleged a course of conduct on the part of the defendant entitling him to damages, and claimed, in addition to the relief sought by the writ, the return of the said premium, and damages.

Held, that the statement of claim was irregular, inasmuch as it sought relief substantially different from that claimed by the writ, and operated to prevent a reference to arbitration; that it was not an alteration, modification, or extension of the writ within the meaning of ord. 20, r. 4; and that it must be struck out.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

The plaintiff and the defendant in this action were partners as secretaries to promoters of public companies under a deed of partnership dated the 17th of November, 1890. Disputes having arisen between them, this action was commenced.

By the indorsement on the writ the plaintiff claimed an account of the partnership dealings between himself and the defendant under the said articles of partnership, and an injunction restraining the defendant from disposing of, or charging, or otherwise dealing with any of the shares standing in the defendant's name in Gardner's Royal Hotel Co. (Limited), of Guernsey, or any other assets or effects of or belonging to the partnership business.

The plaintiff delivered a statement of claim which contained (inter alia) the following allegations:—

Paragraph 1 alleged that, "in order to induce the plaintiff to enter into partnership with him and to pay him a premium," the defendant had represented to the plaintiff that the business would be more remunerative than farming business, and had promised the plaintiff that the profits of the promotion of certain companies then proceeding should be regarded as partnership profits if the plaintiff should join the defendant in partnership.

Paragraph 2 alleged that, "on the faith of the representations, and relying on the promise aforesaid, the plaintiff sold his farming business and stock, and paid to the defendant a premium of £1,500, and entered into partnership as secretaries to promoters of public companies under a partnership deed dated the 17th of November, 1890."

Paragraph 7 alleged that the defendant refused to transfer certain shares to which he and the plaintiff had become entitled, and which he (the defendant) had wrongfully had transferred into his own name.

Paragraph 8 alleged that the defendant refused to account for various shares and sums of money representing remuneration for services rendered by the plaintiff and the defendant.

Paragraph 9 alleged that the defendant refused to have the name of the partnership firm on the partnership premises, but that he had kept his own name only on the door of the partnership office.

Paragraph 12 alleged that, "in consequence of such refusal as aforesaid, no proper books of account have been kept, and no annual or other accounts have been taken pursuant to the said partnership deed."

Paragraph 15 alleged that, "by reason of the conduct of the defendant, it has become impracticable to continue the partnership business, except for the purpose of winding up the same, and the consideration for which the plaintiff paid the same premium of £1,500 has failed, and the plaintiff has incurred considerable loss and damage."

By his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed: (1) dissolution; (2) accounts and inquiries; (3) a declaration that certain profits were partnership property; (4) return of the said premium; (5) a receiver; (6) an injunction to restrain the defendant from transferring shares belonging to the partnership; and (7) damages.

This was a motion by the defendant that the statement of claim delivered by the plaintiff might be struck out, or, in the alternative, that all allegations and claims contained in the same statement of claim which introduced or contained causes of action not mentioned in or made by the writ in the action might be struck out, and that the plaintiff might be ordered to pay to the defendant the costs of this motion.

The Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 20, r. 4, provide that "whenever a statement of claim is delivered, the plaintiff may therein alter, modify, or extend his claim without any amendment of the indorsement of the writ."

Warmington, Q.C., and J. W. Baines, for the defendant, in support of the motion.—The statement of claim discloses a cause of action substantially different from that disclosed by the writ, and is therefore irregular: United Telephone Co. (Limited) v. Tasker, 59 L. T. N. S. 852, 37 W. R. Dig. 144. This dispute ought to be referred to arbitration, but the statement of claim prevents any such reference. A charge of fraud is now made against us of which there is not the slightest indication in the writ.

Renshaw, Q.C., and H. Greenwood, for the plaintiff.—The claim both in the writ and in the statement of claim is founded on the same subject-matter—the partnership deed—and the statement of claim is a mere alteration, modification or extension of the writ within the meaning of ord. 20, r. 4. United Telephone Co. (Limited) v. Tasker was decided under ord. 18, r. 1, and ord. 19, r. 27, without reference to ord. 20, r. 4.

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a question of some difficulty. On the one hand it is desirable that a liberal construction should be given to ord. 20, r. 4, and that the exactness of pleadings should not be too strongly insisted upon, but, on the other hand, if there are to be pleadings at all, they should define the points at issue so as to save the parties from being embarrassed. Then, again, though I am very unwilling to increase costs merely because the plaintiff is desirous of making some separate demand, it seems a pity to put obstacles in the way of a reference to arbitration. It is, therefore, difficult to steer clear of rocks on one side or the other.

The writ in this action is of the simplest character. It asks for partnership accounts and an injunction to restrain dealing with shares or other partnership assets. Upon this the defendant would have been entitled to a stay of execution, and I have before me now a motion to refer the whole matter to arbitration under an arbitration clause in the partnership deed. I think these accounts ought to be referred. The statement of claim, however, entirely prevents any such reference, and this point is important, as it seems to afford the solution of the difficulty.

In one sense, no doubt, the statement of claim is an alteration and an extension of the writ, but I do not think it is so within the meaning of ord. 20, r. 4. [His lordship read the paragraphs of the statement of claim recited above, and continued:—] The plaintiff here alleges representation and a course of conduct on the part of the defendant entitling him to a return of the premium and damages. Mr. Renshaw says that these allegations could not have supported an action of deceit. That may be so, but the inference is that they were improperly made. Now, there is no indication of all this in the writ, nor is it even adumbrated. The statement of claim is entirely hostile, and prevents the beneficial order for reference to arbitration which might otherwise have been made. Therefore I think the statement of claim is irregular.

That being so, what ought I do? I cannot settle the plaintiff's pleading for him. I think the proper order to make is that the statement of claim be struck out, liberty being given to the plaintiff within a reasonable time to deliver another in accordance with the indorsement on the writ. If he desires to amend his writ, I must give him leave to do so on paying the costs. The plaintiff must pay the costs of this motion and the costs thrown away by reason of the delivery of the statement of claim.

including the costs of the defendant's motion to refer.

Solicitors for the defendant, Lovell, Son, & Pitfield, for Baskett & Son, Evershot.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Howard & Shelton.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Nov. 26; Dec. 3.

BRADBURY v. WILD. (a.)

Building society—Mortgage—Proviso for redemption—Advanced member—Subsequent alteration of rules—Contract of membership and of mortgage—Liability of mortgagor.

An advanced member of a building society executed a mortgage in favour of the society, the proviso for redemption being upon payment of "the several sums, whether consisting of monthly subscriptions, fines, interest, or other payments which, under the constitution of the said society and the rules and regulations thereof, ought to be by him paid in respect of the share or shares by virtue of which money is now or shall be hereafter advanced to him by the trustees of the said society." At the date of the mortgage the rules of the society did not provide for any contribution by advanced members in respect of losses; but after the date of the mortgage the rules were amended so as to give the directors power to direct a levy upon members to provide for contribution to losses. A levy was duly made under the rules as amended. The mortgagor claimed to redeem without paying any part of the levy.

Held, that the mortgagor's contract was one of membership and mortgage combined; that, by virtue of it, he was bound by the amended rules, although the mortgage deed did not refer to the rules "for the time being"; and that, therefore, he was not entitled to redeem except upon payment of the amount of the levy apportioned in respect of his shares.

Adjourned summons.

The defendants were the present trustees of the Clarendon Arms Benefit Building Society, which was established in 1871, and was not incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874.

Samuel Bradbury, the plaintiff, having become a member of the society, received an advance of £120 in respect of two shares, and executed in favour of the society a mortgage of freehold property as security for that sum and for further advances up to £2,500. By the mortgage deed it was provided that the mortgagor should be entitled to redeem if he should "from time to time duly pay the yearly rent to which the premises are liable, and also the several sums, whether consisting of monthly subscriptions, fines, interest, or other payments which, under the constitution of the said society and the rules and regulations thereof, ought to be . . . paid in respect of the share or shares by virtue of which money is or shall hereafter be advanced to him by the trustees of the said society." The mortgagor covenanted that he would "duly pay the several sums which, under the constitution of the said society and the rules and regulations thereof, and the provisions herein contained, ought to be paid by him." The plaintiff received further advances to the total amount of £2,490 in respect of 41½ shares.

At the date of the mortgage the following were among the rules of the society:—

"Rule 51. (Withdrawals). Any member who has not received any advance on his or her share or shares may, upon giving one lunar month's previous notice in writing to the secretary, within the first year from the date of his or her subscribing for such share or shares, to be withdrawn, receive back the net money by him or her subscribed, without interest; and after the expiration of the first year, any such member, upon giving notice as aforesaid, shall be entitled to withdraw his or her share or shares, with interest thereon after the rate of five pounds per annum compound interest commencing from the end of the first year of his or her subscribing for such share or shares as aforesaid, less one-twentieth part of such interest, and the sum of one shilling for each share. Half and quarter shares in proportion. The directors shall have full power, from time to time, to limit the number of shares to be withdrawn in any one month. All applications for advances shall have priority over notices of withdrawals; and if more than one member give notice, they shall be entitled to be paid in rotation, according to priority of notice. No member shall be entitled to receive back his or her subscription money and interest until all fines and forfeitures due from such member at the time he or she shall give notice to withdraw be paid, and if not paid shall be deducted from such member's money and interest. All fines to cease after notice given as aforesaid."

"52. (Power to Redeem.) If any member who shall have executed a mortgage to the society shall be desirous of paying off and redeeming the same, such member may do so after the expiration of fourteen days from the service upon the secretary of a notice in writing, signed by such member, of his or her intention so to do, by paying to the treasurer, in one sum, the whole of the moneys that may be due from him or her to the said society, subject to the same terms as contained or mentioned in rule 51."

"61. (New Rules.) The society shall have, from time to time, the power of making new rules, and of amending any of the rules, so as such new rules or amendments be made in accordance with 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 9, and duly certified."

Subsequently to the mortgage the rules of the society were altered, and the alterations were duly certified. These alterations, so far as material were as follows:—

"Rule 51. Omit the words 'compound interest.' Rescind the portion commencing with the words, 'And if more than one member give notice'; and ending with the words, 'All fines to cease after notice given as aforesaid,' and substitute the following: 'Before any withdrawals can be made, if it shall appear that the profits of the society shall, from any cause, not be sufficient to meet the interest credited, or to be credited, to the shareholders as aforesaid, or if a loss shall have arisen, or be likely to arise, through any property or properties which the society holds as mortgagees, which the contingent fund is insufficient to make good, the directors shall have power to direct a levy of such sum, on or from any unadvanced share or shares, hereafter to be paid in advance, as will cover all deficiency. Withdrawals shall be paid in rotation, according to priority of notice, except in the case of the decease of a member, when payment shall be made as soon as possible after expiration of the notice of withdrawal, provided all shares or loans in respect of which notice for any advance or repayment has been received by the society shall have been advanced or paid off. Shares in course of withdrawal shall be subject to such deductions as the directors may require to meet any losses of the society.'"

"Rule 52. Add to the end of rule 52 the words 'as amended.'"

In accordance with the rules so altered the directors of the society resolved "that a levy of 1s. 1½d. in the pound sterling be made on all shares at present in the society withdrawn or expiring."

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon the plaintiff giving notice of his intention to pay off the mortgage he was furnished with an account which debited him with the sum of £58 15s. 2d., as the proportion due from him in respect of his shares under the said levy. The plaintiff then tendered to the society a sum of money which was insufficient upon the footing that this sum of £58 15s. 2d. was owing by him, and the society refused to accept such tender.

This was an originating summons by the plaintiff, asking for an order for redemption and for usual accounts and inquiries, and that directions might be given that the defendants were not entitled to debit the plaintiff with the said sum of £58 15s. 2d.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Roby, for the plaintiff.—The mortgagor is not bound by the rules made subsequent to his mortgage: In re Norwich and Norfolk Permanent Benefit Building Society, 24 W. R. 103, 1 Ch. D. 481. In Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society, 37 W. R. 369n., 22 Q. B. D. 381n., and Rosenberg v. Northumberland Building Society, 37 W. R. 368, 22 Q. B. D. 373, there was a reference in the mortgages to the rules "for the time being," and these cases are therefore distinguishable.

They referred also to the following cases: Tosh v. North British Building Society, 35 W. R. 413, 11 App. Cas. 489; Brownlie v. Russell, 8 App. Cas. 235, 31 W. R. Dig. 28; Buckle v. Lordonny, 35 W. R. 360, 56 L. J. Ch. 437; Bailes v. Sunderland Equitable Industrial Society, 55 L. T. N. S. 808, 35 W. R. Dig. 100; Durham v. Northumberland Building Society, 61 L. J. Q. B. 473, 8 Times L. R. 428, 40 W. R. Dig. 29; In re Britannia Building Society, 65 L. T. N. S. 196, 40 W. R. Dig. 30.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the defendants.—The judgments of Cotton, L.J., in Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society and Fry, L.J., in Rosenberg v. Northumberland Building Society show that their decision would have been the same if the words "for the time being" had not been used. The plaintiff's contract was one of membership as well as of mortgage, and therefore carried in gremio the right of the society to alter its rules: see the judgment of Fry, L.J., in Rosenberg's case.

They referred also to Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33, and In re West Riding of Yorkshire Permanent Benefit Building Society, 38 W. R. 376, 43 Ch. D. 407.

Roby replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The mortgage deed commences as though it were a mere contract between a mortgagor and mortgagees, and as though it had nothing to do with the society at all, except that the mortgagees are described as the trustees of the building society; but when the mere conveyance to the mortgagees is passed, and we come to those provisoes which declare what the equity of redemption is, then it is at once seen how membership of the society comes in. [His lordship read the proviso for redemption and the covenant set out above, and continued:—] This is neither an ordinary mortgage contract, nor an ordinary contract of a member with a building society, but it is an amalgamation of the two—a contract by a member of a building society, who is to receive an advance in respect of his membership, and of his conveyance to the society of his property. Apart from authority I should have thought that the rules referred to meant those which bind him as a member, and if there were, as in fact there is, a power on behalf of the society, subject to certain restrictions, to vary these rules from time to time, the varied rules would still be binding on him for the purposes of this contract, because it is an essential term of it that he enters into it as a member of the society. That was the opinion of Cotton, L.J., in the Miles Platting case, where he says: "One would expect, therefore, if the new rules were properly made, having regard to the laws regulating the society and to the original rules, that those new rules would regulate his position in regard to the security, it being, as was rightly contended for the appellant, not an ordinary mortgage to secure the payment in terms of a definite sum of money due and payable by the mortgagor to the society, but to secure the due payment by him of the periodical payments and fines, and any other moneys which he was bound to pay as a member of the society." That passage seems to me to indicate what would be the proper limit of the obligation of the new rules. New rules which alter the contract would not be binding on him; new rules inconsistent with the constitution of the society of which he was a member would not, or might not, be binding on him; but rules which are concerned with the periodical payments of fines, or any other sums, are rules which, so far from altering the contract or being inconsistent with it, seem to me to be according to the contract.

Then, again, Cotton, L.J., in the same case, says:—"It is true that those rules may throw a heavier burden on the plaintiff, by requiring him to pay a larger sum for the redemption of the mortgage than the old rules did, but that is not an alteration of his contract. His contract, as I read it, was that he would pay, not merely what the then existing rules required, it is not confined to that, but whatever the rules of the society for the time being might require him to pay as a member. To say that the new rules do not apply would, in my opinion, be to alter the contract." These passages of Cotton, L.J.'s judgment show that his view was, as mine certainly is, that you would expect in such a contract that the obligation of the new rules, properly made, would be thrown on the members, provided, of course, that the rules were fairly within what might be in the contemplation of the parties, and therefore not inconsistent with the contract or against the constitution of the society.

The plaintiff says he is not a withdrawing member, but the result of rule 52 is that, as far as possible, regulations affecting withdrawals shall be applied to cases of redemption, and a member who is redeeming, whether he be withdrawing or not, must have his account taken, as between himself and the society, on the same basis as the withdrawing member according to rule 51 as amended. Of course, he is entitled to say all the rules must be strictly observed, and that there must not be too large a sum deducted, but in this case there is no suggestion of want of bona fides. The directors have kept their accounts and have estimated the loss, the result being that the plaintiff, in respect of his 41½ shares, is debited with £58 15s. 2d.

Now with regard to Rosenberg v. Northumberland Building Society and Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society, in each of these cases the words "for the time being" occur. The general principle, however, with which Cotton, L.J., commences in the passage which I first read from his judgment in the Miles Platting case points to rules either having or not having the words "for the time being." In Rosenberg's case the point came before the court again. That case was tried before Day, J., without a jury, and he gave judgment for the mortgagor. The Court of Appeal reversed the learned judge, on the ground of the decision in the Miles Platting case, which was not cited to Day, J. That is not unimportant, because we know that Day, J., came to a conclusion, unfettered by authority, adverse to that which is here insisted on by the society as the right conclusion. Lord Esher, M.R., rested his decision entirely on the Miles Platting case, as also did Bowen, L.J. Fry, L.J., however, gave a judgment which certainly makes me think that he would not only have decided the Miles Platting case as it was decided on the words then before the court, but would have gone further, and have decided that the member was bound by the altered rules even without the words "for the time being." He said:—"It is obvious that the position of a mortgagor in the case of a mortgage to a building society is by no means the same as that of an ordinary mortgagor, and that his rights must be more or less affected by the contract of membership, as well as by the contract of mortgage. It is equally apparent, I think, that the contract of membership carries in gremio the right on the part of the society to alter the rules from time to time. That right is given by statute." The Lord Justice did not decide the point which is now before me, but he has given a strong indication of what he would have decided, and Cotton, L.J.'s mind tended, I think, in the same direction. My mind certainly goes very much in that direction. It seems to me that a member seeking an advance on the terms of his observing the rules of the society, and making a contract which, although one of mortgage, is also one of membership, must be held bound by the rules from time to time made, so long as they are consistent with his contract, and that, as Fry, L.J., said, the two things are so intertwined that you cannot separate the contract of membership from the contract of mortgage. The plaintiff, therefore, must be debited with this sum of £58 15s. 2d., and an account taken on that footing.

Solicitors, L. Sykes, Manchester, for J. Cooke, Hyde; John Clayton, Manchester, for T. & G. F. Drinkwater, Hyde.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Feb. 20.

In re BIDWELL BROTHERS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Voting—Extraordinary resolution—Proxies—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 51, 129; schedule I., Table A., clauses 42, 43, 48, 51.

Where a company is governed by articles which provide that "votes may be given either personally or by proxy," proxies may be counted in ascertaining the three-fourths majority required for the passing an extraordinary resolution by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862.

The Caloric Engine, &c., Co., 52 L. T. N. S. 846, questioned.

In re Horbury Bridge Coal, Iron, and Wagon Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109, distinguished.

Petition.

This was a shareholder's petition that the abovenamed company might be wound up by the court, or in the alternative that the voluntary winding up might be continued subject to the supervision of the court.

The company was incorporated in 1889 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886. The company was governed by Table A so far as the articles hereafter referred to were concerned.

On the 27th of January, 1893, a general meeting of the company was held and an extraordinary resolution passed that the company could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind up the company voluntarily. The resolution was declared duly carried and entered in the minute-book, but the three-fourths majority required by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, could not be arrived at except by counting the votes of certain members who were not present in person but were represented by proxies. No poll was demanded.

This petition was presented on the 3rd of February, 1893, and the petitioners disputed the validity of the resolution for voluntary liquidation, on the ground that the votes of proxies had been admitted among the votes of those constituting the statutory majority.

The material clauses of Table A are the following:—

42. "At a general meeting, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, a declaration of the chairman that a resolution has been carried, and an entry to that effect in the book of proceedings of the company, shall be sufficient evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution."

48. "Votes may be given either personally or by proxy."

Clause 43 provides for the case of a poll, and clause 51 gives the form of instrument to be used in appointing a proxy.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the petition.—The resolution to wind up voluntarily was not validly carried, because it was only carried by means of proxies, and the regulations of the company did not allow members to vote by proxy except in the case of a poll. Where by the regulations of a company voting by proxy is allowed, proxies cannot be used on a show of hands, but a poll must first be taken: Re Horbury Bridge Coal, Iron, and Wagon Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109; Buckley on Companies, 6th ed., p. 483. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., referred to The Caloric Engine, &c., Co., 52 L. T. N. S. 846, the headnote of which is: "At a general meeting of a company, where by its articles of association voting by proxy is allowed, proxies cannot be used upon a show of hands, but a poll must first be taken."]

Hansell, for the voluntary liquidator and a majority of the shareholders.—The resolution is perfectly valid. Clause 48 of Table A is general, and is not restricted in the way suggested. Clause 51 which gives the form of proxy, is also perfectly general in its language. Section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, enables members to vote by proxy in cases where "by the regulations of the company proxies are allowed." That is the case here. In The Caloric Engine, &c., Co. the articles are not stated and the point does not seem to have been argued.

Pattisson, for shareholders who supported the petition.

Bramwell Davies and Clydesdale, for creditors supporting the petition.

Jenkins, in reply.—The case of The Caloric Engine &c., Co. is conclusive on this point.

He also referred to In re Haven Gold Mining Co., 30 W. R. 389, 20 Ch. D. 151; Reg. v. Government Stock Investment Co., 3 Q. B. D. 442, 26 W. R. Dig. 47; In re Chillington Iron Co., 33 W. R. 442, 29 Ch. D. 159.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have come to the conclusion that these votes of members who were present only by proxy can be taken into consideration, even though there is no poll. My attention has been called to a case of The Caloric Engine, &c., Co. decided by Kay, L.J. (then Kay, J.). I do not know what wer the particular articles of association in that case, and the question now before me does not appear to have been argued. Though I should pay the greatest possible attention to any decision of Kay, L.J., I do not consider I am bound by that decision. My attention was also called to the case of In re Horbury Bridge, &c., Co., but nobody has suggested that the point which I have now to decide was decided in that case. It is said that the principle laid down by Sir G. Jessel in that case is practically decisive of the matter which I have now to determine. I do not think so. All that was decided in that case was that that if you have a meeting of members present in person, the common law mode of ascertaining the votes applies - namely, by a show of hands. That case does not decide what is to be done in the case of persons present by proxy only.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In these circumstances I have to decide for the first time the proper mode of taking votes at such a meeting as that in the present case. I think the proper mode is for the chairman to count, not only the votes of the members present in person, but also those of members present by proxy. Clause 48 of Table A applies to this company. Clause 48 of Table A provides that "votes may be given either personally or by proxy." Primâ facie that means on all occasions when voting has to take place. Section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that the voting in the case of a special resolution shall be "by not less than three-fourths of such members of the company for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote as may be present in person or proxy (in case where by the regulations of the company proxies are allowed), at any general meeting," &c. This is a case where "by the regulations of the company" proxies are allowed. In these circumstances you cannot get a resolution passed unless there are present three-fourths of the members in person, or by proxy in cases where proxies are allowed.

It seems to me impossible to say that you are, by your mode of counting the votes, to exclude those persons who are present only by proxy. It is said that all persons present by proxy can be counted if a poll is demanded, and that that is the only way in which their voice is to be heard. It seems to me that that would be working a great injustice to members present by proxy only if their votes were only to be counted when there is a poll, because according to the decision in Reg. v. The Government Stock Investment Co. a member present by proxy only cannot demand a poll.

In these circumstances I hold that the chairman was right in counting the votes of those present by proxy only. I wish to add that each member present by proxy only had a right to be counted one by one as a member present, but not according to the number of shares he held.

His lordship made the usual supervision order.

Solicitors, Sole, Turner, & Knight, for C. J. Brutton, Ottery St. Mary's; Sandilands & Co.; Chester & Co.; Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton, for Gould & Crompton, Exeter.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, J.) — Feb. 27.

ROBINSON v. CALDWELL AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Notice of trial—No reply delivered—Giving notice of trial before expiration of time for reply—Right of plaintiff to give such notice of trial—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 27, r. 13; ord. 36, rr. 11, 15.

A plaintiff who has not delivered a reply cannot give notice of trial of the action until the expiration of the time allowed for delivering a reply—that is, until the expiration of twenty-one days after the defence; because, no reply having been delivered under rule 13 of order 27, the pleadings are not closed until the expiration of the time allowed for reply, and no notice of trial can be given until after that time.

Plaintiff's appeal from an order of Kennedy, J., at chambers, affirming an order of Master Manley Smith, who had ordered that the notice of trial of the action, and the entry in pursuance thereof, should be struck out.

The statement of claim, which was indorsed on the writ, claimed the sum of £20,000 for 20,000 fully paid-up shares of £1 each in the Jacinto Estate (Limited), alleged to have been received by the defendants for and on behalf of the plaintiff.

The statement of defence was delivered on the 10th of January, 1892, and on the 16th of January the plaintiff, without delivering any reply or joinder of issue, gave notice of trial, and the action was entered for trial accordingly.

The defendants then took out a summons at chambers to "strike out the notice of trial and the entry in pursuance thereof as irregular, on the ground that no reply had been delivered, nor had the pleadings been closed when the notice of trial was given." The master struck out the notice of trial on the ground stated, and the learned judge upheld the master's order.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ord. 27, r. 13, provides: "If the plaintiff does not deliver a reply, or any party does not deliver any subsequent pleading, within the period allowed for that purpose, the pleadings shall be deemed to be closed at the expiration of that period, and all the material statements of fact in the pleading last delivered shall be deemed to have been denied and put in issue."

Ord. 36, r. 11, provides: "Notice of trial may be given in any cause or matter by the plaintiff. . . . Such notice may be given with the reply (if any) whether it closes the pleadings or not, or at any time after the issues of fact are ready for trial"; and rule 15 provides: "Notice of trial shall be given before entering the trial, and the trial may be entered notwithstanding that the pleadings are not closed, provided that notice of trial has been given."

E. U. Bullen, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was entitled to give this notice of trial without delivering a reply, for ord. 36, r. 11, says that notice of trial may be given with the reply (if any) whether it closes the pleadings or not. That shows that a notice of trial may be given, although no reply has been delivered—which is this case—and although the pleadings are not closed. Rule 15 of the same order is explicit on the point, and clearly shows that notice of trial may be given before the pleadings are closed. The notice of trial here given was, therefore, properly given, and the order striking it out was wrong.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

T. T. Paine, for the defendants.—The order was properly made striking out this notice of trial. Ord. 36, r. 11, provides that notice of trial may be given with the reply (if any). Now, here, as no reply was delivered, that does not apply. Then the rule says, "or at any time after the issues of fact are ready for trial." Looking at ord. 27, r. 13, we see when the issues of fact are ready for trial. That is the rule applicable here, and under that rule the plaintiff, when he has delivered no reply, cannot give notice of trial until the pleadings are closed, and that, by the rule, is at the expiration of the period allowed for delivering a reply. The result is that any time after the defence has been delivered the plaintiff may deliver his reply, and with his reply, or at any time after, he may give notice of trial; but if he does not deliver any reply, then he cannot give any notice of trial until the expiration of the twenty-one days allowed for reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think on the whole the master and judge were right. Here there is a proper statement of claim, and a proper statement of defence, and then a notice of trial. It is said that this notice of trial is not authorized; if authorized it must be by the rules, and the rules here applicable are rule 11 of order 36, and rule 13 of order 27. The rule which Mr. Bullen, for the plaintiff, relies on is rule 11 of order 36, which says, "such notice" (that is, notice of trial) "may be given with the reply (if any)." In this case there is no reply, so that that part of the rule does not apply, and the rule proceeds, "or at any time after the issues of fact are ready for trial." Are the issues of fact ready for trial without a joinder of issue having been given? It does not seem to me that they are so, for looking at ord. 27, r. 13, the rule says, "If the plaintiff does not deliver a reply within the period allowed for that purpose"—which is this case—"the pleadings shall be deemed to be closed at the expiration of that period," that is, at the expiration of the twenty-one days, "and all the material statements of fact in the pleading last delivered shall be deemed to have been denied and put in issue." Therefore, unless the plaintiff takes the very simple course of joining issue, which he may do at once after defence, and then deliver his notice of trial, he is driven to rule 13 of order 27, and if he have recourse to that, then he must wait until the expiration of the time allowed for delivering his reply before he can give notice of trial. I think, therefore, that both the master and judge were right, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, W. H. Hudson.

Solicitor for the defendants, G. M. Folkard.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) } Jan. 16.

CARR v. FOWLE. (a.)

Tithes—Hop grounds or market gardens—Rent-charge in lieu of extraordinary charge—Liability to land tax—Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 54). ss. 3, 4, sub-section 5.

The annual rent-charge payable under the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, in lieu of the extraordinary charge previously levied under the Tithe Commutation Acts, is not liable to land tax.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Special case stated by order of the master in an action brought by the vicar of a parish against a collector of land tax to recover the sum of £17 10s. 4d.

The special case was as follows:—

1. The plaintiff is the vicar of the parish of Marden in Kent, and the defendant is the collector to the local commissioners for the land tax.

2. On the 5th of February, 1892, the defendant distrained upon certain goods in the vicarage of the plaintiff as a distress for non-payment of the land tax, and the plaintiff, to prevent the sale after seizure, paid £17 10s. 4d. under protest.

3. The said distress was levied in respect of land tax due, or alleged by the defendant to be due, in respect of the new rent-charge payable to the plaintiff, which was substituted by the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, for the former extraordinary charge.

4. The plaintiff admits that the distress was legal and proper in all respects if the new rent-charge is not exempt from the land tax.

5. In 1886 the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act was passed, by which the old extraordinary tithe was abolished, and in place of it was substituted the said new rent-charge.

6. The plaintiff contends that upon the proper construction of the Act the new rent-charge is exempt from the land tax, and the defendant maintains the negative.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the new rent-charge is exempted from or liable to assessment to the land tax, and if the court shall be of opinion that the new rent-charge is exempted, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for £17 10s. 4d., but if the court shall be of opinion that the new rent-charge is liable to assessment, then judgment shall be for the defendant.

Stevenson Moore (Meadows White, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—This rent-charge is not subject to land tax, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Previously to the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, land tax was levied in respect of extraordinary tithe. By that Act a rent-charge is substituted for the extraordinary tithe, and the amount of this rent-charge is based on the capital value of the extraordinary tithe. That capital value is obtained by taking the net annual value, after deducting rates, taxes (except income tax), and other outgoings (section 3). Land tax is a tax, and is therefore included in the deductions; income tax is the only exception mentioned, and the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius applies. By section 4, sub-section 5, the rent-charge is not to be subject to any parochial, county, or other rate, charge, or assessment. The word "other" covers land tax. The land tax having been deducted in arriving at the value of the rent-charge, it cannot have been intended that the rent-charge itself should be subject to the tax, for that would cause the tax to be paid twice over in respect of the same subject-matter.

Channell, Q.C., and T. Willes Chitty, for the defendant.—This rent-charge is by the original Land Tax Act, 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, subject to the land tax unless it is expressly exempted from payment by the statute which created it, and there is no such express exemption in the Act of 1886. There is in section 4, sub-section 5, an express exemption in the case of parochial and county rates. Waterloo Bridge Co. v. Cull, 7 W. R. 87, 1 E. & E. 213, shows that land tax is not a parochial or a county rate. It is a parliamentary rate, and does not come within the exemption in sec. 4, sub-section 5. Even if the land tax is to be deducted in estimating the annual value as provided by section 3, it does not necessarily follow that the rent-charge is not to be subject to the tax.

Colchester v. Kewney, 15 W. R. 930, L. R. 2 Ex. 253, and Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Fowler, 40 W. R. 306, [1892] 1 Q. B. 165, were also cited.

Stevenson Moore replied.

DAY, J.—I am of opinion that this rent-charge is, under the Act of 1886, exempt from payment of land tax, and that, therefore, the plaintiff in this action is entitled to judgment for the amount claimed. I base my opinion mainly on section 3 of the Act, which must be considered, in logical order, before section 4, sub-section 5, the section relied on for the defendant; for before deciding how a particular subject is to be dealt with you must first ascertain what that subject is. In this case we are dealing with a tithe rent-charge which has by the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, been substituted for the former extraordinary tithe. This tithe rent-charge is created by section 3, which provides for the calculation on which it is to be based.

The tithe rent-charge is based upon the capital value of the former extraordinary tithe, and in estimating the capital value the commissioners "shall take into consideration the net annual value of the same after allowing for the expenses of collection, rates, taxes (except income tax), and other outgoings." It is clear, therefore, that the method of obtaining the annual value is that, first of all, the expenses of collection are to be deducted, because in future the sum will be payable in a fixed manner, and there will be no expenses of collection; thus rates and taxes are to be deducted, but not the income tax, because the new rent-charge is to be subject to income tax. From the annual value thus obtained the capital value is arrived at, and on that the tithe rent-charge is based.

It is said that section 4, sub-section 5, is in favour of the defendant's contention; that section provides that the rent-charge shall not be subject to any parochial, county, or other rate, charge, or assessment. It is argued that the land tax is neither a parochial or county, but a parliamentary, rate, and that, therefore, the rent-charge is to be assessed to the land tax. I do not agree with that argument. I think the meaning of that sub-section is that the rent-charge is not to be assessed by parishes or counties, but that the right to do so is reserved to Parliament, and that it was not the intention of the Legislature to create a kind of property which Parliament should have no power to assess in the future if it should be thought desirable to do so. I do not think that the mere omission of the word "parliamentary" in that sub-section can make this rent-charge liable to the land tax, taking into consideration the precise words that are used in section 3. It would be a great injustice, and one which cannot have been intended by the Legislature, if, after first deducting the land tax in estimating the annual value of the extraordinary charge, the rent-charge was to be liable to be assessed to that tax. It would be making the owner of the rent-charge pay the tax twice over. It would require very clear words in the Act to attribute such injustice to the Legislature, but, for the reasons which I have given, it is not necessary to do so.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear, when you consider the state of things for which this rent-charge was substituted by the Act of 1886, and the machinery provided by that Act for its assessment, that the holder of the rent-charge is not liable to pay land tax in respect of it. The Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Act, 1886, removed the obligation which had previously existed in the case of certain persons of paying extraordinary tithe, and the Act gave to the vicar, in the place of the extraordinary tithe, the interest in a capital sum. Section 3 provides the machinery for obtaining that capital sum, and it is clear from that section that when the new rent-charge comes into existence the land tax has already been deducted. That being so, is there anything in the remainder of the statute to superimpose the liability which has been removed? Mr. Channell says that the words of section 4, sub-section 5, are large enough to do so, and relies on the case of Waterloo Bridge v. Cull in support of his contention. The words in that case, "parochial rates whatsoever," are, however, quite different from the words in this section, which give three categories of charges from which the rent-charge is to be free—viz., parochial, county, or other rates. Therefore, in my opinion, that case is no authority for the present. Section 4, sub-section 5, relieves the rent-charge from certain burdens, but it cannot be argued that other burdens are not relieved from, by reason of their not being mentioned in the section, unless it can first be shown that they have been imposed on the rent-charge. But, as I have shown in the first part of my judgment, it is not the case that this burden has been imposed on the rent-charge. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not liable to pay land tax in respect of this rent-charge, and is therefore entitled to judgment.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Peterson.

Solicitor for the defendant, Kingsford, Dorman, & Co., for Philpott & Callaway, Cranbrook.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Collins, JJ.) Feb. 7.

GEORGE, Appellant.
CARPENTER, Respondent. (a.)

Fishery district—Definition of limits—River—Tributary—Reservoir formed by embankment across tributary.

The River Severn Fishery District included that river and all its tributaries. Under the provisions of the Liverpool Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880, an embankment was constructed across the River Vyrnwy, a tributary of the River Severn, and a reservoir was formed for the purpose of supplying water to the town of Liverpool. The Act provided for a daily and monthly supply of "compensation" water from the reservoir into the part of the River Vyrnwy below the embankment.

Held, that so much of the River Vyrnwy as was above the embankment had ceased to be a tributary of the River Severn, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the conservators of the Severn Fishery District.

Harbottle v. Terry, 31 W. R. 289, 10 Q. B. D. 131, followed.

Special case stated by two justices for the county of Montgomery.

At a petty sessions held at Llanfyllin on the 30th of September, 1892, an information was preferred by the appellant, the water bailiff of the Severn Fishery Board, against the respondent under section 35 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1865, as amended by section 7 of the Freshwater Fishery Act, 1878, charging him with having on the 30th of July, 1892, unlawfully fished with a rod and line for trout without a proper licence at the parish of Llanwddyn, a place within the Severn Fishery District. The justices dismissed the information, and stated this case for the opinion of the court.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a certificate of a Secretary of State given in 1866 the limits of the fishery district of the River Severn were, in part, defined to include so much of the River Severn and of the Rivers Vyrnwy and Teme, and of all other tributaries of the River Severn as was situate within the county of Montgomery. By a certificate given in 1867 the district was further defined as including so much of the tributaries of the Rivers Vyrnwy and Teme as was within the county of Montgomery, and by a further certificate given in 1882 was further defined as including so much of the River Severn and of all its tributaries as was within the county of Montgomery.

After the 7th of April, 1879, on which day the requirements of the Freshwater Fishery Act, 1878, were complied with by the Board of Conservators of the Severn Fishery District, it became illegal for any person to fish with rod and line for trout or char within the Severn Fishery District without having first obtained a licence from the conservators.

By the Liverpool Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880, the Corporation of Liverpool were authorized to construct a reservoir (to be called the Vyrnwy Reservoir) to be formed by means of an embankment across the valley of the River Vyrnwy in the parish of Llanwddyn, and the reservoir was constructed accordingly. By section 36 of the Act the Corporation were empowered to take, collect, divert, impound, and use all the waters of the River Vyrnwy at or above the point at which the embankment of the Vyrnwy Reservoir crossed the river, and of all the tributaries, streams, and springs of the river above that point. Section 37 provided that as full compensation to the Severn Commissioners and to all other persons and bodies corporate for taking, diverting, impounding and appropriating all the waters of the River Vyrnwy and its tributaries as were authorized by this Act to be taken, the corporation should, before taking any part of the said waters for their own purposes, cause to flow and be discharged daily from the Vyrnwy Reservoir into the Vyrnwy River a certain equal and continuous supply of water, called the daily compensation water, and also in addition a further supply of water called the monthly compensation water. Section 49 provided that, except only as was by the Act provided, nothing therein contained should take away, lessen, prejudice, or alter any of the rights, powers, authorities, or privileges of the Board of Conservators of the Severn Fisheries, and, except as aforesaid, all powers, rights, privileges, and authorities might be exercised and enjoyed by the conservators in as full and ample a manner as if the Act had not been passed.

It was proved that on the day in question the respondent fished in the Vyrnwy Reservoir for trout with rod and line, and that the respondent had no licence from the Board of Conservators of the Severn fishery district.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether the Vyrnwy Reservoir was a tributary of the River Severn within the meaning of the certificates defining the limits of the Severn Fishery District? (2) whether the right to issue licences to fish for trout in the reservoir had been extinguished by the Liverpool Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880, and an agreement of the 24th of June, 1880? (This agreement was made by the Corporation of Liverpool and the Conservators of the Severn Fishery District, and provided for the withdrawal of the latter's opposition to the corporation's Bill. As the court were of opinion that it did not affect the question in this case it is unnecessary to refer to it more fully.)

Willis Bund, for the appellant.—It is admitted that previously to the construction of the embankment the site of the reservoir was within the Severn Fishery District. The making of the embankment across the Vyrnwy has not made it any the less a tributary of the Severn; the embankment does not prevent the Vyrnwy from continuing to flow into the Severn, it only diminishes the quantity of water so flowing. The Liverpool Waterworks Act provides that the corporation must permit a constant and regular supply of water from the reservoir into the Vyrnwy, and that distinguishes this case from Harbottle v. Terry, 31 W. R. 289, 10 Q. B. D. 131, where there was no such provision, and consequently the overflow there was intermittent, and might have been stopped altogether.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor, for the respondent.—The effect of the embankment is that the part of the Vyrnwy above it has ceased to exist as a river or a tributary of the Severn, and in its place there is an enormous reservoir capable of containing twelve thousand millions gallons. The reasoning of the court in Harbottle v. Terry is entirely opposed to the argument that the reservoir can be a tributary of the Severn, and if it is not a tributary the fishery board have no rights over it.

Willis Bund replied.

LAWRANCE, J.—In this case two questions are asked of us: first, whether the portion of the River Vyrnwy which is above the embankment is a tributary of the River Severn? and, secondly, whether the right of the fishery board to issue licences to persons to fish in that portion of the River Vyrnwy has been extinguished? I am of opinion that the first question should be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative. There is no doubt that before the embankment was made the River Vyrnwy was a tributary of the Severn, and I think that so much of it as is below the embankment is still a tributary. But the question is whether the water, which is impounded by means of the embankment and which the Corporation of Liverpool are empowered by their Act to send to Liverpool instead of into the Severn, is a tributary of the Severn. It is argued that it is because there is a provision in the Act that a certain amount of compensation water is to be allowed to flow over the embankment. But the case of Harbottle v. Terry shows that the overflow water of a reservoir, although it flows down what was a tributary of a river, does not necessarily become a tributary itself. There is nothing in the Liverpool Waterworks Act inconsistent with our decision. In my opinion, the fishing in the reservoir above the embankment is as distinct from the fishing in the river below as if it was in a different river altogether.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that if that portion of the River Vyrnwy which forms this reservoir is not a tributary of the River Severn it is not within the jurisdiction of the fishery board. The first question, therefore, to be considered is whether or not it is such a tributary. I admit that my mind somewhat fluctuated during the argument, and I doubt whether I should have come to the conclusion at which I have arrived were it not for the decision in Harbottle v. Terry. I think, however, that that case covers this one; and although there are some points of difference between the two cases, yet the principle of the decision is, I think, distinct from the points of difference. In Harbottle v. Terry the court thought that a reservoir used for commercial purposes could not be regarded as a tributary. A tributary, it was said, implied a stream, and a reservoir is not a stream. It is true that in that case there was no provision, as there is here, for a flow of compensation water from the reservoir; but, as a matter of fact, when the reservoir was not being used, it did send a quota of overflow. All the arguments used in that case apply equally here, and I am clearly of opinion that this case comes within the principle there laid down. On that ground I concur in the opinion of my learned brother, that the portion of this river above the embankment is not a tributary of the River Severn, and is, therefore, not within the jurisdiction of the Severn Fishery Board.

As to the second question, I agree that it becomes unnecessary for us to answer it; otherwise, I should answer it in the affirmative.

Judgment for the respondent.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stallard & Turner, for John Stallard & Son, Worcester.

Solicitor for the respondent, Venn, for Atkinson, Town Clerk, Liverpool.

C. C. R.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.) Feb. 4.

REG. v. INSTAN. (a.)

Criminal law — Manslaughter — Death accelerated by neglect—Implied duty.

A prisoner, a woman between thirty and forty years of age, was indicted for manslaughter. It was proved that she had lived with the deceased, who was her aunt, and was seventy-three years of age, and at her expense, for a considerable time; that for some days before her death the deceased was incapable through illness of moving about or attending to her wants or procuring assistance; that the prisoner continued to live in the house of the deceased, and to receive and use articles of food which were brought to the house by tradespeople; that she failed to supply the wants of the deceased, either as to food or the obtaining of medical or nursing attendance, or to make known the condition of the deceased to her neighbours; and that the death of the deceased was substantially accelerated by neglect, want of food and of nursing and medical attendance. The prisoner was convicted.

Held, that, under the above circumstances, there was a duty implied by law on the part of the prisoner to attend to the wants of the deceased, and that, the prisoner's failure to perform that duty having assisted to cause the death of the deceased, the conviction was right.

Case stated by Day, J., as follows:—

Kate Instan was tried before me at the last assizes held in and for the county of Worcester upon a charge of feloniously killing one Ann Hunt.

The prisoner, who is between thirty and forty years of age and unmarried, had no occupation and no means of her own of living. She was a niece of the deceased.

At the time of the commission of the alleged offence, and for some time previous thereto, she had been living with and had been maintained by the deceased. The deceased was a woman of some seventy-three years of age, and until a few weeks before her death was healthy and able to take care of herself. She was possessed of a small life income, and had in the house in which she lived some little furniture and a few other things of trifling value.

The two women lived together in a house taken by the deceased; no one lived with them or in any way attended to them.

The deceased shortly before her death suffered from gangrene in the leg, which rendered her during the last ten days of her life quite unable to attend to herself, or to move about, or to do anything to procure assistance.

No one but the prisoner had, previously to the death, any knowledge of the condition in which her aunt thus was. The prisoner continued to live in the house at the cost of the deceased and took in the food supplied by the tradespeople; but does not appear to have given any to the deceased, and she certainly did not give or procure any medical or nursing attendance to or for her, or give notice to any neighbour of her condition or wants, although she had abundant opportunity and occasion to do so.

The body of the deceased was, on the 2nd of August, while the prisoner was still living in the house, found much decomposed, partially dressed in her day clothes, and lying partly on the ground and partly prone upon the bed. The death probably occurred from four to seven days before the 3rd of August, the date of the post mortem examination of the body. The cause of death was exhaustion caused by the gangrene, but substantially accelerated by neglect, want of food, of nursing, and of medical attendance during several days previous to the death.

All these wants could and would have been supplied if any notice of the condition of the deceased had been given by the prisoner to any of the neighbours, of whom there were several living in adjoining houses, or to the relations of the deceased, who lived within a few miles.

It was proved that the prisoner, while the deceased must have been just about dying, had conversations with neighbours about the deceased, but did not avail herself of the opportunities thus afforded of disclosing the condition in which she then was.

At the close of the case it was objected on behalf of the prisoner that there was no evidence of any legal duty such as would bind the prisoner to give or to procure any food or nursing or attendance to or for the deceased, or to give notice to anyone that such was required.

I thought it better not to stop the case, but to leave it to the jury to say whether, having regard to the circumstances under which the prisoner lived with the deceased and continued to occupy the house and to take the food provided at the expense of the deceased while the deceased was, as she knew, unable to communicate with any other person, and thus to procure necessaries for herself, the prisoner did or did not impliedly undertake with the deceased either to wait upon and attend to her herself, or to communicate to persons outside the house the knowledge of her helpless condition; and I told them that if they came to the conclusion that she did so undertake, and that the death of the deceased was substantially accelerated by her failing to carry out such undertaking, they might find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, but that otherwise they should acquit her.

The jury found the prisoner guilty.

I reserved a case for the opinion of the court.

If the facts above stated do not afford evidence of the existence of any such undertaking or duty, then the conviction is to be quashed; if otherwise, it is to stand.

Vachell (at the request of the judge who presided at the trial), for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong. There was no duty to care for the deceased binding upon the prisoner; such a duty will be presumed in a case where an infant is dependent upon an adult person, but not where both persons are of full age: R. v. Friend, R. & R. 20; R. v. Shepherd, L. & C. 147. There was no evidence to go to the jury of any undertaking, express or implied, on the part of the prisoner to attend to the wants of the deceased, and the existence of such an undertaking is necessary to sustain the conviction: R. v. Marriott, 8 C. & P. 425.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We are all of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed. It would not be correct to say that every moral duty is also a legal duty, but it is correct to say that every legal duty is founded upon a moral duty. Now, in this case it is beyond question that it was the clear moral duty of this woman to impart to the deceased so much of the food which she took in from the tradespeople, and which was paid for out of the money of the deceased, as was necessary to sustain her life. The deceased could only get food through the instrumentality of the prisoner; it was the prisoner's duty to supply it, and that duty she did not discharge. There is no doubt that her failure to discharge that duty accelerated the death of the deceased. I think that that duty was a legal as well as a moral duty. There appears to be no case directly in point, but I think that this case is within the principle of the cases as to legal duty, and it would be a slur upon the English law if it were not so. Here, then, was a legal duty left unperformed, the non-performance of which assisted in causing the death of the deceased. I believe I am stating the opinion of my brethren as well as my own when I say that that is sufficient to establish that this conviction was right, and ought to be affirmed.

HAWKINS, CAVE, DAY, and COLLINS, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Kay, L.JJ.) — March 21.

LOCK v. PEARCE. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Notice to remedy breach—Compensation—Application for relief—Originating summons—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14, sub-sections 1, 2.

An application by a lessee, under section 14, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for relief against forfeiture by reason of a breach of covenant cannot be made by originating summons. It must be made either in the lessor's action to enforce the forfeiture, or in an action brought by the lessee.

A notice by the lessor under section 14, sub-section 1, specifying the breach complained of, and requiring the lessee to remedy it, is not invalid because it does not contain a claim for compensation in money for the breach.

Decision of North, J. (40 W. R. 508, [1892] 2 Ch. 328), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J., reported 40 W. R. 508, [1892] 2 Ch. 328.

The plaintiffs were respectively the lessee and mortgagee by sub-demise of certain houses at Tottenham which were let to weekly tenants. The defendant was the assignee of the original lessor. The leases contained the usual covenants to repair.

On June 2, 1891, the defendant served notices on the plaintiffs, under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, stating that the houses were out of repair, and requiring the plaintiffs within three months to remedy the breach of covenant by doing the repairs set forth in the schedule, and requiring them to pay him the sum of £2 2s. for the expenses incurred by him for surveyor's fees and solitor's charges by reason of the breach of covenant; and giving further notice that if they made default in remedying the breach or in making the compensation thereby required the defendant would enter and take possession.

After the expiration of the three months the defendant commenced actions in the county court against the weekly tenants for recovery of possession of the houses, and on November 21, 1891, he obtained judgments for possession. The plaintiffs were not parties to these actions. On November 25 the plaintiffs took out an originating summons asking (1) for a declaration that no forfeiture had been incurred by reason of any breach of covenant to repair; (2) in the alternative, for relief against the defendant's right of re-entry and forfeiture; and (3) for an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding on his judgments in the county court to take possession. On December 9 the defendant obtained possession of the houses under his judgments.

North, J., dismissed the summons. The plaintiffs appealed.

Pitt-Lewis, Q.C., and Oswald, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, for the defendant.

The arguments and authorities were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed, and every point which has been raised must be decided against the appellants. The first question is whether North, J., had any jurisdiction to entertain this originating summons at all. The summons was taken out under section 14, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which provides that "where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce such right of re-entry or forfeiture the lessee may, in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief." The application for relief must be made before the lessor has re-entered. Now the action of ejectment in this case was brought in the county court. The plaintiffs could not have applied in that action for relief, as the county court has no jurisdiction to grant relief. The plaintiffs, therefore, could not have applied for relief in the lessor's action. It was left for them to apply for relief in an action brought by themselves. They did not do so, but applied by way of originating summons. Such a summons for the purposes of this section is not an action. It cannot be said to be a summons taken out "in an action brought by" the lessee. The learned judge, therefore, had no jurisdiction to entertain this summons at all. We have spoken to the learned judge upon the point, and his opinion was in favour of this view, though he did not decide the point. We are, therefore, agreeing with him rather than differing from him upon the point.

But supposing that there is jurisdiction to entertain this summons, there comes this difficulty: relief can only be asked when the lessor is proceeding to enforce the forfeiture. The plaintiffs by applying for relief admit the forfeiture. There is no jurisdiction now to inquire whether the judgment in the county court was right or not. That judgment, as it has not been appealed against, has settled the question of forfeiture, and it must now be taken that there was a forfeiture.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But supposing, again, that we can inquire whether the judgment of the county court is right, the question then arises whether the notice of the 2nd of June, 1891, is an invalid notice, and therefore whether the right of re-entry was enforceable. It is contended that the notice is bad because it does not require the plaintiffs to make compensation in money for the breach according to section 14, sub-section 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it being said that the demand of £2 2s. for surveyor's fees and solicitor's charges was not a demand for "compensation," as, according to Skinners' Co. v. Knight, 40 W. R. 57, [1891] 2 Q. B. 542, those charges do not come within the meaning of that word in the section. Now in the present case the lessor served notices complaining of a breach of covenant to repair. If the breach of covenant is one which is capable of remedy the lessor must require the breach to be remedied, and cannot pass that by and demand money compensation for the breach. In such a case the lessor is bound in his notice to require the lessee to remedy the breach. Here the lessor did so, the breach being one which was capable of being remedied by the lessee. Where the breach is capable of remedy, as in the case of a covenant to repair, the "compensation" cannot be in respect of the repairs themselves, but must be for something else, and this is shown by the latter part of the sub-section. The true meaning of the sub-section is that besides remedying the breach there is to be compensation payable where there is anything to compensate, but if the lessor does not want any compensation he need not ask for it in his notice, and in that case he cannot obtain it either in the action to recover possession or in any other action. If the decision of Bacon, V.C., in North London Land Co. v. Jacques, 32 W. R. 283, is inconsistent with this reading of the section, I must say I do not agree with it. In the case of Greenfield v. Hanson, 2 Times L. R. 876, Bowen, L.J., felt himself bound by the construction placed upon the section by Bacon, V.C., but I think I can see from his language that if he were free to do so he would not have followed it. Therefore, in my opinion this notice was a good one, and the judgment in the county court was right. [His lordship then stated that, with regard to granting relief upon the merits, assuming the point was open, they were unable to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The summons asks first for a declaration that no forfeiture has been incurred; secondly, in the alternative for relief against the forfeiture; and, thirdly, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from taking possession. No one ever heard of such an application as that being made by originating summons. It was utterly misconceived and inappropriate. But taking the summons as merely asking for relief against the forfeiture, the question is whether an originating summons is the proper procedure. The question depends upon section 14, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. By section 2 (xviii.), "the court" means the High Court of Justice, and by section 69 (i.) all matters within the jurisdiction of the court are assigned to the Chancery Division. Therefore the county court has no jurisdiction to give relief. To my mind the words, "action brought by" the lessee, in sub-section 2 of section 14 do not include an originating summons. The true meaning of the words is that there must be an action in the Chancery Division, and a summons must be taken out in that action. Therefore this originating summons is wholly misconceived, and the court has no jurisdiction upon such a summons to entertain the question.

Assuming, however, that the court has jurisdiction to entertain this application, the next question arises with regard to the notice. Is the notice to be held bad because the lessor does not demand compensation? There would be no sense in so holding. The lessor must tell the tenant what the breach is and what he wants done, and what compensation he wants. But if the lessor does not want any compensation—in the case, say, of a fire insurance not kept up where no damage has accrued—what sense is there in asking for compensation which he does not want? The section seems to me to have been correctly construed in Skinners' Co. v. Knight. Here the defendant told the plaintiffs what he wanted—namely, the repairs made good and £2 2s. compensation. True, he adds that the £2 2s. is for a surveyor's fee and solicitor's charges, but, in fact, he told them what compensation he wanted.

KAY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, T. Noton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Pearce & Son.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley & Bowen, L.JJ.) Feb. 24.

Ex parte ASHMEAD.
In re NANCE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy petition—Judgment creditor—Cost book mining company—Action by secretary for and on behalf of shareholders—Stannaries Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 19), ss. 2, 13.

Section 13 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, which empowers cost book mining companies to sue, in the name of their purser or secretary, shareholders for the amount of unpaid calls, does not empower the company to institute bankruptcy proceedings, in the name of the secretary, in respect of a judgment recovered in such an action.

Appeal from an order of the registrar in bankruptcy refusing to make a receiving order.

Ashmead, the appellant, was secretary of the Great Fortune and West Carzine Mines, a cost book mining company within the Stannaries. The appellant, suing as secretary for and on behalf of the shareholders of the company, brought an action against the judgment debtor in the Mayor's Court in respect of unpaid calls on shares, due from him to the company. Judgment was recovered for £135. This judgment not having been satisfied, the appellant presented a bankruptcy petition against the judgment debtor, which stated that the judgment debtor was justly and truly indebted to him as secretary for and on behalf of all the shareholders of the company, in the sum of £135. The registrar refused to make a receiving order on the petition, on the ground that the petitioning creditor, the appellant, was a bare trustee, and that the petition ought to be amended by joining the cestui que trust.

Section 13 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, provides that "the amount for the time being unpaid of any call made after the passing of this Act on any share in a company shall be deemed to be a debt due from the holder of such share to the company, and if at the time appointed by the company for the payment of any such call any shareholder shall fail to pay the amount thereof, it shall be lawful for the company to sue such shareholder for the amount of such call, in any court of law having competent jurisdiction, in the name of the purser for the time being of the company, whether such purser is a shareholder in the company or not, as the nominal plaintiff for the company, and to recover the amount of such call, together with interest for the same and costs of suit."

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 2 provides that if there is no purser the term "purser" shall mean the secretary for the time being.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., for the appellant, referred to Guthrie v. Fisk, 3 B. & C. 178, and Hope v. Meek, 10 Ex. 829, 4 W. R. Dig. 141.

F. C. Willis, for the debtor, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the alleged debtor was a shareholder in a mining company in the Stannaries, and the company made a call on his shares which he did not pay. At common law the company could not have sued him, because all the shareholders in such companies are partners, and one partner cannot sue another. In order to obviate that difficulty the Stannaries Act, 1869, was passed, section 13 of which Act gave the company power to sue a shareholder who had neglected to pay calls. [His lordship read section 13 and proceeded:] The section makes an unpaid call a debt due to the company, not to the secretary, and the right to sue for that debt is given to the company. The secretary has no right to sue, but the company is to sue in the name of the purser, or secretary if there is no purser, as nominal plaintiff. Then, the action having been brought by the company in the name of the purser, it is the company which recovers the amount due. The company is the judgment creditor, and is, therefore, the proper party to present a petition in bankruptcy.

In this case the secretary has presented the petition, and in it he describes himself as having recovered judgment for and on behalf of the shareholders in the company. That is not the case, the company has recovered judgment in his name. The secretary cannot draw the petition in such a way as to make himself a petitioning creditor, nor can he make the necessary affidavit, for there is no debt due to him, and he has not recovered judgment against the debtor.

A similar point was decided in Guthrie v. Fisk where it was held that where a company was empowered by its private Act to sue in the name of its secretary as nominal plaintiff, that did not give power to the company to institute bankruptcy proceedings in his name.

I think that the registrar was right in holding that the petition must be dismissed unless it was amended. The company elected not to amend, but to appeal against the registrar's decision, and their appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on section 13 of the Stannaries Act, 1869. The object of that Act was to cure the great defects that formerly existed in the manner of recovering calls by cost book mining companies, which are unincorporated companies. Section 13 does not say that these companies are to sue in their own names, but gives them power to sue in the name of their purser or secretary. The Act does not, however, empower these companies to make use of their purser's name in bankruptcy proceedings. This is not a new point, for the case of Guthrie v. Fisk shows that when a company is authorized by statute to sue by means of its public officer, the company cannot institute bankruptcy proceedings by its officer. In some cases Parliament has subsequently given companies power to do so, but that is not so in this case.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stacpoole, Batters, & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent, Rumney.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Feb. 9.

JOHNSON v. DIPROSE. (a.)

Bill of sale—Default in payment—Seizure of goods—Conditional tender of amount due—Removal of goods—Trespass—Redemption—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7.

The grantor of a bill of sale in the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, having made default in payment of a sum of money thereby secured, the grantee seized the goods comprised in the bill of sale. More than five days afterwards, the goods not having been yet removed from the grantor's premises, the grantor tendered payment of the amount due under the bill of sale, subject to a condition as to the giving of a receipt. The grantee declined to comply with the condition, and removed the goods.

Held, that the grantor could not maintain an action of trespass against the grantee for the removal of the goods, but might redeem them on payment of principal, interest, the expenses incurred by the grantee in the seizure, and the costs of the claim for redemption.

Appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of an action with a jury.

The plaintiff, by a bill of sale drawn in the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, assigned to the defendant certain furniture in her dwelling-house to secure the repayment by instalments of a sum of money advanced to her by the defendant. The plaintiff having made default in payment of two of the instalments, the defendant, on the 15th of March, 1892, entered the plaintiff's dwelling-house and seized the furniture comprised in the bill of sale, and left a man in possession. On the 26th of March, when the goods were on the point of being removed, the plaintiff tendered to the auctioneer, by whom the removal was being carried out, the sum of £51 5s., being the amount due for principal, interest to that date, and expenses, and also an additional sum of £2 15s., which was claimed as the auctioneer's levy fee; she, however, accompanied this tender with a demand for a separate receipt in respect of the £2 15s., refusing to pay either sum unless such receipt were given. The auctioneer refused to give a separate receipt, and the goods were removed. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, in which she claimed (1) damages for trespass in wrongfully removing the goods, and (2) redemption of the goods upon payment of principal and interest due in respect of the money advanced. The plaintiff brought into court the sum of £51 5s., and the defendant brought into court the sum of £5 in respect of the actual damage caused to the goods in removing them.

At the trial Wright, J., left the question on the claim for trespass to the jury, who gave the plaintiff £55 damages, viz., £50 for removing the goods, and

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£5 beyond the sum of £5 paid into court in respect of actual damage to the goods. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for that amount, and further decreed that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem the goods on payment of £2 15s. beyond the sum of £51 5s. paid into court; and he allowed the plaintiff the costs of the action.

The defendant appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Cababé, for the defendant.—The plaintiff is not in a position to sue in trespass. The moment she made default in complying with the terms of the bill of sale her right to the possession of the goods determined; for, by virtue of section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the defendant became entitled to seize and take possession of them. No subsequent tender on the part of the plaintiff could restore her right to possession. The proviso to section 7 enacts that if the grantor takes certain steps within five days of the seizure of the goods, the grantee may be restrained from removing or selling the goods. But here the plaintiff did not comply with the terms of that proviso. The tender which she alleges was made after the expiration of the five days; and, further, it was a bad tender, inasmuch as it was conditional.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Pocock, for the plaintiff.—Where personal chattels are assigned by way of security for a debt, the presumption is that the property and the right to possession remain in the assignor. The right of the assignor to sue the assignee in trespass for wrongfully removing the chattels is recognized in Brierly v. Kendall, 17 Q. B. 937, and Toms v. Wilson, 11 W. R. 117, 4 B. & S. 442. The Bills of Sale Act contemplates the goods comprised in a bill of sale as being the grantor's goods, not the grantee's. The position of the grantor of a bill of sale is nearer that of a pledgor than a mortgagor. In the case of a pledge the general property remains in the pledgor, only a special property passes to the pledgee. In the same way in the case of a bill of sale the general property remains with the grantor. There is a strong presumption against the property passing to the grantee, as in the case of a mortgage of land. [BOWEN, L.J.—But is not Maughan v. Sharpe, 12 W. R. 1057, 17 C. B. N. S. 443, against that contention? There Williams, J., said:—"It is said that there cannot be a mortgage of a chattel, and therefore that this instrument must operate as a pledge. But why so? There is nothing illegal in making a grant in this form. The books recognize the distinction between a mortgage and a pledge of personal chattels, and there is an express authority in the case of Flory v. Denny, 7 Exch. 581, that there may be a mortgage of chattels, as distinguished from a pledge, without delivery, so that there would seem to be nothing contrary to law in what is ordinarily called a mortgage of personal chattels. The property is absolutely and indefeasibly vested in the grantee if the condition be not performed, and a court of law can look at no other owner than the mortgagee or grantee."] The policy of the Bills of Sale Act is to limit the rights of the grantee over the goods; the grantor may redeem the goods at any time before they are actually removed and sold. If, after the grantor has tendered payment of the amount due, the grantee removes the goods, the grantor may maintain trespass against him. At any rate, the plaintiff can maintain an action on the case. She had a right to redeem these goods, and, therefore, she had a right, if she tendered the amount due, to prevent their removal. And if after her tender the defendant removed them, she must have some right of action at common law for their removal. Courts of law take notice of an equity of redemption. [They cited Jenkins v. Jones, 8 W. R. 270, 2 Giff. 99.]

Cababé, in reply, cited Yungmann v. Briesmann, ante, p. 148.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the defendant in respect of an alleged interference with her goods, and she has brought the action in two forms: the first form is that of a common law action for trespass, the other is that of an action in equity for redemption. The learned judge at the trial gave judgment for the plaintiff on the common law claim for the amount of damages which was assessed by the jury, and which was partly in respect of injury to the goods and partly in respect of the consequences to the plaintiff of the wrongful seizure. On the claim for redemption the learned judge also gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant has appealed, on the ground that an action of trespass will not lie, because the plaintiff had given him a valid bill of sale of the goods in the form enacted by the Bills of Sale Act, and the plaintiff had made default in complying with the terms of the bill of sale and the Act, which default gave the defendant a right to seize the goods, and at common law to keep them and do what he liked with them. This gives rise to the question, What is the right view to be taken as to the construction of a bill of sale drawn in the form prescribed by the Act? Such a bill of sale might have been made before the Act, for bills of sale were then made in many forms. But the Act, for the protection of borrowers, says that if a bill of sale is given by way of security for an advance, it may no longer be drawn in any of the old forms, but must be in this form. What, then, is the effect of a bill of sale in this form? A bill of sale is a document under seal given in respect of chattels, where it is desired that the property in them should pass, but where possession is not to be given. The object of the deed is to enable the property in the goods to pass, although the possession does not pass. That is the meaning of a bill of sale. It is not a pledge, for the property is to pass.

Now a bill of sale might be drawn so as to make the property pass subject to conditions as to the right of possession, formerly subject to any conditions, but now subject only to the prescribed conditions. A bill of sale in the form given in the Act states that, in consideration of a sum of money paid to the grantor by the grantee, the grantor doth "assign" unto the grantee the chattels described in the schedule by way of security for the repayment of the said sum. To assign a chattel is to pass the property in it. Therefore we see that by the very terms of the document the property passes. And if that were the whole of the document, the right to possession would also pass; the property would carry the right to possession with it. But the stipulations contained in section 7 of the Act are incorporated in the bill of sale. That section says that "personal chattels assigned under a bill of sale shall not be liable to be seized or taken possession of by the grantee for any other than the following causes:—(1) If the grantor shall make default in payment of the sum or sums of money thereby secured at the time therein provided for payment." That derogates from the absolute right of the grantee, not from his right to the property, for that, as I have said, passes, but from his right to take possession. Although he has the property, he is not to take possession except for certain causes. If the grantor makes default in payment of any of the instalments secured by the bill of sale, then the grantee has the right to take possession of the goods. The section then goes on to provide that the grantor may within five days from the seizure of the goods apply to the High Court, and the court, if satisfied that by payment or otherwise the cause of seizure no longer exists, may restrain the grantee from removing or selling the goods. This is a summary remedy given to the grantor in the place of the old chancery remedy —viz., a suit for redemption. And the courts have held that, if the grantor does not apply under this proviso within the five days, he loses his summary remedy, though he does not lose his equitable remedy: he may still bring his suit for redemption.

The result is that, if the grantor pays the money at the right time in accordance with the terms of the bill of sale, the grantee cannot seize the goods; if he does, he is liable to an action of trespass. And if at the right time the grantor goes with the money ready, and properly tenders all that he is bound to pay, such tender is, for the purpose of fixing the rights of the parties, equivalent to payment; and if the grantee rejects such tender and seizes the goods, he is liable to an action of trespass. But if the grantor has neither paid the money at the right time, nor tendered payment and been refused, section 7 says that the grantee may seize and take possession of the goods. If he does so, the grantor cannot maintain an action of trespass against him, for he has the property in the goods and also the right to the possession: the goods are in contemplation of law his goods. An action of trespass lies for a wrongful interference with the plaintiff's possession or with his right to immediate possession. Here the plaintiff has neither possession nor the right to immediate possession; for she neither paid the money at the right time, nor did she make a proper tender, and therefore the defendant became entitled to possession. The plaintiff says she tendered the money afterwards. But that is not sufficient; it was too late; and besides that it was not an unconditional tender. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot maintain an action for trespass, and the judgment on the common law claim is, in my opinion, wrong, and, so far as that is concerned, the appeal must succeed.

Then we come to the equitable claim, as to which the Queen's Bench Division is now, of course, bound to administer equitable remedies. The rule in equity has always been that a mortgagor can maintain a redemption suit on terms of paying principal and interest, and the mortgagee's costs and expenses, and the costs of the redemption suit. Unless there has been extortion on the part of the mortgagee, the plaintiff can only obtain redemption on those terms. The learned judge did not impose on the plaintiff the term that she should pay the costs of the redemption suit. In that respect we think the judgment should be varied. As to the injury to the goods, we think that the damages which the jury gave in respect of the injury caused by the defendant's negligence might have been recovered in a suit for redemption. The plaintiff is therefore entitled in the redemption to be allowed the amount of those damages—viz., £10. As the appeal has substantially succeeded, the plaintiff must pay the costs of the appeal, and also the costs of the action.

BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., concurred.

Judgment varied.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, John Westcott.

Solicitor for the defendant, O. C. Kent.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } North, J. } Feb. 18.

In re EASTERN AND AUSTRALIAN STEAMSHIP CO. (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Payment of shares by appropriation of reserve fund—Companies Act, 1867, ss. 9, 11, 13, 14, 25—Companies Act, 1877, ss. 3, 4.

A company set aside a reserve fund, and expended the greater part thereof in improving their property. On a further issue of shares the existing shareholders were credited with a number of shares as fully paid up equal in value to the amount of the reserve fund, which was carried to the capital account in the books of the company. On petition by the company for reduction of capital,

Held, that, as the proposed reduction of the capital of the company did or might involve the diminution of liability in respect of unpaid capital, the petition must stand over until creditors had been advertised for.

Petition.

This company was registered on the 10th of August, 1880, with a nominal capital of £200,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £10 each. The articles of the company gave it power to reduce capital. Article 78 provided that the directors should, out of the net earnings of the vessels of the company, after payment of current expenses, &c., set apart in each year such sums as the company in general meeting might direct, and, unless and until otherwise determined, such sums as they might deem expedient, to be accumulated as a reserve fund, to be invested as therein mentioned, and that subject thereto dividends might be declared with the sanction of an ordinary general meeting. Article 79 gave the directors a discretionary power to apply in the purchase of additional vessels, or otherwise in extending the company's trade, all or any part of the reserve fund for the time being. Article 80 provided that no dividends should be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company, and that no dividends should carry interest against the company, and article 81 gave power to the company to deduct from dividends anything payable by a person who otherwise would be entitled to a dividend.

In 1883 5,000 shares only had been issued, which were all fully paid up, and at that time the directors had set apart a reserve fund amounting to £50,000. This had, however, been nearly all applied in improving the company's fleet of steamers.

On the 1st of May, 1883, the directors sent round a circular in which it was proposed to issue the remaining 15,000 shares, firstly, by dividing the reserve fund as it stood at £50,000 amongst the existing shareholders, allotting to each one share of £10 fully paid up for every share held, which would absorb 5,000 shares; and, secondly, by the issue of the remaining 10,000 shares at £10 each. This scheme was ratified by the company in two general meetings, and in pursuance thereof the reserve fund was carried over to the capital account in the books of the company, and in respect thereof 5,000 shares were allotted to the existing shareholders pro rata credited as fully paid up. No shareholder declined to take these shares, 4,895 shares were also issued and allotted for cash at £10 each.

In 1892, owing to depreciation in the value of shipping property, the company had lost some £75,000, and in October and November a special resolution was passed by the company for the reduction of its capital from £200,000 divided into 20,000 shares of £10 each to £100,000 divided into 20,000 shares of £5 each, by cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets to the extent of £5 per share upon each of 14,895 issued shares, and by reducing the nominal amount of all the shares to £5 each.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a petition by the company for the confirmation by the court of the above resolution, and it stated that the proposed reduction did not involve the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and T. K. Young, for the company.—The 5,000 shares have been fully paid for in cash by the appropriation of the reserve fund, which must be deemed to be a payment to the shareholders by way of dividend, and a repayment by them for their new shares.

They cited Bouch v. Sproule, 36 W. R. 193, 12 App. Cas. 385; In re Bridgwater Navigation Co., [1891] 2 Ch. 317, 39 W. R. Dig. 56.

NORTH, J.—I have no doubt that what has been done here was done with perfect fairness and perfect good faith, and that there is nothing whatever which can be said against the directors, except that it may be said they did not observe what the law requires, and that they have not accomplished the result of making these newly-issued shares, shares that are fully paid up. In the present case the articles provide:—[His lordship read the articles above set out, and continued:—] Under that article 79, as it stands, the directors are bound in each year to set apart such sums as the company tell them to set aside, or in the absence of such directions such sums as they in their discretion think fit to be accumulated as a reserve fund. Now it may be that if such a state of things had happened here as happened in the Bridgwater case, and everything else had been cleared off, and there was a surplus fund to be distributed among preference and ordinary shareholders, that this reserve fund, when every purpose had been accomplished and the company had come to an end, would have to be divided between the ordinary and preference shareholders according to their rights. But we are dealing now with a company which has not come to an end, and which the directions of the articles bind, under which a reserve fund is to be accumulated, and is to be applied in a certain way, and it is only subject to the setting apart of this reserve fund that dividends may be declared; and I do not see how, if in one year, or two or three or four years, the company had required, or the directors had determined, that a certain reserve fund should be set aside, after that the directors could proceed to undo that without altering the articles, and divide as dividend what was being accumulated under the express provision of the articles as a reserve fund.

But, in the next place, supposing they could have done so, I do not see here that they have ever done it, because what happened was this: Having issued 5,000 shares, they wanted to issue 15,000 more; 10,000 were issued in a way which is unexceptional for this purpose, but 5,000 shares were issued by appropriating to each holder of the first 5,000 issued one new share fully paid up, and the way it is done is not by any alteration of the articles, and by no construction can their resolution operate as an alteration of the articles, because it is admitted that it was not so passed as to be capable of altering them. It must, therefore, simply stand as carrying out the articles in their original form. Then the intention is shown clearly on the circular issued to the shareholders. [His lordship read the circular, and continued:—] That would have exhausted the reserve fund, which at that time was £50,000, and it is done, not by applying it for any purpose mentioned in the articles, but simply by giving each shareholder credit for a corresponding amount. Then the petition states that, anticipating their proposals with regard to the reserve fund would be adopted by the shareholders, the directors had in fact applied the whole, or the greater part thereof, in the improvement of the company's fleet prior to the 30th of June, 1883, and I have not the least doubt that that matter was mentioned by the directors to the meeting at which it was resolved to carry out the resolution. The result is this, that, so far from dividing the reserve fund among the shareholders, if they had power to do so, it is the very last thing that they intended to do, and, what is more, they could not have done it if they wished, because they said it had already been laid out, for purposes no doubt advantageous to the company, but in such a way as rendered it absolutely impossible to divide it by way of dividend, and there is not any declaration whatever of any application of any part of this fund by way of dividend to a shareholder, and if he had come to ask for it as dividend the answer would have been "No." There has been no dividend declared, nor any fund out of which to declare it, and I think the words quoted from Lord Herschell's judgment in Bouch v. Sproule apply precisely to the present case, though the facts are different. His lordship there said: "I am of opinion that the company did not pay, or intend to pay, any sum as dividend, but intended to, and did, appropriate"—"the undivided profits," he said there, I will call it the reserve fund, because that is the real meaning of it—"did appropriate the reserve fund dealt with as an increase of the capital stock in the concern."

The result is that I cannot proceed upon this petition as it stands. The shares are, or at any rate may be, shares upon which nothing has been paid, and I cannot, therefore, proceed with the petition except upon the footing that creditors are advertised for in the usual way.

I will put it in this way. The court, being of opinion that the proposed reduction of the capital of the company does or may involve the diminution of liability on unpaid capital, directs the petition to stand over until the creditors have been advertised for. I have only heard one side, and therefore do not wish to put on record my opinion as to what the construction of what has been done is, and I propose to add the words does or may for that purpose.

Solicitors, Druces & Attlee.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Feb. 18.

CHESTON v. WELLS. (a.)

Practice — Mortgage — Foreclosure — Receiver — Personal order for payment against mortgagor — Form of judgment.

In a foreclosure action, a receiver having been appointed; upon judgment, in default of appearance, for a personal order for payment against the mortgagor, and for foreclosure, the plaintiff must produce an affidavit to the registrar that since filing his statement of claim nothing has been received on account of principal or interest. As there were no special circumstances in this case, a proviso to the effect that "any person redeeming, or the plaintiff in event of foreclosure, might apply in chambers for transfer of any money in court to the credit of the action or in the hands of the receiver," was not allowed to be inserted.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Short cause.

This was an action for foreclosure of a mortgage of land and houses at Felixstowe, in which the plaintiff claimed an account against the defendant in respect of the mortgage and a further charge, and payment of two principal sums of £600 and £50, with interest from November 4, 1891, to judgment, less a small sum already paid for interest, and foreclosure or sale.

The writ was issued in December, 1892, the interest being in arrear for twelve months. The defendant did not enter an appearance, and on January 27, 1893, a receiver was appointed. On February 1, 1893, the plaintiff filed his statement of claim.

This was a motion in default of appearance for personal judgment against the defendant for principal and interest, an account, and foreclosure in default of payment within six months after certificate.

G. Henderson, for the plaintiff.—I ask that the following proviso may be inserted in the judgment:—"Let any person redeeming the premises under the provisions of this order, or the plaintiff in the event of foreclosure, be at liberty to apply to the judge in chambers for payment and transfer of any moneys in court to the credit of this action or in the hands of the receiver." A similar proviso was inserted in the judgment in Coleman v. Llewellyn, 35 W. R. 82, 34 Ch. D. 143.

NORTH, J.—I decline to insert the proviso. In Coleman v. Llewellyn it was pointed out by the Court of Appeal that the proviso which was there inserted in the order must have been put in for some special reason by the judge, which makes a broad distinction between that case and the case of Jenner-Fust v. Needham, 34 W. R. 709, 32 Ch. D. 582, which lays down the general rule that in ordinary cases where the receiver receives rents between the date of the certificate and the day fixed for redemption, those rents must be taken into account, and a further time allowed for redemption. I am not disposed to adopt a course which might enable the plaintiff, if the receiver's accounts are not passed until after foreclosure, to put into his pocket, money which was in the receiver's hands at the date of the foreclosure and which ought to be brought into account with the mortgagor. As there are no special circumstances here, there must be judgment as claimed, but without the proviso, and the plaintiff must produce an affidavit to the registrar that since filing the statement of claim nothing has been received on account of principal or interest.

Solicitors, Jones, Hall, & Manning.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Jan. 27.

BAKER v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Declaration of lien—Rescission.

A vendor having obtained judgment for specific performance of an agreement for sale and a declaration of lien, with liberty to apply,

On motion for rescission in lieu of enforcing the lien,

Held, that the agreement might be rescinded.

Henty v. Schroeder, 27 W. R. 833, 12 Ch. D. 666, distinguished.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

This was an action brought by a vendor to obtain specific performance of an agreement dated the 30th of November, 1890, for the purchase of certain freehold property. £40 had been paid as deposit. At the trial of the action the defendant did not appear, and the plaintiff obtained judgment for specific performance. The judgment directed the usual account to be taken, and that the defendant should pay the balance found due from him, and also declared that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the property, with liberty to apply to enforce such lien. The chief clerk's certificate found a balance of £4,162 due from the defendant. The defendant made default in payment of the said amount.

J. A. Hay, for the plaintiff, now moved that the agreement of the 30th of November might be rescinded, that all further proceedings in the action might be stayed, and for the costs of the action and the motion. [He referred to Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., pp. 1329, 1330, and Henty v. Schroeder, 27 W. R. 833, 12 Ch. D. 666.] [NORTH, J.—As the purchaser has chosen his remedy by lien, can I now give him rescission?] Stirling, J., made an order similar to that asked for against the same defendant in an unreported case of Hudson v. Williams, 1891, H., 1,622.

The defendant did not appear to the motion.

NORTH, J., distinguished the present case from that of Henty v. Schroeder and the cases referred to in Seton, on the ground that in none of those cases did it appear, as in this case, that the decree for specific performance contained a delaration of lien and liberty to apply, and said that if the order made by Stirling, J., was produced to the registrar he would follow it. His lordship accordingly made the order asked for, subject to such production.

Solicitors, Patersons, Sons, & Candler.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Feb. 25; March 4.

In re WYTHES.
WEST v. WYTHES. (a.)

Settlement—Settled land—Equitable tenant for life—Right to possession of estate—Custody of title deeds—Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1884.

The powers granted to, and the duties imposed on, a tenant for life by the Settled Land Acts raise a presumption, in favour of his title to possession, not before existing and render it incumbent on the court to provide that, if the estate and trustees can be adequately protected by reasonable safeguards, an equitable tenant for life should be let into possession.

An equitable tenant for life is entitled to the custody of the title deeds.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by the equitable tenant for life under the will of the testator to be let into possession of two freehold properties, forming part of the testator's real estate, which was devised to the trustees of the will with large powers of management.

Rigby, S.G., and Leverson, for the applicant.—The equitable tenant for life is entitled to possession. Under the Settled Land Acts he has powers and authorities to exercise for the proper performance of which possession is necessary: Tidd v. Lister, 5 Madd. 429; Baylies v. Baylies, 1 Coll. 537; Taylor v.

(a.) Reported by FRANCIS T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Taylor, 23 W. R. 947, L. R. 20 Eq. 297, Hoskins v. Campbell, W. N., 1869, p. 59; Temple v. Thring, 56 L. T. N. S. 283, 35 W. R. Dig. 8. I am entitled to the custody of the title deeds: In re Burnaby's Settled Estates, 42 Ch. D. 621, 38 W. R. Dig. 183; In re Bentley, Wade v. Wilson, 33 W. R. 610, 54 L. J. Ch. 782.

Warmington, Q.C., and Munns, for the reversioners.

Renshaw, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the trustees.

KEKEWICH, J.—It would not have been satisfactory to make such an order as is asked, in chambers. The matter deserved the full attention which it has received in open court. Inasmuch as there was no hostile argument, there is no occasion for me to go through the authorities, or to recapitulate the rules deducible from them, or to explain in detail how far recent legislation has qualified them or rendered them inapplicable. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that the applicant's case was placed before the court by the Solicitor-General as fully and with as much precision as if he was encountering opponents; and counsel for the trustees were prepared to insist on any point requiring consideration, not thus brought out. And not only during the arguments, but since, I have though it my duty to reflect on the case made by the applicant, and to consider all the authorities cited, with special reference to the provisions of the Settled Land Acts, on which the applicant's case was rested.

My conclusion is that the Solicitor-General's argument is sound, and that the old authorities, of which Tidd v. Lister may be taken to be the type, and which were summarized by the late Master of the Rolls in Taylor v. Taylor, may be treated as largely, if not altogether, abrogated by the Acts just mentioned. I must not be understood as saying that even now an equitable tenant for life—where the trustees in whom the legal estate is vested have duties of management and the like to perform—is entitled as a matter of course to be let into possession; but I intend to hold that the powers granted to and the duties imposed on a tenant for life, as defined by the Settled Land Acts—which definition clearly includes an equitable tenant for life, such as the applicant—have raised a presumption in favour of the title to possession which did not before exist, and have made it incumbent on the court to provide that, if the estate and the trustees can be adequately protected by reasonable safeguards, an equitable tenant for life shall be let into possession and be enabled personally to exercise these powers and discharge these duties, unless there be found some reason to the contrary far more urgent than is disclosed by any of the terms of this will. The point is, in a great measure, new. It was before Pearson, J., in In re Bentley, Wade v. Wilson, and I have no doubt, from a perusal of his judgment, that he would have decided this case as I am now deciding it. The title to possession once established, the custody of the title deeds appears to follow, unless, of course, there is, in any particular case, reason for distinction. As regards the deeds, the case of In re Burnaby, before Stirling, J., is distinctly in point. There was no opposition there, but the arguments for the applicant were based on the provisions of the Settled Land Acts, and the learned judge must be taken to have assented to them, as I do.

Solicitors, Upton, Atkey, & Upton; Munns & Longden; Field & Co., for Smith, Pinsent, & Co., Birmingham.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } March 17, 18.

In re MINING SHARES INVESTMENT CO. (a.)

Company—Alteration of memorandum of association—Jurisdiction—Sanction of court—Winding-up court—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62), s. 1—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 1, 2, 32, sub-section (2)—Order of Lord Chancellor of the 26th of March, 1892.

The judge to whom the jurisdiction of the High Court in the winding up of companies has been assigned by the order of the Lord Chancellor of the 26th of March, 1892, has jurisdiction to make orders under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890.

This was a summons for directions which had been taken out and adjourned into court.

A petition had been presented under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the court to certain alterations in the memorandum of the above-named company, which was a company with a capital paid up, or credited as paid up, of £10,000, and therefore for winding up purposes subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court.

The question was now raised whether Vaughan Williams, J., had jurisdiction to entertain the matter, or whether the jurisdiction was vested in the other judges of the Chancery Division unaffected by the transfer of the winding-up business to Vaughan Williams, J.

F. T. Procter, for the company.—This is the first case of a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, which has come before your lordship. No doubt there is jurisdiction vested in your lordship to make orders under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890. I think that the jurisdiction is, at any rate, concurrent with that vested in the other judges of the Chancery Division. Section 1, sub-section (1), of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (which Act was passed on the same day—namely, August 18, 1890—as the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890), says that the alteration of the memorandum is not to take effect until confirmed on petition by the "court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company." By section 32, sub-section (2), of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, it is provided that "In Part IV. of the Companies Act, 1862, and in this Act the expression 'the court,' when used in relation to a company, shall, unless the contrary intention appears, mean the court having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up the company." Section 81 of the Companies Act, 1862, now repealed (Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 33), defines "the court" to mean, in the case of a company registered in England, "the High Court of Chancery," the jurisdiction of which has by virtue of the Judicature Acts been transferred to the High Court of Justice. The jurisdiction, therefore, starts de novo entirely. Section 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (sub-section 1), says: "The courts having jurisdiction to wind up companies in England and Wales shall be the High Court, the Chancery Courts of the Counties Palatine of Lancaster and Durham, the county courts, and the Stannaries Court." Section 2 of the same Act provides that, "subject to general rules and orders of transfer made under the authority of the

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and the Acts amending it, the jurisdiction of the High Court under this Act shall, as the Lord Chancellor may from time to time by general order direct, be exercised either generally or in specified classes of cases, either by such judge or judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court as the Lord Chancellor may assign to exercise that jurisdiction, or by the judge who for the time being exercises the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the High Court." By an order of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Justice dated the 26th of March, 1892, it was ordered that "Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, sitting and acting for the purpose of the exercise of such jurisdiction" [i.e., the jurisdiction of the High Court under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890] "as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, and the said judge shall, on and after the day aforesaid [6th of May, 1892], "and until further order, be the judge of the High Court assigned for the purpose of the exercise of that jurisdiction pursuant to the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890." It follows that your lordship has jurisdiction to confirm a petition of this description, because you have jurisdiction to wind up. The winding-up court, if this company were ordered to be wound up, would be the High Court, of which your lordship is appointed an additional judge, and the winding up would come before your lordship in the natural course: In re Islington and General Electric Supply Co., 36 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 487, where Chitty, J., said that the jurisdiction under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, was not affected by the order of the 26th of March, but he only meant that the jurisdiction remained in judges of the Chancery Division. Chitty, J., did not intend to say that your lordship has not got jurisdiction.

Jones v. The Swansea Benefit Building Society, 29 W. R. 382, was also referred to.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case a petition has been presented under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, and a summons for directions has been taken out which raises the question whether I have jurisdiction to deal with petitions under that Act. I have arrived at the conclusion that I have jurisdiction, and I do not purpose to decide anything more than that. I do not propose to say whether, in my judgment, the jurisdiction which I possess is exclusive, or whether it is jurisdiction which I possess concurrently with other judges of the Chancery Division; and I do not propose to discuss the question in such a way that I shall have to express an opinion that the jurisdiction is concurrent. All that was decided by Chitty, J., in In re Islington and General Electric Supply Co., was, that he himself had jurisdiction under the Act as a judge of the Chancery Division. He did not decide—and the question was not before him—that I have not jurisdiction. If he had come to such a decision, and the question had been before him for determination, I might have been bound to follow his decision; but the question was not before him. In my judgment I have jurisdiction, and I propose to state very shortly the ground of my decision. Section 81 of the Companies Act, 1862, enacted that "the expression 'the court' as used in this part of the Act" (that is, Part IV., the part which deals with "Winding up of companies and associations under this Act") "shall mean the following authorities (that is to say)" (except in local cases) "in the case of a company registered in England . . . the High Court of Chancery." That jurisdiction was, by the Judicature Act, transferred to the High Court of Justice. Section 81 of the Act of 1862 was repealed by section 33 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and I may observe that that Act was passed on the very day on which the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, was passed.

Section 1, sub-section (1), of the Winding-up Act provides that "the courts having jurisdiction to wind up companies in England and Wales shall be the High Court" (and certain other courts), and sub-section 2 provides that in the case of a company like this having a capital of over £10,000 the petition shall be to the High Court. By section 2, subject to general rules and order of transfer, "the jurisdiction of the High Court under this Act shall, as the Lord Chancellor may from time to time direct, be exercised, either generally or in specified classes of cases, either by such judge or judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court as the Lord Chancellor may assign to exercise that jurisdiction, or by the judge who for the time being exercises the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the High Court." Therefore the winding-up jurisdiction is to be exercised by the judges mentioned in the section. By the order of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice of the 26th of March, 1892, it was directed that on and after the 26th of May, 1892, "the jurisdiction of the High Court under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, shall, until further order, be exercised by" me, "sitting and acting for the purpose of the exercise of such jurisdiction as an additional judge of the Chancery Division," and I am the judge of the High Court thereby assigned for the exercise of such jurisdiction. In the circumstances, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that I am a judge having assigned to me the jurisdiction of the High Court in the winding up of companies. Now section 1 of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, provides that an alteration in a memorandum shall not take effect "until confirmed on petition by the court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company." I am of opinion that I am "the court having jurisdiction" to make such an order in the sense that the High Court has such jurisdiction, and that I am the judge to whom that part of the jurisdiction has been assigned. It has been suggested that the word "has" does not mean "has at the time of the presentation of the petition," but "has in relation to the point of time when the Act of Parliament was passed." I do not agree with that suggestion. In any case it would be a forced and unnatural construction, but it is especially so where the word is used in an Act passed on the very day on which an Act was passed repealing section 81 of the Companies Act, 1862, and pointing out what court shall exercise jurisdiction in winding up. In these circumstances I am of opinion that I have jurisdiction, and I shall refer the petition to chambers to be dealt with in the ordinary way.

Solicitor, H. P. Cobb.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, L.J.) March 16.

RASSAM v. BUDGE. (a.)

Slander—Pleading—Embarrassing defence.

The defendant in an action of slander denied by his defence having spoken the words alleged in the statement of claim, and set out in his defence other words which he admitted having spoken, and which he alleged were true in substance and in fact.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that this pleading was embarrassing, and that the paragraphs containing the words admitted by the defendant ought to be struck out.

Appeal of the plaintiff from an order of Kennedy, J., in chambers, refusing to strike out certain paragraphs in the defendant's defence.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, a retired officer of the Indian Civil Service, for damages for libel and slander alleged to have been written and spoken by the defendant with reference to certain antiquarian researches in Asiatic Turkey, which the plaintiff had conducted on behalf of the Trustees of the British Museum. The defendant was a second-class assistant in the Egyptian and Oriental Department in the British Museum. The appeal related only to the portion of the case which dealt with the alleged slander.

Paragraph 6 of the statement of claim was as follows:—"In or about the month of June, 1891, the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff and of him as such agent of the British Museum as aforesaid the words following, that is to say:—'(A) This is the kind of thing Rassam sent home. Other people got all the whole tablets; we got the fragments, mere rubbish. The overseers who carried on the excavations were his' (meaning plaintiff's) 'relations, and they picked out all the good tablets, and sold them to the Germans, Americans, and others. There was great dishonesty on the part of these men. Oh, yes, the overseers were his relations. David Thoma was his relation, and so were the others. He allowed these men to appropriate the perfect tablets from our excavations at Abou Hubba and elsewhere which belonged to the British Museum, and ought to have been sent here, and to sell them to the agents of the Berlin and other museums.'" Sections B and C of paragraph 6 contained other statements of a similar character alleged to have been spoken by the defendant. The innuendo alleged was that the plaintiff had habitually neglected his duties and grossly misconducted himself as agent for the British Museum, and had assisted others to defraud the trustees of the British Museum.

The defendant by his defence admitted that he had spoken the two first sentences of section A of paragraph 6 of the statement of claim, but denied having spoken the remainder of section A or any of sections B and C. He also pleaded that the words, if spoken, did not bear the defamatory meaning alleged and were privileged. Paragraph 10 of the defence was as follows:—"The defendant upon the said date" (viz., on the date when the words in section A of paragraph 6 of the statement of claim were alleged to have been spoken) "did say the following words: 'That the men employed by the plaintiff and the British Museum in the said excavation appropriated tablets and other antiquities and sold them to other persons and to agents of other museums. That tablets which must have been dug from the said sites had been sold to Germans and Americans, and that the British Museum had made a large purchase of such tablets in open market, and that the tablets so purchased were in a more perfect condition and more valuable than those forwarded directly to the British Museum.' The said words were and are true in substance and in fact, and were published on a privileged occasion as hereinafter appearing in paragraph 12 of this defence." Paragraph 14 of the defence was similar to paragraph 10, and contained the defendant's version of what was said by him on the occasion when the words in sections B and C of paragraph 6 of the statement of claim were alleged to have been spoken, and a plea that the defendant's version was true and privileged. The plaintiff applied to the judge in chambers to strike out paragraphs 10 and 14 of the defence, on the ground that they were irrelevant and raised immaterial issues, and disclosed no answer to the plaintiff's cause of action, but were embarrassing.

Kennedy, J., dismissed the application, and the plaintiff appealed.

Blake Odgers, for the plaintiff.—Paragraphs 10 and 14 of the defence ought to be struck out, for the defendant is endeavouring by them to raise immaterial issues. He does not justify the words in the statement of claim, but alleges that he used certain other words and that they were true. That is embarrassing to the plaintiff, and is not a good defence in an action of slander: Brembridge v. Latimer, 12 W. R. 878; Alexander v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 13 W. R. 651.

Temple Franks, for the defendant.—Brembridge v. Latimer is not in point. That case only decided that where a plaintiff complained of certain passages in a newspaper article which imputed to him dishonesty as an election agent, it was no defence for the defendant to say that the article also contained charges of bribery which he was prepared to justify. In this case the plaintiff is suing on a definite conversation. The defendant admits that the conversation took place, but says that it is inaccurately set out in the statement of claim. He cannot pick out single passages in the plaintiff's version and say they are untrue, therefore he is bound to set up his own version.

He also cited Millington v. Loring, 29 W. R. 207, 6 Q. B. D. 190; Whitney v. Moignard, 24 Q. B. D. 630, 38 W. R. Dig. 109.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, and that paragraphs 10 and 14 of the defence must be struck out. The plaintiff complains that the defendant said various things about him, which primâ facie were libellous. It would be open to the defendant to plead, by way of defence, that he did not say the words complained of, or that he did do so, and that they were true or privileged. The defendant has, however, adopted a course which is most embarrassing to the plaintiff. He says, in effect, "I did not say exactly what you (the plaintiff) say I did, but I set out my version of the conversation and plead that it is true." If the defendant's version is substantially different from the plaintiff's, he is not guilty of the slander complained of, whereas if it is substantially the same he cannot successfully rely on the defence of not having spoken the words set out in the statement of claim. The trial of actions such as this would be much embarrassed if this plea were allowed to stand.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Under the old practice a plea of not guilty and justification would have carried everything that the defendant wants to say. The defence raised by these two paragraphs is of a novel character, and one that ought not to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Emmet, Sons, Stubbs, & Melhuish.

Solicitors for the defendant, Lewis & Lewis.

(1895) 1 Q.B. 626.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) Feb. 8, 9.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE.
REG. v. LICENSING JUSTICES OF BRISTOL. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Refusal to renew licence—Appeal to quarter sessions—Notice of appeal—Service on "the other party"—Superintendent of police opposing renewal—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31.

Where a superintendent of police has served notice of opposition to the renewal of a licence, and has appeared before the licensing justices in support of his opposition, he is "the other party" to the proceedings within the meaning of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and a person aggrieved by the refusal of the justices to renew the licence must, as a condition precedent to the hearing of his appeal to quarter sessions, serve upon the superintendent notice of his intention to appeal.

Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire, 40 W. R. 436, [1892] 1 Q. B. 621, and Price v. James, ante, p. 57, [1892] 2 Q. B. 428, followed.

The first of these two cases (which were heard together) was the argument of a rule nisi for the issue of a writ of mandamus to justices in quarter sessions to hear and determine an appeal from licensing justices. The applicants (Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Limited) were the landlords of a licensed beerhouse in Bristol, of which Passmore was the tenant in the year 1892. Before the general annual licensing meeting, which was held on the 21st of September in that year, Passmore was duly served (in accordance with the provisions of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) on behalf of the superintendent of police with notice of opposition to the renewal of his licence. At that meeting Passmore applied for a renewal, and the applicants (by their solicitor) supported his application; the superintendent of police opposed the application, which was refused by the justices. The applicants, as "persons aggrieved" within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27), served notice of their intention to appeal from this decision to quarter sessions upon the clerk to the justices, but not upon the superintendent of police. Upon the appeal coming on for hearing at the quarter sessions it was objected that the superintendent ought to have been served as being the "other party" to the proceedings within the meaning of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. The court of quarter sessions upheld the objection and refused to hear the appeal. The applicants then obtained this rule nisi.

In the second case a rule against the licensing justices had been obtained by the same applicants upon the ground that they had refused to renew Passmore's licence for reasons other than those stated in the notice of opposition. This rule was sought to be made absolute in the event of the rule against the justices in quarter sessions being discharged.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 31, provides that a person authorized to appeal from the order of a court of summary jurisdiction to a court of quarter sessions may do so subject to (inter alia) the following condition:—"(2) The appellant shall within the prescribed time . . . give notice of appeal by serving on the other party and on the clerk of the said court of summary jurisdiction notice in writing of his intention to appeal, and of the general grounds of such appeal."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Poland, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the justices in both cases, showed cause against the rules.—It has been decided by Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire, 40 W. R. 436, [1892] 1 Q. B. 621, that the procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts applies to appeals from licensing justices to quarter sessions. Under section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, upon any such appeal notice of the intention to appeal must be served upon "the other party." In this case the superintendent of police appeared before the licensing justices and opposed the renewal; he is, therefore, the other party, and ought to have been served. In Price v. James, where the appeal was by way of special case under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the superintendent of police was under similar circumstances held to be the proper respondent to the appeal. As to the second rule, the applicants had their remedy by appeal to quarter sessions, and therefore no mandamus can go to the licensing justices to rehear the case: Reg. v. Smith, 21 W. R. 382, L. R. 8 Q. B. 146.

Gwynne James, for the applicants, in support of the rules.—This case is distinguishable from the cases of Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire and Price v. James. "Party" in section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, means "party to the proceedings before the court of summary jurisdiction"; the superintendent of police was not a party to those proceedings, neither were the applicants, for the application to the justices was by the tenant, not by the applicants, who are his landlords. The applicants not being parties to the proceedings before the justices, there can be no "other party" as far as they are concerned, and, therefore, there is no one whom they are bound to serve. It would be a great hardship if the appellants, in any case of a refusal to grant or renew a licence, were obliged to serve an unlimited number of persons who had opposed the grant or renewal. The procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts is not intended to apply so as to work hardship to persons who have a statutory right of appeal under section 27 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61: per Fry, L.J., in Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire. Price v. James only decides that where the appeal is by way of special case the person who opposed is the proper respondent, and not the justices who have stated the case. That case has, therefore, no application to the present. As to the second rule, which is only asked for in case the first is discharged, the licensing justices exceeded their jurisdiction by deciding on grounds other than those stated in the notice of objection. Mandamus therefore lies.

Lawrence replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In the case against the justices of Gloucestershire the objection taken to the hearing of the appeal by the court of quarter sessions was that no notice of the intention to appeal was served upon the other party. That notice is necessary under section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a provision which was extended by subsequent Acts to appeals in licensing cases. It is clear that under that Act notice of the intention to appeal must be given to "the other party." Who is "the other party"? That has in effect been decided by the case of Price v. James. In that case the Lords Justices held that where the superintendent of police has been the person who has served his notice of objection and has appeared before the justices and opposed the renewal of the licence, he is in fact "the other party." As Bowen, L.J., points out, the justices ought not to be made respondents in a case which is to be stated by them, and he goes on, in effect, to say that the respondent must be the other party to the proceedings, and that the superintendent of police who appeared and objected was the other party. Here, too, the superintendent was the other party; he was the person who conducted the opposition to the licence; it was with him that the persons who alleged that they were aggrieved by the decision of the justices had to deal. It appears to me clear from the words of the statute and from the decisions that notice of the intention to appeal ought to have been given to the superintendent of police; that notice was not given, and therefore the appeal could not be heard.

Then it is said that, the appeal having failed from the absence of this notice, a mandamus ought to issue to the licensing justices to rehear the case. The answer to that contention is that the proper remedy of the applicants is by appeal to quarter sessions, and if they have lost that remedy through want of the proper notice, they are not entitled to obtain any mandamus against the licensing justices.

I am of opinion, therefore, that both rules must be discharged.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Reg. v. The Justices of Glamorganshire has decided that the procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts applies to appeals from licensing justices, and that is really an end of this case. For it is clear to my mind, even apart from the case of Price v. James, that the superintendent of police was "the other party" here, for he was the person who gave notice of opposition and appeared before the licensing justices and opposed the renewal of the licence. I quite agree that, if authority be needed, Price v. James is an authority for this view.

As to the rule against the licensing justices, I agree that it must be discharged for the reasons which my lord has given.

Rules discharged.

Solicitor for the respondents, H. M. Phillips, for J. Holmes Gore, Bristol.

Solicitors for the applicants, Meredith & Co., for G. Pearson, Bristol.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) Jan. 18; Feb. 8.

REG. v. KENNEDY. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compulsory taking of land—Compensation—Notice to treat—No steps taken under notice—Possession taken—Tenant's interest in land taken—At what date interest is to be calculated—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 121.

A notice to treat was given by a railway company for a strip of land which formed part of lands held by the tenant under a lease. Nothing was done under this notice to treat, but about a year afterwards the company required and took possession of the strip under section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. At the time the notice to treat was given the tenant had an interest for more than a year, but at the time the strip was taken he had an interest for less than a year in the strip taken. The tenant claimed compensation for the strip taken, and for severance damage.

Held, that the time at which the tenant's interest was to be considered was the time when the strip was taken under section 85, and not the time when notice to treat was given, under which nothing was done, and as at the former time the tenant had an interest in the strip of land less than for a year, a magistrate had jurisdiction to assess the compensation under section 121 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

Rule for a mandamus to a metropolitan police magistrate commanding him to proceed to determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the Bexley Heath Railway Co. to Colonel North for the value of his unexpired term or interest in certain lands in the parish of Eltham and for the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him or otherwise injuriously affecting the same by reason of the execution of the works of the company.

The solicitor to the railway company filed an affidavit, which contained the following admitted facts:—

By certain Acts of Parliament the Bexley Heath Railway Co. were empowered to make compulsory purchase of certain lands in the parish of Eltham and county of Kent.

Part of the land required for the construction of the line authorized by the said Acts was Crown land, let by the Crown to Colonel North by a lease dated the 5th of February, 1889, and by this lease Colonel North had a term of thirty years from the 10th of October, 1886, but under this lease the lessor reserved "the power, for the purpose of sale or exchange, or for building or making roads or drains, or for accommodation purposes, or for any other purpose than that for which these presents are demised, or in case the said right and liberty of sporting over the said premises shall at any time during the tenancy thereof be required by the lessor for any other purpose than that of letting the sporting at any time or times, upon giving to the lessee three calendar months' previous notice in writing of the intention so to do, to determine the tenancies of the whole or such part or parts."

On the 14th of May, 1891, and the 15th of August, 1891, the railway company duly served notices to treat for certain portions of the land occupied by Colonel North under the lease.

On the 30th of June, 1892, the lessor, the Crown, served on Colonel North notice under the lease requiring possession at the expiration of three months of that portion of the Crown land required for the construction of the railway, being the same portion of land as that included in the notices to treat.

On the 20th of July, 1892, the company required and took possession of the said land referred to in the notices to treat in the manner provided by the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

On the 21st of October, 1892, the company took out a summons before the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Woolwich to hear and determine the amount of disputed compensation to be paid by the company to Colonel North, as provided by section 121 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

On the 28th of October, 1892, the parties appeared before the magistrate, when it was contended on behalf of Colonel North that he had an interest under the lease greater than as a tenant "for a year or from year to year," and that therefore the police magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the case under the 121st section of the Act.

The railway company contended that Colonel North has no greater interest than as a tenant "for a year or from year to year" within the meaning of section 121 of the Act, and that therefore the amount of compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest should be determined in the manner provided by that section.

Colonel North claimed, not only compensation in respect of the lands taken, but compensation for injuriously affecting other lands held by him under the lease.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

On the 4th of November, 1892, the learned magistrate decided that he had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and in an affidavit filed by him he stated:—"At the date of the notice to treat—which, as I understand, determines the time at which the value of the owner's interest is to be considered—no notice on the part of the Crown had been served on Colonel North requiring possession at the end of the three calendar months, and it seemed to me that, until such notice was given, Colonel North's interest under the lease was greater than that of a tenant from year to year, and consequently not within the terms of section 121 of the Act."

A rule for a mandamus was then obtained at the instance of the promoters of the railway company.

Section 121 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), provides:—"If any such lands shall be in the possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for any just allowance that ought to be made to him by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain, or if part only of such lands be required, compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him, or otherwise injuriously affecting the same; and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two justices in case the parties differ about the same."

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Forman, on behalf of Colonel North, showed cause against the rule.—There are two points raised here: it is said in the first place that, as this lease could be determined at any time on giving three months' notice, therefore it originally was a lease for less than a year, so that, even before the notice to treat was given the tenant had an interest for less than a year. The real question, however, is that the time at which the tenant's interest is to be looked at for the purpose of assessing compensation, is the date of the notice to treat, and not the date when possession was taken under section 85: Reg. v. Stone, 14 W. R. 791, L. R. 1 Q. B. 529; Reg. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 25 W. R. 41, 2 Q. B. D. 151; Tyson v. Mayor of London, 20 W. R. 112, L. R. 7 C. P. 18. That being so, the tenant had—at the date of the notice to treat—an interest in the strip taken, larger than an interest "for a year or from year to year," and therefore the magistrate had no jurisdiction under section 121 of the Act to assess the compensation, but Colonel North was entitled to have the same settled by a jury or an arbitrator under section 68. Moreover, there was also a claim for severance damage as well as for the strip taken, and as the compensation must be assessed once for all, this could not be settled under section 121.

E. Boyle (G. Elliott with him), for the promoters, in support of the rule.—As to the first point, as the lease was determinable in certain events—in fact, in any event—by a three months' notice, it was therefore never at any time larger than an interest for a year, so that, if that were so, the magistrate would have jurisdiction under section 121. As to the second point, and that is the real point of the case, the notice to treat was given, but nothing whatever was done under it by either party, and then a year afterwards notice was given requiring possession under section 85, and possession was taken under that section. At the time possession was required and taken under section 85 the tenant had an interest for less than a year—namely, for two months, and our contention is that the time at which the tenant's interest is to be estimated is the date at which possession was taken; and, that being so, the magistrate had jurisdiction under section 121 to assess the compensation.

Feb. 8.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and CAVE, J.) was delivered by CAVE, J.—This case was argued before my lord and myself on the 18th of January, and we took time to consider our decision, which I have now to deliver.

The matter was an application to compel a police magistrate to hear and determine the amount of compensation to which Colonel North was entitled under the following circumstances.

The point in dispute was whether the question was one which could be heard and determined by a police magistrate, or whether Colonel North was entitled to have a jury summoned for the purpose of assessing his compensation, and the question whether he is entitled to one or the other depends upon his interest in the property in question.

Now originally Colonel North had a lease for thirty years, which was dated in February, 1889, and that, of course, gave him a greater interest than for a year, or from year to year. There was, however, a power in the lease to the lessor, the Crown, to determine the lease on giving three months' notice in certain events, and with certain limitations. On the 14th of May, 1891, the Bexley Heath Railway Co. gave Colonel North a notice to treat for certain portions of the property comprised in this lease. Nothing further was done under that notice—I mean nothing was done in the way of summoning a jury to assess compensation. The railway company took no steps to summon a jury, and Colonel North took no steps to compel them to do so, and matters remained simply in that condition. Notice to treat given; nothing done upon it.

On the 30th of June, 1892, the Crown exercised the power contained in the lease to give notice, and they gave a notice with respect to that portion of the land which the railway company had given notice to treat for, and the result of that naturally was that Colonel North's interest in that portion of the land, which originally had been an interest for thirty years less the time he had actually enjoyed it, became an interest for three months only. On July 20, 1892, the railway company gave notice that they wanted possession under section 85 of the Act, and I believe on that same day, the 20th of July, they took possession of the land in the manner provided for by that section.

Now, that being so, they were bound at once to take proceedings for the purpose of having compensation assessed, and on the 21st of October they took out a summons before a metropolitan police magistrate to have the amount of compensation heard and determined. Colonel North appeared upon the return day of the summons and contended that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, and that he was entitled to have a jury summoned for the purpose of assessing payment. No doubt if the proceedings had been taken under the notice to treat, and before the Crown notice on the 20th of June, 1892, had been given, the contention of Colonel North would have been perfectly right. But proceedings were not taken under the notice to treat; they were taken in pursuance of the company's having got possession in July, 1892, and that does undoubtedly raise a point of some little nicety which we thought it advisable to take time to consider.

Some cases were cited upon the matter, but none of them have any very strong bearing on the point; and, in point of fact, one is driven back to the construction to be placed upon the statute.

If the proceedings had been wholly taken under section 85 it is clear that at the time when possession was taken the interest of Colonel North was an interest for less than a year, and that consequently the magistrate would have had jurisdiction. Now does it affect the case that a previous notice to treat had been given? Upon consideration we have arrived at the conclusion that it does not. Nothing was done under that notice to treat. The company might have taken proceedings to settle compensation; Colonel North might have compelled them to take proceedings; but neither party acted, both apparently being content that matters should remain in statu quo, and it was not until after the Crown had given the notice to quit that the railway company took proceedings under section 85. Now I endeavoured to elicit from the learned counsel for Colonel North what his claim was, but could not do so, and the result was that I could not ascertain what the claim was, and I have arrived at the conclusion that Colonel North has no claim except for the loss of the right to occupy the particular piece in question from July, 1892, when possession was taken down to the expiration of his interest, which would be less than three months, and also for the severance occasioned by taking a part of his property during the same period. Now, if that is so, then it is clear that his actual interest is less than a year's interest, and that it comes within the principle of the statute, that the compensation in that case should be assessed by a police magistrate and not by a jury. Under these circumstances I am inclined to think that Colonel North cannot fall back upon the notice to treat under which nothing was done, but that the compensation must be assessed in the manner provided, where at the time when proceedings were commenced there is less than twelve months interest in the claimant. That being so, though the matter is not so clear as one would wish it to be, I come to the conclusion that the magistrate had jurisdiction, and that he ought to have proceeded to ascertain the compensation.

My lord authorizes me to say that he agrees in this judgment.

Rule absolute.

Solicitors for the company, Dollman & Pritchard.

Solicitor for Colonel North, George Whale.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Charles, J.) — Jan. 25.

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF SOUTHPORT v. MORRISS. (a.)

Shipping—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 318—Navigation—Electric launch not having certificate carrying passengers on an artificial lake.

The appellants were convicted by the justices of Southport on a charge that they, being the owners of an electric launch, did ply with more than twelve passengers on board without having a duplicate of a certificate of the Board of Trade put up in a conspicuous part of the vessel, so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to section 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The vessel was an electric launch, owned by the appellants, in which passengers were taken for hire on pleasure trips on an artificial lake in a park also the property of the appellants.

Held, that the electric launch was not within section 2 of the Act, which enacts that the term "ship" shall include a "vessel used in navigation," and that the Act, therefore, did not apply, and the conviction was wrong.

This was a case stated by the justices of the borough of Southport, in Lancashire. The information, which was preferred by the respondent, Morriss, against the appellants, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the said borough, was in the following terms:—"For that the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses on the tenth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, at the borough aforesaid, being then the owners of a certain electric launch used for carrying passengers called The Bonnie Southport, unlawfully did allow the said electric launch to ply, and the said electric launch did then ply, with more than twelve passengers on board without having the duplicate of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade for such vessel under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, (being a certificate then in force and applicable to the voyage) put up in some conspicuous part of the said vessel so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to section 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854."

The case stated by the justices was as follows:

"1. At the hearing of the said information the appellants and respondent appeared and were represented by their solicitors, and the following facts were either proved before us or admitted by both parties.

"2. That the appellants were the owners of an artificial lake or piece of water on the foreshore in the said borough, a land-locked lake not open to the sea except at high spring tides, in or abutting on a park provided by them and laid out on the said foreshore, and the said lake had been excavated from the sand on the said foreshore to a depth of three feet or thereabouts, and was surrounded by a concrete wall or path. The lake is about half a mile in length and about 160 yards in width.

"3. That the said lake was used for boating purposes, and the appellants had placed on it for hire a certain vessel or launch called The Bonnie Southport, of about three tons burthen, capable of carrying twelve passengers and upwards, and propelled by electricity from accumulators charged by a direct current dynamo from a charging station.

"4. That the said launch had not been registered as a British ship under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

"5. That no duplicate of the certificate mentioned in section 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, had been on the said 10th day of August, 1892, put up in any part whatsoever of the said launch as required by section 317 of the said Act, and no such certificate was in force for the said launch on the said 10th day of August, 1892, or had, indeed, ever been issued to such launch.

"6. That the said launch on the said 10th day of August, 1892, proceeded from the landing stage of the said lake on a trip round the said lake and back again to such landing stage, having on board twelve passengers and upwards—in fact there were on board between thirty and forty passengers.

"7. That each of the said passengers had paid the appellants, or their duly authorized officer or servant, the stipulated fare for such trip.

"8. On these facts we were of opinion that The Bonnie Southport was a passenger steamer plying with passengers within the meaning of the 318th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and the Acts amending the same, and that the offence charged in the information was proved.

"9. And we, the said justices, adjudged and determined that the appellants, for their said offence,

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 4th of November, 1892, the learned magistrate decided that he had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and in an affidavit filed by him he stated:—"At the date of the notice to treat—which, as I understand, determines the time at which the value of the owner's interest is to be considered—no notice on the part of the Crown had been served on Colonel North requiring possession at the end of the three calendar months, and it seemed to me that, until such notice was given, Colonel North's interest under the lease was greater than that of a tenant from year to year, and consequently not within the terms of section 121 of the Act."

A rule for a mandamus was then obtained at the instance of the promoters of the railway company.

Section 121 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), provides:—"If any such lands shall be in the possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for any just allowance that ought to be made to him by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain, or if part only of such lands be required, compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him, or otherwise injuriously affecting the same; and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two justices in case the parties differ about the same."

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Forman, on behalf of Colonel North, showed cause against the rule.—There are two points raised here: it is said in the first place that, as this lease could be determined at any time on giving three months' notice, therefore it originally was a lease for less than a year, so that, even before the notice to treat was given the tenant had an interest for less than a year. The real question, however, is that the time at which the tenant's interest is to be looked at for the purpose of assessing compensation, is the date of the notice to treat, and not the date when possession was taken under section 85: Reg. v. Stone, 14 W. R. 791, L. R. 1 Q. B. 529; Reg. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 25 W. R. 41, 2 Q. B. D. 151; Tyson v. Mayor of London, 20 W. R. 112, L. R. 7 C. P. 18. That being so, the tenant had—at the date of the notice to treat—an interest in the strip taken, larger than an interest "for a year or from year to year," and therefore the magistrate had no jurisdiction under section 121 of the Act to assess the compensation, but Colonel North was entitled to have the same settled by a jury or an arbitrator under section 68. Moreover, there was also a claim for severance damage as well as for the strip taken, and as the compensation must be assessed once for all, this could not be settled under section 121.

E. Boyle (G. Elliott with him), for the promoters, in support of the rule.—As to the first point, as the lease was determinable in certain events—in fact, in any event—by a three months' notice, it was therefore never at any time larger than an interest for a year, so that, if that were so, the magistrate would have jurisdiction under section 121. As to the second point, and that is the real point of the case, the notice to treat was given, but nothing whatever was done under it by either party, and then a year afterwards notice was given requiring possession under section 85, and possession was taken under that section. At the time possession was required and taken under section 85 the tenant had an interest for less than a year—namely, for two months, and our contention is that the time at which the tenant's interest is to be estimated is the date at which possession was taken; and, that being so, the magistrate had jurisdiction under section 121 to assess the compensation.

Feb. 8.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and CAVE, J.) was delivered by CAVE, J.—This case was argued before my lord and myself on the 18th of January, and we took time to consider our decision, which I have now to deliver.

The matter was an application to compel a police magistrate to hear and determine the amount of compensation to which Colonel North was entitled under the following circumstances.

The point in dispute was whether the question was one which could be heard and determined by a police magistrate, or whether Colonel North was entitled to have a jury summoned for the purpose of assessing his compensation, and the question whether he is entitled to one or the other depends upon his interest in the property in question.

Now originally Colonel North had a lease for thirty years, which was dated in February, 1889, and that, of course, gave him a greater interest than for a year, or from year to year. There was, however, a power in the lease to the lessor, the Crown, to determine the lease on giving three months' notice in certain events, and with certain limitations. On the 14th of May, 1891, the Bexley Heath Railway Co. gave Colonel North a notice to treat for certain portions of the property comprised in this lease. Nothing further was done under that notice—I mean nothing was done in the way of summoning a jury to assess compensation. The railway company took no steps to summon a jury, and Colonel North took no steps to compel them to do so, and matters remained simply in that condition. Notice to treat given; nothing done upon it.

On the 30th of June, 1892, the Crown exercised the power contained in the lease to give notice, and they gave a notice with respect to that portion of the land which the railway company had given notice to treat for, and the result of that naturally was that Colonel North's interest in that portion of the land, which originally had been an interest for thirty years less the time he had actually enjoyed it, became an interest for three months only. On July 20, 1892, the railway company gave notice that they wanted possession under section 85 of the Act, and I believe on that same day, the 20th of July, they took possession of the land in the manner provided for by that section.

Now, that being so, they were bound at once to take proceedings for the purpose of having compensation assessed, and on the 21st of October they took out a summons before a metropolitan police magistrate to have the amount of compensation heard and determined. Colonel North appeared upon the return day of the summons and contended that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, and that he was entitled to have a jury summoned for the purpose of assessing payment. No doubt if the proceedings had been taken under the notice to treat, and before the Crown notice on the 20th of June, 1892, had been given, the contention of Colonel North would have been perfectly right. But proceedings were not taken under the notice to treat; they were taken in pursuance of the company's having got possession in July, 1892, and that does undoubtedly raise a point of some little nicety which we thought it advisable to take time to consider.

Some cases were cited upon the matter, but none of them have any very strong bearing on the point; view by the way in which section 309 is expressed. Having regard to these sections and to section 303 I am of opinion that the Act does not apply to a case like the present. I concur in the rest of the observations which the Lord Chief Justice has made.

The conviction set aside.

Solicitors for the appellants, Andrew, Mellor, & Smith, for J. Davies Williams, Southport.

Solicitor in support of the conviction, The Solicitor for the Board of Trade.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) Jan. 14.

McKENZIE v. DAY. (a.)

Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 17—"Illegally dealing in"—Penalty.

The provision in section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1874, that persons found upon suspected premises entered by a constable in pursuance of a warrant to search for liquors sold or kept for sale contrary to law, shall be presumed to be guilty of "illegally dealing in intoxicating liquor" until the contrary be shown, is not confined to a seller, but applies also to a buyer, of such liquors.

Special case stated by the stipendiary magistrate at Cardiff.

By the Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 17, a justice of the peace may, "if satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground to believe that any intoxicating liquor is sold by retail or exposed or kept for sale by retail at any place within his jurisdiction," issue a search warrant, by virtue of which a constable may enter and search suspected premises for intoxicating liquor, and seize and remove any liquor found therein which there is reasonable ground to suppose is in such place for the purpose of unlawful sale, &c., and it is further provided as follows: "When a constable has entered any premises in pursuance of any such warrant as is mentioned in this section, and has seized and removed such liquor as aforesaid, any person found at the time on the premises shall, until the contrary be proved, be deemed to have been on such premises for the purpose of illegally dealing in intoxicating liquor, and be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

Ellen Day was charged with illegally dealing in intoxicating liquor under the following circumstances: "A constable entering a private house in Mary Anne-street, Cardiff, on Sunday, the 16th of October, 1892, in pursuance of a warrant under the above section, found a woman named Ellen Riley in the act of handing beer to a man, and receiving money from him. The constable thereupon proceeded to collect the drinking vessels on the premises, when the defendant, who held one in her hand, said to him, "You shall not have this, I've paid for it."

The stipendiary magistrate was of opinion that the section referred only to persons selling intoxicating liquor, and that the defendant could not therefore be convicted of "illegally dealing," but on the application of the chief constable he stated a case for the opinion of the court.

B. F. Williams, Q.C., and C. J. Jackson, for the chief constable.—The learned magistrate was wrong in the view he took: the words "illegally dealing" in the section clearly apply to buying as well as selling. [They were stopped by the court.]

Brynmor Jones, for the defendant.—Illegal dealing applies only to a seller of intoxicating liquors: in all the dictionaries a "dealer" is defined as a "distributor," and that is the sense in which the word is used in the Licensing Act. The expression "illegal dealing" is used as an abbreviation for the larger expression, "sold by retail or exposed or kept for sale by retail," used in the earlier part of the section, and it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to create a new and separate offence by a mere paragraph in a section dealing with the right of search. The object of it really was to get over the difficulty in such cases of proving the actual seller, by providing that everyone present should be presumed to be the seller unless the contrary was proved.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In my opinion the magistrate should have convicted in this case. The plain meaning of the section is to include the buyer as well as the seller of intoxicating liquor; you must have two parties to a "dealing." The object of the Act of Parliament is to prevent in private houses what it has tried to put down in public-houses. It is a strong section, and the presumption is that when liquor is being dealt in in a private house, everyone is guilty of that illegal conduct, that is, of joining in an act which cannot be done by one alone, and it is illegal when done by two, unless they can rebut it. I am unable to see how it is possible to evade the Act, and that it clearly applies to this case. We therefore remit the case to the learned magistrate, with an order to him to convict the defendant.

CAVE, J.—I agree.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors, Andrew, Mellor, & Smith, for Wheatley, Town Clerk, Cardiff; Riddell, Veysey, & Smith.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Dec. 16.

HICK v. RAYMOND & REID. (a.)

Shipping—Bill of lading—Delay in unloading—Demurrage—Reasonable time—Strike.

Where the terms of a bill of lading contain no stipulation as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the ship's cargo, the obligation on him is to discharge within a reasonable time under the circumstances existing at the time of unloading.

Should the existing circumstances be extraordinary, owing to a strike preventing the obtaining of necessary labour, the consignee (provided the delay was not due to any act or default on his part) under such a bill of lading is not liable to the shipowner for damages for detention of the ship.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported sub nom. Hick v. Rodocanachi, 40 W. R. 161, [1891] 2 Q. B. 626) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Fry, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported as Hick v. Rodocanachi, 40 W. R. 161, [1891] 2 Q. B. 626. The facts are shortly as follows:—The appellant was the owner of the ship Derwentdale; the respondents were consignees of the greater part of the cargo. The action was to recover damages from the respondents for detention of the ship. The charter-party provided that the ship was to proceed to London, that freight was to be paid on delivery of cargo, and contained various terms as to loading and demurrage, and a provision that the freighters' liability on the charter-party was to cease when the cargo was shipped (provided the same was worth the freight, dead freight and demurrage, on arrival at the port of discharge), the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, &c., at the port of discharge. The bills of lading contained no reference to the charter-party, and no express limit of time for discharging the cargo, but they did state that the goods were to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival and reporting at the Custom House; otherwise the master or agent was to be at liberty to put into lighters and land at the expense of the owners of goods, and that the master or agent was to have a lien on the goods for freight and payments, &c., as therein provided. The Derwentdale arrived at Millwall on the 14th of August, 1889, and the consignees, Raymond & Reid, duly demanded delivery of the cargo, and on the 16th of August and the two following days they sent barges to receive the cargo, which was being duly unloaded. On the 20th of August the dock labourers struck, on the 23rd the lightermen, and on the 26th the strike became general, and it lasted until the 16th of September, after which the unloading was proceeded with with all despatch, and completed on the 18th of September. Notwithstanding the strike, the ship's crew were able and willing to do such part of the unloading as had to be performed by the shipowners, who were in no default. Raymond & Reid, the consignees, did all they could under the circumstances.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mathew, J., held that, under the cesser clause of the charter-party, the freighters' (other defendants to the action) liability ceased upon the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge, but that the consignees (the present respondents) were liable for the loss occasioned by the detention of the vessel, as they had not discharged the vessel within a reasonable time. Raymond & Reid appealed, and the Court of Appeal held that the consignees under the above bill of lading were not liable to the shipowner under the above circumstances, as the reasonableness of the time is to be measured by the circumstances existing at the time of unloading. The shipowner appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Robson, Q.C. (Hollams with them), for the appellant.—The contract bound the respondents to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time, i.e., as is customary at the port of discharge. The owner of the goods must be taken to know the state of things at that port, and should provide the labour and appliances necessary. The consignees could have protected themselves against the consequences of a strike, but they did not, and they are liable for the non-delivery by their sub-contractors: Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., 4 Ex. D. 165, 27 W. R. Dig. 199; Admas v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 7 W. R. 9, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 492; Ford v. Cotesworth, 17 W. R. 282, 18 Ibid. 1169, L. R. 4 Q. B. 127, L. R. 5 Q. B. 544.

Taylor v. Great Northern Railway, L. R. 1 C. P. 385, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 21; Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 28 W. R. 833, 5 App. Cas. 599; Burmester v. Hodgson, 2 Camp. 488; Barker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 267; Hill v. Idle, 4 Camp. 327; Castlegate Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 40 W. R. 335, 533, [1892] 1 Q. B. 54, 854, were cited or referred to. [Good v. Isaacs, [1892] 2 Q. B. 555, was referred to by Lord HERSCHELL in the course of the argument for the appellant.]

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C., and Bucknill, Q.C. (Leck with them), for the respondents.—The delay was beyond the respondent's control, and therefore they are not responsible: Lord Blackburn in Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Co., 20 W. R. 724, L. R. 7 Q. B. 566; Hall v. Wright, 27 L. J. Q. B. 345, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 84; Taylor v. Great Northern Railway; Ford v. Cotesworth; Postlethwaite v. Freeland. The case has been decided in America in our favour: Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. Rep. (12 Smith's App. Cas.), 85.

Robson, Q.C., in reply.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 16.—Lord HERSCHELL, L.C.—This action was brought by the plaintiff, who is a shipowner, against the defendants, who were consignees and holders of the bills of lading of a cargo carried on board the plaintiff's steamship Derwentdale to recover damages for the detention of the vessel during her discharge at the port of London. By the bills of lading the cargo was to be delivered in good order and condition at the port of London. On the 14th of August, 1889, the vessel arrived in the Millwall Dock, and was reported to the Custom House. The discharge of the wheat, of which the cargo consisted, commenced on the 16th of August. On the 20th of August a strike of dock labourers began in the port of London, and some of the labourers engaged in the discharge of The Derwentdale then ceased to work. The next day the strike became general, and no work was done in the discharge of the vessel until the 16th of September, when it was recommenced and finished on the 18th. Evidence was given that apart from the strike the discharge of the vessel would have been completed in six days. The dock company were employed by the respondents to discharge the vessel. Only the trimming of the cargo was to be the work of the shipowner, otherwise the entire obligation to discharge the vessel rested on the consignees.

At the commencement of the trial, in the course of the discussion which took place as to whether the case should be heard with or without a jury, certain admissions were made by the learned counsel, and I think it well to state at the outset what I take to be the facts either proved or admitted. I think it must be taken that throughout the whole of the time during which the discharge ceased, and the dock company were unable to supply labour to effect it, it was not possible for the respondents either to find any other person to provide the labour or themselves to obtain the necessary labour in any other way. If the terms of the bills of lading had required the discharge to be effected in any particular number of days, it is quite clear that the burden of the delay caused by the difficulty of obtaining labour would have fallen upon them, and it would have been no answer to a charge that they had failed to fulfil their obligation, to say that the circumstances had rendered it impossible for them to do so. The bills of lading in the present case contained no such stipulation, and, therefore, in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time. The question is, Has the appellant proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied. The appellant's contention is, that inasmuch as the obligation to take discharge of the cargo, and to provide the necessary labour for that purpose, rested upon the respondents, the test is, what time would have been required for the discharge of the vessel under ordinary circumstances, and that, inasmuch as they have to provide the labour, they must be responsible if the discharge is delayed beyond that period. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the question is not what time would have been necessary or what time would have been reasonable under ordinary circumstances, but what time was reasonable under existing circumstances, assuming that, in so far as the existing circumstances were extraordinary, they were not due to any act or default on the part of the respondents.

There appears to me to be no direct authority upon the point, although there are judgments bearing on the subject to which I will presently call attention. I would observe, in the first place, that there is, of course, no such thing as a reasonable time in the abstract. It must always depend upon circumstances. Upon "the ordinary circumstances," say the learned counsel for the appellant. But what may without impropriety be termed the ordinary circumstances differ in particular ports at different times of the year. As regards the practicability of discharging a vessel they may differ in summer and winter. Again, weather increasing the difficulty of, though not preventing the discharge of a vessel, may continue for so long a period that it may justly be termed extraordinary. Could it be contended that in so far as it lasted beyond the ordinary period the delay caused by it was to be excluded in determining whether the cargo had been discharged within a reasonable time? It appears to me that the appellant's contention would involve constant difficulty and dispute, and that the only sound principle is that the "reasonable time" should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable despatch under those circumstances I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee. I think the balance of authority, both as regards the cases which relate to contracts by a consignee to take discharge, and those in which the question what is a reasonable time has had to be answered when analogous obligations were under consideration is distinctly in favour of the view taken by the court below. In Postlethwaite v. Freeland the law was stated by Lord Selborne thus:—"If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time; that is (as was said in Ford v. Coteswortb), a reasonable time under the circumstances." In the same case Lord Blackburn clearly indicated that this view of the law was, in his opinion, correct and in accordance with the current of previous authority; and he not only quoted with approval the law laid down in Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Co., that "a reasonable time" meant what was reasonable under the circumstances as distinguished from "the ordinary time," which it had been contended was the same thing as a reasonable time, but stated that in his opinion the law so laid down was applicable to the case then under consideration. It is true that in the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland the point which has now to be determined did not directly arise, inasmuch as in that case the charter-party contained the stipulation that the cargo was to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and I cannot agree with what appears to have been the view of Lord Blackburn, that this was necessarily the same as the implied obligation to discharge within a reasonable time. In that case it was proved that the mode of discharge customary in the port was by means of a warp and lighters, and that these were under the absolute control of a company to which the Government authorities had transferred all their powers, and that the company allowed vessels the use of the warp and lighters in turn. The result was that, owing to the presence of a considerable number of ships, the turn of the appellants' vessel did not come for a considerable time. It appears to me that, under the circumstances, the judgment was inevitable that the cargo had been discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port, and also that Postlethwaite v. Freeland cannot be taken as a decision concluding the question arising on this appeal. The dicta are undoubtedly of great weight, and I concur with the result at which Lord Blackburn arrived, that so far as there was prior authority it pointed in the direction of the view adopted in the present case by the Court of Appeal. Lord Blackburn excepted the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., regarding the decision there as conflicting with that of the Court of Appeal in Postlethwaite v. Freeland. Now it is to be observed that Thesiger, L.J., who had been a party to the judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., was also a party to the decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland in the Court of Appeal. He manifestly did not intent to lay down the law differently in the two cases, nor do I think there is any necessary conflict between them, although, no doubt, expressions are to be found in the judgments in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. which favour the contention of the appellant in the present case. Cotton, L.J., in his judgment in that case in terms says that he will not attempt to lay down an exhaustive rule, but will speak chiefly with reference to the case then before the court. The facts there were that the cargo was to be delivered into lighters alongside or at the wharf, as charterers' agents might direct, no time being fixed within which the discharge was to take place. At the port of discharge there were only two firms of lightermen for discharging cargoes, one of which worked solely for the defendants, the charterers, and the captain was compelled to employ this firm alone to discharge the vessel. At the time when the vessel arrived the port was usually crowded by a "rush" of vessels, and about twenty vessels were lying there, of which one half either belonged to or were chartered by the defendants. The number of lighters was small, and it was proved that after the arrival of the vessel preference in discharging cargoes was shown to vessels with "round" charters. The learned judge who tried the case, in summing up, told the jury that they were to take into consideration the circumstance that the port was full of vessels, but he did not directly tell them not to consider the deficiency of lighters caused by the large number of ships so far as that state of things had been produced by the defendants themselves; nor did he tell them that the defendants were bound to provide the means of unloading within a reasonable time; nor that they were bound to allot the lighters proportionately among the vessels or to use the lighters for them in the order in which they arrived. The jury found in favour of the defendants, and the appeal was against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a new trial. It will thus be seen that the circumstances which prevented the vessel being loaded within the ordinary time were not beyond the control of the defendants. It was not shown that they could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have provided the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier and so have avoided the delay which took place. Under these circumstances I think the decision was perfectly right and a new trial properly granted.

In my opinion the cases referred to by the appellant's counsel, in which it has been held that there was a breach of the obligation on the part of a charterer to supply a cargo, do not involve the assertion of any doctrine in conflict with that which has been laid down in the present case by the Court of Appeal. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was correct, and ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—Although the question raised in this appeal is submitted for the first time to the determination of an English court the principles which must govern its decision are as old as the law of contract. When the language of a contract does not expressly or by necessary implication fix any term for the performance of a contractual obligation, the law implies that it shall be performed within a reasonable time. The rule is of universal application, and is not confined to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. In the case of other contracts the condition of reasonable time has been frequently interpreted, and has invariably been held to mean that the party upon whom it is incumbent duly fulfils his obligation, notwithstanding protracted delay, so long as such delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has neither acted negligently nor unreasonably. In the face of the admission given by him at the trial, it is in vain for the appellant to suggest that the delay which occurred in unloading The Derwentdale's cargo was owing to causes under the respondents' control, or to their failure to do anything which could possibly or reasonably have been done in order to avoid that delay. In that state of the law and of the facts it is, in my opinion, impossible that the appellant can prevail unless he is able to show that the rule as administered in the case of other contracts, is subject, when the contract is constituted by bill of lading, to this singular exception—that the owner of the goods must be held to have acted unreasonably, and to be liable for the delay, whenever the operation of unloading is stopped by an unforeseen obstacle which he did nothing to create and is powerless to remove. A proposition of that character requires some authority to support it, but none has been produced. In none of the cases cited at the bar does it appear to me that the point now raised was present to the minds of the learned judges. But it is sufficient for the purpose of this appeal that while nothing was said in any of them which in the least lends countenance to the proposition maintained by the appellant, much was said pointing in an opposite direction. These cases, in so far as they were relied on by the appellant as authorities in his favour, have been carefully examined in the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend, to whose reasons for affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal I have really nothing to add.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—The question raised in this appeal is important, and is up to this, not covered by any express authority. Having regard to the admissions of the parties, the sole question is, Who is to bear the loss caused by the strike? Who is to bear the risk of the strike assuming each party to be innocent, that each party did what he could, and that the happening of the strike was entirely beyond and outside the control of either? The contract not naming any time for unloading, the obligation of the defendants was to unload within the time implied by law, that is, a reasonable time. What is the meaning of this expression "reasonable time"? It is obvious that "reasonable" cannot mean a definite and fixed time. It would not be "reasonable" if it was not sufficiently elastic to allow the consideration of circumstances, which all reason would require to be taken into account. The appellant accordingly admits that the consignee has a right to have all ordinary circumstances taken into account, but insist that all extraordinary circumstances are to be excluded from consideration. Is this distinction sound, and does it rest upon any real principle? If the consignee does all he can, is not his conduct reasonable? If by circumstances absolutely outside his control he can do nothing, is his inaction unreasonable? If it is reasonable to consider some circumstances outside his control in favour of the consignee, why are not all circumstances in the events which actually happen, and which he cannot control, also to be taken in account? In considering how to ascertain "reasonable time," must not the question come in, whether the consignee in the circumstances which eventuated acted unreasonably? If throughout the consignee acted reasonably, if he did all he could, if he omitted nothing that he should have done, why should all the circumstances be arbitrarily divided into ordinary and extraordinary for the purpose of putting a narrow and artificial meaning upon the words "reasonable time"? Unless lex cogit ad impossibilia, I think when the parties have used a form of contract, which names no day, and leaves the discharge of the cargo to be made within the reasonable time implied by law, that reasonable time should be ascertained by a consideration of all circumstances which eventually happen and which are outside the control of the consignee.

It is somewhat strange that this important question has not heretofore been clearly and finally settled by direct authority; and it is manifest, from the arguments addressed to your lordships, that the decisions in somewhat similar cases are conflicting, and the opinions of eminent judges would appear not to harmonize. The particular point involved in this appeal has never, I believe, been expressly discussed or decided, although the decisions which have been referred to deal with topics and considerations most apposite to the case before your lordships. The case of Ford v. Cotesworth is worthy of attention. The contract was silent as to time, and therefore the freighter was bound to unload within a reasonable time. Owing to threats of bombardment the cargo could not be landed in the usual time, and it was held that the charterer was not liable for the delivery. Cockburn, C.J., in his summing up said: "There would be a point of law whether this case was to be decided with reference to the ordinary state of things at the port or whether any extraordinary circumstances that prevented the unloading might be taken into account." The questions left to the jury were, whether, looking to the ordinary state of things at the port, there was any unreasonable delay; whether, looking to the extraordinary circumstances, there was any unreasonable delay; whether there was any delay caused by political circumstances over which the consignees had no control; was any delay caused by the default of the consignees; and to contingently assess the damages for the time during which the ship was kept at her berth doing nothing by the action of the Government of the place and the threats of bombardment. The jury, in answer to the first two questions, found that there had been no unreasonable delay, and they assessed the damage, if any was to be allowed. The plaintiff applied to the Queen's Bench to enter the verdict for him, and that court held that the contract implied by law was that each party would use reasonable diligence in performing their part of the delivery, which by the custom of the port fell upon him; and that there was no implied contract that the discharge should be performed in the time usually taken at the port. Blackburn, J., in pronouncing the judgment of the court said: "We are aware of no authority for saying that the law implies a contract to discharge in the usual time, except what is said in Burmester v. Hodgson, in which case it was not necessary for the decision. We think that the contract which the law implies is only that the merchant and shipowners should each use reasonable despatch in performing his part. That such was the opinion of Lord Tenterden appears to be implied from his ruling in Rogers v. Hunter, 1 Moo. & M. 63, as to what was the obligation of the holder of a bill of lading. If this be so, the delay having happened without fault on either side, and neither having undertaken by contract, express or implied, that there should be no delay, the loss must remain where it falls." The Exchequer Chamber also, on appeal, upheld the verdict for the defendant. Martin, B., in giving judgment, said: "I am not aware of any case which goes to impose by mere implication of law, without any stipulation whatever, so unreasonable a liability as that which the plaintiffs seek to impose on the defendants, that they are to be answerable for the delay caused by vis major."

Ten years later, in the year 1878, came the case of Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Co., which has been so much relied on by the appellant. There the charter-party was silent as to time, and, therefore, it was implied that the ship should be unloaded within a reasonable time. Lord Bramwell said: "A reasonable time for doing an act is a time within which it may be done by a person working reasonably"; and Thesiger, L.J., said: "A reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances." The case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland followed, and is most important in consequence of many of the dicta, although the precise point involved in this case did not actually arise. The Earl of Selborne, in giving judgment in the House of Lords, said: "If there is no time fixed, the law implies an agreement to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Blackburn, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth, within a reasonable time under all the circumstances." Lord Blackburn's own judgment in this case is the strongest decision in favour of the contention relied on by the respondents, and presents the topics against the appellant's contention with great force.

These cases and others cited during the argument show that there is a conflict of judicial opinion on the questions involved, but in my opinion the preponderance of authority and reasoning is against the appellant. Besides, the authorities by way of analogy (as forcibly pointed out by Fry, L.J.) are also against the appellant, and in favour of the view that reasonable time must be determined by reference to the actual events which occur. In the case of Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Co. it was held that a common carrier was only bound to carry within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case. Erle, C.J., says plainly, "I take reasonable time to mean a time within which a carrier can deliver, using all reasonable exertions." The case of Hall v. Wright also shows an effort to apply a liberal construction of "reasonable time" in an action of breach of promise of marriage. And the American case of Cross v. Beard, decided thirty years ago, shows that a breach in a canal and a storm on a lake were taken into account in measuring what was reasonable time.

But it is not upon analogies or upon conflicting authorities alone that the decision of your lordships can rest, although they are most valuable and important to elucidate the position. Principle and reason, in my opinion, alike oppose the contention of the appellant. It is somewhat hard to make either party suffer, but there is no help for it. It must be remembered that there are forms of bills of lading which expressly name strikes and such contingencies, and cast the responsibility upon the consignees. If the shipowner wishes the merchant to be answerable for such events he must stipulate for it expressly. It is no doubt hard on the shipowner in this case, but I do not apprehend any disturbance in mercantile contracts, as parties can readily, if they please, change the terms of future contracts, and prevent the possibility of misunderstanding or surprise. On the grounds that I have referred to I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Lords MORRIS and FIELD concurred.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Downing, Holman, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lowless & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 16, 17, 21, 22.
Chitty, J. }

PECK AND THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Open contract—Form of conveyance—General words—Right of way—Reputed occupied or enjoyed—No special provision in contract—Right to limit general words—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6 (1) (2) (4).

Under an open contract for the sale of land with the appurtenances, the purchaser is only entitled to have such general words expressed or implied in his conveyance as he would have been entitled to before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, came into operation; and if the general words implied by section 6 of that Act are more extensive, the vendor is entitled to limit them accordingly.

Section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, does not apply to contracts.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

The school board, in exercise of their compulsory powers, gave the vendors notice to treat for "the land and premises in the schedule with the appurtenants." The vendor had used a way from the premises purchased to a gate in a main road over a piece of waste land belonging to him. It was neither a way of necessity, nor a made or metalled road, but there was sufficient user for it to have passed under such general words as "ways appertaining or reputed to appertain to, or at the time of conveyance occupied or enjoyed with or reputed or known as appurtenant to," the lands sold. The vendor, who did not wish to grant any such way, claimed a right to limit the above general words which would be implied by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (1) (2); but the school board contended that they were entitled to the implied general words in full. This summons was accordingly taken out to settle the form of conveyance.

Byrne, Q.C., and Whiteway, for the school board.—We do not ask the court to determine the question of right now, but only to say what form of conveyance we are entitled to under the contract. In the absence of express stipulation we are entitled to a simple conveyance without any exceptions. We are in fact entitled to the same form of conveyance that we should have got before the Conveyancing Act, or at the very least to a conveyance following the exact words of the contract.

Farwell, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the vendors.—A simple conveyance would pass this way under the general words implied by the Conveyancing Act. The school board have not included it in their notice to treat, though they have power to purchase easements. We have a right to limit the general words under section 6 (4) so as to avoid any question of implied grant. Before the Conveyancing Act a contract to purchase land "with the appurtenances" or "with all ways thereunto appertaining" did not carry a right of way over another tenement of the grantor: Bolton v. Bolton, 11 Ch. D. 968, 27 W. R. Dig. 230. The Conveyancing Act was not intended to alter the construction of contracts, but only to shorten conveyances. Its application is entirely limited to conveyances.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—Bolton v. Bolton is practically overruled by Sir Edward Fry's dictum in Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 Ch. D. 434, 457, 32 W. R. Dig. 227.

See also Barkshire v. Grubb, 29 W. R. 929, 18 Ch. D. 616.

CHITTY, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The school board contend that they are entitled to have included in their conveyance all the general words implied by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6—i.e., that the vendor is not entitled to insert anything to exclude any of such words from the conveyance. The argument of the school board properly understood is really an argument that this section has altered contracts and the rights that flow from them. It is my clear opinion that it has done nothing of the kind. Its object is to show what general words will be taken as included in a conveyance of land or houses where the conveyance is silent on the point. It is the conveyance alone with which the Legislature is dealing, not the contract. Neither party is entitled to have words included in the conveyance unless those words are justified by the contract. As the section itself states (sub-section 4), it applies "only if and so far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the conveyance," and it has effect "subject to the terms of the conveyance and to the provisions therein contained." The main object of the section was to shorten conveyances. Words included in sub-sections 1 and 2 were, with variations, in general use among conveyancers before the Act was passed, and the Legislature, thinking such words appropriate to the majority of cases, enacted that a conveyance should be deemed to include them in the absence of a contrary intention expressed in the conveyance. It has done nothing more than this.

On examining the words of sub-sections 1 and 2 I find as to "ways" language used which conveys "ways appertaining or reputed to appertain to" the land or premises conveyed, or "at the time of conveyance occupied or enjoyed with, or reputed or known as appurtenant to," the same. On the authorities there is no question that such words would pass a way not existing as of right, but de facto enjoyed at the time of conveyance. It is quite unnecessary to cite any authority for that proposition. The school board have declined to go into evidence. They are quite right in saying that the court has not to decide what right ought to pass, but what are the appropriate words to be inserted in the conveyance. It is plain, however, that they are aiming at obtaining a grant of this right of way. The vendor rightly says that the board have not exercised their power to buy any such easement, and that he is entitled to be protected against the insertion in the conveyance of anything which might operate as an express grant, or otherwise carry this right of way. There is no question but that the vendor would be in a worse position if the words of section 6 were allowed to remain. Now the notice to treat contained the word "appurtenances" and no other general words. In the statutory form in the schedule to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), the general words run "together with all ways, rights, and appurtenances thereto belonging." Such form is permissive only, and the school board are not bound to take their conveyance in that form, but the form gives an indication on the part of the Legislature of what ought to pass where there are no special words in the contract or notice to treat. I will mention two authorities. In Bolton v. Bolton the contract for sale did not contain any words with regard to the right of way, and Sir Edward Fry said: "In my view, therefore, the contract was for the conveyance of the premises with all that was appurtenant or appendant to them, and nothing more." And he held that the purchasers were not entitled to a special grant of the right of way, and settled the general words accordingly. That case was decided before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, but that Act has made no difference to the decision, which is, therefore, an authority for the case before me. It is a stronger authority than is required, because in that case there were two made roads, whereas here there is no made road or anything in the nature of a made road. Barkshire v. Grubb was another case of construction of the agreement, and the court had regard to the circumstance that at the date of the contract a gravel path was actually used as a mode of access. That decision was on the special words of the contract and the circumstances of the case, and it is no authority as regards my present decision.

In the result I must take care that the general words inserted or implied will give the school board their rights under the contract, and protect the vendor against granting more than was agreed upon or paid for. In my opinion it is necessary to exclude the operation of section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, altogether, and then the right form will practically follow that in the schedule to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The purchasers may amplify it if they desire, but within proper limits. Substantially I hold that, the Conveyancing Act being excluded, words carrying "appurtenances" will carry all that the school board are entitled to. They must not have the words "reputed" or "enjoyed."

It has been argued that in Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co. Sir Edward Fry overruled his decision in Bolton v. Bolton. I do not think that is the effect of anything the judge uttered. He said that where there was a made and visible road probably the mere grant of the land itself, without general words, would carry the right of way. If that is correct, as to which I express no opinion, nor did Sir Edward Fry state it as law, the words inserted will still give the school board the benefit of the dictum if they can prevail on any court to adopt it in reference to the state of this property and the surrounding circumstances at the time of the grant. I propose not to encourage the school board to raise the question, and it is no part of my duty to discourage them.

Solicitors for the school board, C. E. Mortimer.

Solicitors for the vendor, Crowders & Vizard.

Chan. Div. }
Romer, J. } Dec. 13, 14, 17.

HUNTER v. DOWLING. (a.)

Partnership—Death of partner—Share of partner dying to be determined by last signed yearly account—Death after expiration of partnership year, but before taking of account for that year completed.

Under a deed of partnership it was provided that the partnership accounts should be taken and signed by the partners at the end of each partnership year, or as near thereto as conveniently might be, and that the share of a partner dying should be determined by reference to the last signed yearly account prior to his death. A partner died shortly after the expiration of a partnership year, but before the taking of the account for that year had been completed. The yearly accounts had been, according to the practice of the firm, taken somewhat later in the year than the date of his death.

Held, that the surviving partners were not entitled to have his share determined by reference to the last signed yearly account, but that the account for the partnership year immediately preceding his death must be taken, and his share determined thereby.

Semble, it would not have made any difference if, in fact, the taking of the accounts for the partnership year immediately preceding his death could not have been completed in his lifetime.

Trial of action.

A partnership deed dated the 31st of March, 1884, between Edmund Dowling, Edwin Skelton Pinchin, Edward Arthur Johnson, and Charles Edward Dowling, under which those four persons carried on business as oil and colour merchants, contained the following provisions:—

"15. On the 31st day of March in each year during the continuance of the partnership, or as near thereto as conveniently may be, a general account shall be taken of the assets and liabilities of the partnership, and of all dealings and transactions of the partnership during the then preceding year, and of all matters and things usually comprehended in accounts of a like nature taken by persons engaged in a like business, and in taking such account a just valuation shall be made of all items requiring valuation, together with an estimate of all doubtful and bad debts; and in the general yearly account so to be taken there shall from time to time be made a balance-sheet, and the said balance-sheet shall be signed by all the partners in testimony of their approbation thereof, and the accounts to be so made and signed shall not afterwards be called in question, opened, or in any manner contravened after such yearly settlement as aforesaid."

"23.—If any partner shall retire under the provisions hereinbefore contained, or shall die during the continuance of the partnership, the remaining or surviving partners shall (but subject in respect of a partner so dying to the power hereinbefore contained of bequeathing his share and interest in the partnership) accept and take in the shares and proportions to which they shall at the time of such retirement or decease be interested in the profits of the partnership business, all the share and interest of the partner so retiring or dying in the capital of the business, and the share of the profits of the partner so retiring or dying, and the amount of the share and interest of the partner so retiring or dying shall be taken at the amount appearing as standing to his credit in the last annual balance-sheet which shall have been signed previously to the date of such retirement or death, addition being made thereto on account of the proportion of profits which shall have accrued due to such partner since the last annual account according to the average amount of profits during the three years preceding the last annual account if so many years shall have elapsed, and if so many years shall not have elapsed according to the average amount of profits during so many years as shall have elapsed."

The partnership deed contained also a clause for reference to arbitration of any dispute touching the policy, articles, or any clause or thing therein contained.

The annual account for each year ending on the 31st of March was taken, not on that day, but about the end of April. This was done until April, 1890. In the account then taken a value was placed on certain leasehold premises of the partnership at Hammersmith, but not on other leasehold premises of the partnership at St. George's-in-the-East.

On the 16th of June, 1890, notice to treat for part of the premises at St. George's-in-the-East was served on the partnership by the London and Blackwall Railway Co. In August, 1890, notice was served on the railway company by the partnership, requiring the company to take all those premises, which notice was acceded to by the company, and in December, 1890, a claim was made by the partnership on the company for £28,000. Negotiations ensued, which were not concluded at the death of E. A. Johnson on the 10th of April, 1891. E. A. Johnson's will, appointing the plaintiff, Hunter, his executor, was proved on the 6th of July, 1891. The negotiations, continued after E. A. Johnson's death, finally resulted in the purchase by the railway company of the whole of the premises at St. George's-in-the-East for £19,000.

The account for the year ending the 31st of March, 1891, was not taken in E. A. Johnson's lifetime, but the judge held that it might have been so taken.

This was an action by E. A. Johnson's executor, the plaintiff Hunter, against the surviving partners, for an account of the partnership dealings up to the 31st of March, 1891, and to have E. A. Johnson's share in the partnership assets ascertained, including in such assets the sum of £19,000, the purchase-money for the St. George's-in-the-East premises.

Neville, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff's right to have an account taken to the 31st of March, 1891, is not affected by the fact that E. A. Johnson died before the account was actually taken or signed: Pettyt v. Janeson, 6 Madd. 146. To ascertain the rights of the parties on the last signed account would exclude the plaintiff from sharing in the purchase-money of the premises taken by the railway company, which would be unfair to him, and was certainly not the intention of the partners.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., and Stone, for the defendants.—When E. A. Johnson died the last signed account was that for the year ending the 31st of March, 1890, and the plaintiff is bound thereby under the partnership deed. Regard must be had to the uniform practice of the partnership as to taking its accounts, and the plaintiff cannot go behind the last account made out in accordance with such practice: Ex parte Barber, 18 W. R. 940, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 667. The partners are bound by the uniform practice as to taking the accounts, even though inconsistent with the partnership deed: Coventry v. Barclay, 12 W. R. 500, 3 De G. J. & S. 320.

ROMER, J.—The principal clauses in the partnership deed on which the questions depend are those numbered 15 and 23.

As to clause 15, I think it provides that on the completion of a partnership year the accounts shall be taken for that year and signed. The partnership year as indicated by the clause and by the practice of the firm was to end on the 31st of March. The words with which the clause commences: "On the 31st of March in each year during the continuance of the partnership, or as near thereto as conveniently may be," I think merely indicate what would have been obviously the meaning without them, that the taking of the account might not be, in practice, completed on the 31st of March, but shortly afterwards. But evidently, under the clause, the account was to be taken as up to the end of each completed year. This appears from the whole tenour of the clause, and particularly from the words "during the then preceding year." On the completion of a partnership year I think the parties were bound and entitled to have the account for that year taken, and not the less because afterwards one or more of the parties might die. The clause also provides that the account when taken is to be signed. Of course, that means if it can be signed. The fact that when taken it might not be capable of being signed by reason of the death or physical inability to sign of one partner would not prevent the necessity of the account being taken as between the persons interested.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This being, in my opinion, the meaning of clause 15, I now turn to clause 23. The words in that clause, with reference to the annual balance-sheet, "which shall have been signed previously to the date of such retirement or death," are, I think, descriptive, and are used with reference to clause 15, providing that the accounts of each completed year should be taken and signed; and, as I have pointed out, by that clause the parties were bound to take and sign the account for that year if it was completed. I think that clause 23 refers to the annual sheet as signed, because clause 15 provides for that being done, and that clause 23 contemplates what was to be done as having been done. I think this is borne out by the subsequent words in clause 23, referring to the "last annual account" as being synonymous with the "annual balance-sheet which shall have been signed previously to the date of such retirement or death." The authorities, in fact, show that in clauses like clause 23 the absolute signing is not essential, nor is, indeed, the absolute taking of the account essential, if the account, according to the articles, ought to have been taken and signed. Indeed, the defendant's counsel did not dispute this proposition generally, but based their case on what appears to me a somewhat startling proposition—namely, that in cases of this kind if the partner dies so soon after the account day that the account up to that time could not with reasonable speed be taken in the meantime, then not that account but the immediately preceding account governs the relations of the parties. No authority was cited in support of this. I think it would operate unfairly and lead to manifest inconveniences, not the least of which would be the necessity of inquiry in each case whether the account could or could not be reasonably made up in so many days. Nor do I think that this is the true meaning of clauses of this kind. I think they really mean—in the absence of something special to the contrary, which does not exist in the present case—that when a partner dies after an account day, then the account taken or to be taken on that day is the one that governs the rights of the parties. I do not think it necessary that the partner should have survived the day when the account was in fact completed, or that his representatives must show that it might have been completed before he died.

It is to be borne in mind that there is no difficulty in taking the account as to the past year, though one partner may have died since its expiration and before the account is actually completed. I may add that in the present case, if the fact be really material, which in my view it is not, I am of opinion, notwithstanding Mr. Dowling's evidence, that the account could in fact have been taken and signed between the 31st of March and the date of Mr. Johnson's death, though I agree that in the ordinary course the parties probably would have taken some time longer. Coming, therefore, to the conclusion at which I arrive, that the account to be taken as on the 31st of March, 1891, is that which governs the rights of the parties, it is clear that under the circumstances I must make a declaration that an account ought to be taken as provided for by clause 15 of the articles up to the 31st of March, 1891.

With regard to the special point in dispute, it is clear that on the 31st of March, 1891, the leaseholds in question were, at any rate to some extent, valuable, and they ought, therefore, to be valued as an asset, and not the less because in the accounts of the 31st of March, 1890, when the leaseholds were not valuable, or, at any rate, were not considered valuable, they were not valued. There is no practice of the partnership that leaseholds should not be valued; on the contrary, some leaseholds of the firm were valued in the other accounts. This particular lease was only granted on the 24th of June, 1889, and the fact that it was not valued on one occasion cannot establish a principle that under no change of circumstances was it to be valued if it became valuable. I shall make a further declaration that in taking the accounts the leaseholds in question ought to be valued as of their value on the 31st of March, 1891. As to what value will be put on this leasehold in question I say nothing. I do not wish to prejudice the arbitrators in any way.

Solicitors, Hunter & Davies; Stones, Morris, & Stone.

Q. B. Div. (Lawrance and Collins, JJ.) — Feb. 7.

CLEARY, Appellant.
BOOTH, Respondent. (a.)

Elementary education—Board school master—Authority to inflict punishment—Offence committed by pupil off the school premises.

The authority of the master of a board school to punish pupils attending the school is not limited to acts of misconduct committed by them on the school premises.

Special case stated by justices for the borough and county of Southampton.

At a court of summary jurisdiction held at Southampton on the 19th of September, 1892, an information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant charging him with unlawfully assaulting and beating the respondent. The appellant was the head master of a board school at Southampton, and the respondent was a pupil at that school. On the 15th of September, 1892, the appellant inflicted corporal punishment on the respondent for an act of misconduct alleged to have been committed by the respondent in relation to another pupil of the same school whilst they were on their way from their homes to the school. The appellant was convicted and fined, subject to this case.

The questions for the court were:—(1) Whether the appellant was justified in punishing the respondent for an offence not committed on the school premises; (2) whether, if the appellant was so justified, the punishment inflicted was excessive.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Poland, Q.C. (P. H. White with him), for the appellant, contended that the authority of a schoolmaster to inflict punishment on a pupil was the same as that of a parent; that the punishment must be reasonable, and that the schoolmaster's authority to punish was not limited to acts committed by pupils on the school premises.

The Education Code of 1892 was referred to, and the following cases were cited:—Reg. v. Hopley, 2 F. & F. 202; Fitzgerald v. Northcote, 4 F. & F. 656; Hunter v. Johnson, 32 W. R. 857, 13 Q. B. D. 225.

The respondent did not appear.

LAWRANCE, J.—The question in this case is whether the head master of a board school has power to administer corporal punishment to a pupil for something done by the pupil outside the school premises. The question is not an easy one, because there is no authority directly in point, and the case is, therefore, one of first impression. The cases cited in argument show that a schoolmaster is in the position of a parent; but the question we have to decide is which of the two, parent or master, is to take notice of acts of misconduct committed by a boy on his way from his home to school. I should have thought that a power to act in such cases was amongst the powers delegated by the parent to the schoolmaster. If the Education Code of 1892 is looked at, we find that a grant is given to board schools for organization and discipline, and care is to be taken by the master in the management of the school "to bring up the children in habits of punctuality, of good manners and language, of cleanliness and neatness, and also to impress upon the children the importance of cheerful obedience to duty, of consideration and respect for others, and of honour and truthfulness in word and act." Can it be said, having regard to the duties imposed upon a board school master by this code, that the master's authority is limited to acts done in school, and that he has exceeded the authority delegated to him by the parent if he punishes a boy who is guilty of gross misbehaviour immediately after leaving the school premises? It is difficult to express in words the extent of the schoolmaster's authority in respect of the punishment of his pupils, but in my opinion his authority extends not only to acts done in school, but also to cases where a complaint of acts done out of school is made to the schoolmaster. In the present case it may also be borne in mind that the act for which the boy was punished was done to another pupil of the same school. I therefore come to the conclusion that the conviction was wrong, and the case must be sent back to the justices for them to find as a fact whether the punishment was excessive.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear law that a father may administer reasonable chastisement to his child, and it is equally clear, and in accordance with ancient practice, that the father may delegate this right to a schoolmaster. The question is, how far does the delegated authority of the schoolmaster extend? Is it limited to the four walls of the school, or does it extend in any sense beyond that limit? In my opinion it is impossible to deny that a schoolmaster's authority over a pupil must to some extent include an authority over the pupil when he is off the school premises, though it is a question of fact in each case whether the schoolmaster's authority has been exceeded. It would be impossible for a master of a day-school to carry on his duties if the parent's authority over the pupils extended up to the school door, and that the schoolmaster's authority only then commenced. Further, it is clearly contemplated by the code to which my learned brother has referred that the duties of the master of a board school are not confined to teaching; he is also entrusted with the moral training of his pupils, for which purpose it must be necessary for him to have some control over them out of school. In my opinion parents contemplate such an exercise of authority by the schoolmaster as has occurred in the present case, and I am satisfied that this schoolmaster acted within his delegated authority in punishing the pupil.

The question whether the punishment inflicted was, in fact, excessive is one for the justices.

Case remitted.

Solicitors for the appellant, Baker & Nairne.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.) Feb. 4.

PENN, Appellant.
ALEXANDER, Respondent. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Sale during prohibited hours—"Bonâ fide traveller"—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 9.

The appellant, a licensed victualler, was charged with permitting his licensed premises to be open for the sale of refreshment during prohibited hours—namely, on a Sunday morning before 12.30 p.m. The justices found that many of the persons served by the appellant were residents in, and had come from, a neighbouring town a little more than three miles distant, in order to obtain beer at the appellant's premises; that they were not bonâ fide travellers within section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, and that the appellant did not truly believe them to be bonâ fide travellers; and the appellant was convicted and fined.

Held, by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Day, and Collins, JJ. (Cave, J., dissenting), that, on the evidence in the case, the conviction was right.

Special case stated by justices at quarter sessions for the county of Northampton.

The appellant, who was a licensed victualler, and the occupier of the "White Lion" beerhouse, Little Houghton, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction under the Licensing Act, 1874, for opening his premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours on Sunday, the 10th of April, 1892.

The appellant appealed to the court of quarter sessions, when the conviction was affirmed, subject to this case.

The facts of the case were as follows:—On Sunday, April 10, two policemen watched the appellant's premises from 10.44 a.m. to 11.20 a.m., and during that time they saw eighty-five persons enter the appellant's yard, and seventy-four leave, all of whom, except eight persons, went towards Northampton. The policemen entered the appellant's yard and found about fifty-seven men there, some of whom were drinking beer. In the yard tables were spread on tressels and provided with forms, and on the tables were jugs containing beer. The tables and forms were not set out in the yard on weekdays. The appellant explained that Sunday travellers were only allowed to use the yard, and not the house, and that they entered the yard by a side gate, because when the front door had been used travellers standing about the door caused a block in the highway. It was proved or admitted that, with the exception of four or five persons, all the 131 persons who were on the appellant's premises during the time mentioned were artisans, and had come from Northampton, which was 3¼ to 3½ miles off, and returned, or were returning, after taking beer and other refreshment. There was no evidence that any of the persons had stayed in the yard an unreasonable time or had too much to drink, and they all left in a quiet and orderly manner. The appellant and his son were called as witnesses, and proved that many of the persons were known to them as artisans from Northampton; that before anyone was served he was asked where he had come from, and where he had slept the previous night; and that no one was allowed to have more than one pint of beer or to be served more than once. The appellant admitted that two extra waiters were employed by him on Sundays to attend to customers.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The court of quarter sessions came to the conclusion that many of the persons had left their homes at Northampton in order to get some beer at Little Houghton, as they could not be served at Northampton, and the court were of opinion that such persons were not bonâ fide travellers, and the court were not satisfied that under the circumstances the appellant truly believed that all the persons were bonâ fide travellers.

[The case was first argued before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J., and as they were unable to agree in their decision, the case was ordered to be reargued before a court of five judges.]

Poland, Q.C., and Sills, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. The persons found on the appellant's premises were bonâ fide travellers. They had come from a place more than three miles off, and there is nothing in the evidence to show that their object was solely to obtain beer. It is equally consistent with their conduct that their object was a walk in the country. The appellant did everything in his power to ascertain whether they were bonâ fide travellers, and took precautions to prevent anyone from obtaining too much drink or stopping too long on the premises. The number of persons found on the premises is not large having regard to the population of Northampton.

They cited Atkinson v. Sellers, 28 L. J. M. C. 12, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 53; Taylor v. Humphries, 9 W. R. 705; s. c., 13 W. R. 136; Peplow v. Richardson, 17 W. R. 410, L. R. 4 C. P. 168; Oldham v. Sheasby, 60 L. J. M. C. 81, 40 W. R. Dig. 124; Cowap v. Atherton, ante, p. 158, [1893] 1 Q. B. 49.

Lloyd, Q.C., and Attenborough, for the respondent, were not called on.

COLLINS, J.—In this case the magistrates have found that these persons were not bonâ fide travellers, and that the appellant did not in fact believe them to be so. I am of opinion that these findings were right. Whether a man is a bonâ fide traveller or not is a question of fact, and it is obvious from the words of section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, that the mere fact of a man's having travelled three miles is not of itself sufficient to constitute him a bonâ fide traveller. What, then, is the test by which the question may be determined? The test is, what is the object of the journey? If it is for business or pleasure, then it is bonâ fide travelling. But if the form of pleasure, which constitutes the object of the journey, is to obtain beer, then it is not bonâ fide. The magistrates have found that that was the case here, and I think their finding was right. As to the question whether the appellant really believed that these men were bonâ fide travellers, the evidence shows that he could not have believed that, but must have drawn the inference that they came solely for the purpose of obtaining beer.

DAY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CAVE, J.—I regret that I am compelled to differ from the rest of the court. I have not thought it necessary to hear the arguments for the respondent, because I have on a former occasion heard the arguments on both sides.

The question is whether there is any evidence on which the appellant ought to have been convicted. In section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, the term "bonâ fide traveller" is not defined. There have been decisions on the earlier Acts as to what is a traveller, and it has been laid down that a traveller is one who travels either for business or pleasure. There is no doubt that these persons were travellers in that sense, but the question is whether they were bonâ fide travellers. I agree that the answer to that question depends on the object with which these persons went out. Was their main purpose to obtain drink, or was it to indulge in a country walk? The Act says that a person shall not be deemed to be a bonâ fide traveller unless he has travelled three miles from the place where he lodged the previous night. These persons had travelled three miles, and therefore there is nothing in the Act preventing them from being bonâ fide travellers, but on the other hand there is nothing in the Act which says that they shall be. This is a criminal case, and before a conviction is obtained the case in support of it ought to be satisfactorily made out. There is evidence here that these persons did not stay at the public-house an unreasonable length of time, and that they did not have too much to drink. But the fact which seems to have caused the magistrates to consider that they were not bonâ fide travellers was that such a large number of persons should have stopped at this village, which was just outside the three mile limit, and did not proceed any further. That fact, however, does not satisfy my mind that their main object was to get beer. I can well understand that large numbers of persons living all the week in a country town should like a country walk on Sunday morning. The time of day was the natural time for people in their position of life to indulge in a country walk, and their conduct was consistent with that being their object. Then, as to the question of the reasonable grounds of the appellant's belief in the bona fides of these persons, it must be remembered that he is bound to serve bonâ fide travellers, and he ought not to be convicted solely because he was rather too easily convinced as to their bona fides. It seems to me that this man could not have been expected to do more than he did, he asked each man where he had come from and where he had slept the night before. Supposing he had asked what was their object in leaving Northampton, is it not probable that the answer would have been—for a country walk?

I am of opinion that not only is there no evidence that these persons were not bonâ fide travellers, but also that under the circumstances the appellant had no grounds for believing that they were not bonâ fide travellers, and ought not to have been convicted.

HAWKINS, J.—I concur in the judgment which the Lord Chief Justice is about to deliver, and have nothing to add.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question for the court in this case is simply one of interpretation of the statute, and of applying it to the facts of the case. The only observation which I desire to make on section 9 of the Act is that it is a negative section, it does not say who is a bonâ fide traveller, but only says who is not. [His lordship stated the facts and continued:] The magistrates had all the circumstances before them, and they found that these persons were not bonâ fide travellers, but had gone to the appellant's inn solely for the purpose of obtaining beer. In my opinion it is impossible to say that there is no evidence to support that finding. There appears to have been a regular system for persons to leave Northampton during closing hours and to go into the country in order to obtain that beer which they could not get in the town. I say that that is not bonâ fide travelling. It is impossible for anyone to be ignorant that this system prevails in the neighbourhood of most large towns, and I have not the slightest doubt that it is contrary to the law. Further, the case is governed by authority. In Taylor v. Humphries, in the year 1864, Erle, C.J., 13 W. R., at p. 137, said, "We think that a person would be a traveller within the exception if he came abroad from any of the motives above suggested as legitimate, and by reason thereof needed refreshment, but if he came abroad merely because he desired to go to a public-house and obtain drink, he would not." That was founded on a judgment of Cockburn, C.J., to the same effect. It is true these cases were decided under the old law, but the only alteration in this point made by the later legislation is the addition of the words "bonâ fide," which makes the case against the appellant stronger. Two recent cases have been cited, but they have no bearing on this case, and we find, therefore, that there is authority against the appellant but none in his favour. I am clearly of opinion that the magistrates were right in their findings of fact, and that this conviction ought to be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Godden, Holmes, & Co. for Becke & Green, Northampton.

Solicitor for the respondent, E. E. Hobson for Rawlins & Son, Market Harborough.

Q. B. Div.
(Day and Collins, JJ.) } Jan. 31.

CROFT v. KING. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service of concurrent writ out of the jurisdiction—Action of tort—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

By R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1, service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons may be allowed (g) whenever any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

Held, that clause (g) applies to an action of tort.

The plaintiff, an undischarged bankrupt, brought an action for malicious prosecution against K. & Co. (Limited) and K. The prosecution of which the plaintiff complained had been carried on at the instance of K. & Co. (Limited); K., who was the manager of a London depôt of K. & Co. (Limited), having laid the information against the plaintiff.

The registered office of K. & Co. (Limited), a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, was in Belfast. K. had been duly served within the jurisdiction with the writ in the plaintiff's action.

Held, that leave ought to be granted to serve a concurrent writ on K. & Co. (Limited) at their registered office in Ireland.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by F. King & Co. (Limited) to Kennedy, J., at chambers (who referred the summons to a divisional court) to set aside an order made ex parte by Day, J., at chambers, giving the plaintiff leave to issue a concurrent writ of summons against the intended defendants, F. King & Co. (Limited), and, further, giving leave to serve the concurrent writ at 26, Waring-street, Belfast, or elsewhere in Ireland.

The action was brought to recover damages for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff was an undischarged bankrupt. The prosecution of the plaintiff had been carried on at the instance of F. King & Co. (Limited). F. King & Co. (Limited) had a depôt in London, of which F. J. King was manager and he had laid the information against the plaintiff. F. J. King had been duly served within the jurisdiction. The address 26, Waring-street, Belfast, was the registered office of F. King & Co. (Limited). Day, J., sitting at chambers, gave leave ex parte to issue a concurrent writ of summons against F. King & Co. (Limited), and to serve it at 26, Waring-street, Belfast, or elsewhere in Ireland.

F. King & Co. (Limited) now applied to set aside the order of Day, J.

J. E. Bankes, for F. J. King & Co. (Limited), in support of the summons.—First, order 11 does not apply to an action of tort, and there was therefore no jurisdiction to make this order: Watkins v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 37 W. R. 670, 23 Q. B. D. 285; Lenders v. Anderson, 32 W. R. 230, 12 Q. B. D. 50; Field v. Bennett, 1 Times L. R. 374, 56 L. J. Q. B. 89, 35 W. R. Dig. 162. [DAY, J., referred to Indig. Co. v. Ogilvy, 39 W. R. 646, [1891] 2 Ch. 31.] Secondly, this is not a case in which the jurisdiction ought to be exercised. An Irish company is in a better position than a mere foreign company: Washburn and Moen Manufacturing Co. v. Cunard Co., 5 Times L. R. 592.

Willis, Q.C. (Clydesdale with him), for the plaintiff.—[DAY, J.—You need only address yourself to the question of jurisdiction in an action of tort.] The order was properly made. Order 11 mentions specific cases, and then follows a general provision: Massey v. Heynes, 36 W. R. 834, 21 Q. B. D. 330; Bree v. Marescaux, 29 W. R. 858, 7 Q. B. D. 434.

Bankes, in reply.—The words in clause (g) are not intended to have the very wide construction the other side wishes to put on them.

DAY, J.—There are no grounds for this application, and it must be dismissed. It is said that in an action of tort there is no authority to direct service of a writ out of the jurisdiction. The cases in which service out of the jurisdiction may be allowed are set out in clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f), and then clause (g) is introduced.

It is said that into the words "necessary or proper party" we must introduce a proviso, viz., that it must be clearly understood that this does not apply to actions of tort if the person is resident in Ireland. Why, I cannot understand. The words are perfectly general. They deal with cases where the person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party. The judgment of Huddleston, B., in Lenders v. Anderson has been read, but I think it has nothing to do with this case. The attention of the learned judge was not called to clause (g). Clause (g) was not necessary for his decision. The action was one of contract. I think he never intended to hold that clause (g) does not apply to an action of tort.

It is also objected that the company is not a necessary or proper party. If not a necessary, at any rate it is a proper party. It has an agency in London.

do not see that the company can be put into any difficulty by being made a defendant, except the inconvenience of having to pay damages. The London manager is already a party to the action. Access may be necessary to documents which may not be available in London. Discovery may also be necessary. It seems to me that the principals who have instigated the prosecution (we must assume that the action is well founded), i.e., the company, should be made parties. They are the persons under whose orders the prosecution has taken place, and they are proper parties.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether in this case a foreigner can be brought under the jurisdiction of the court. It has been laid down that this jurisdiction is to be regarded with very great jealousy. We must look jealously to see that the prescribed conditions have been complied with. In Leaders v. Anderson Huddleston, B., said: "It is to be observed that the power which previously existed of allowing service out of the jurisdiction in actions of tort is taken away except so far as such a power is involved in sub-clauses (a), (c), or (f)," but his attention was not directed to clause (g). He went a little further than was necessary, and therefore the dictum is not an authority upon clause (g). In the case of Field v. Bennett Cave, J., seems to have acted upon Mr. Pollard's argument that under the new Rules the practice was to refuse leave to serve out of the jurisdiction, in actions of tort; but the report of the case is very short; and it also appears from the observations of Lord Coleridge, C.J., when the case came before a divisional court (see 56 L. J. Q. B., at p. 91) that from the manner in which the case was presented to Cave, J., his decision cannot be accepted as an authority.

Under ord. 11, r. 1, of R. S. C., 1883, a series of cases in which service out of the jurisdiction may be allowed is laid down, and then follows the general provision in clause (g):—"Whenever any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." In this case the plaintiff has a person within the jurisdiction who is a party to the action, and I think that in such case the argument for introducing foreigners in cases of contract, applies equally to cases of tort. I therefore think that clause (g) applies to cases of tort.

I also agree that this is a case in which leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction ought to be given.

Solicitors for F. King & Co. (Limited), J. H. Johnson, Son, & Ellis.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Hatchett, Jones, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley and Kay, L.JJ.) March 20.

WITTED v. GALBRAITH, PEMBROKE, & CO. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Action against defendant within the jurisdiction and defendant out of the jurisdiction—Concurrent writ—Action properly brought against defendant within the jurisdiction—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

A stevedore, while engaged in discharging the cargo of a ship, fell through a hatchway, in consequence as was alleged, of the negligence of those in charge of the ship, and sustained injuries from which he died. His widow brought an action, under Lord Campbell's Act, against the brokers of the ship, who carried on business in London, and the owners of the ship, who carried on business and resided in Scotland. The writ having been served on the brokers, the plaintiff obtained an order at chambers, under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), giving her leave to issue a concurrent writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and to serve the same on the owners in Scotland.

The Court of Appeal, considering that the plaintiff had made the brokers defendants to the action merely for the purpose of being able to sue the Scotch owners in the English court, held that the action was not "properly brought" against the brokers within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and therefore that service on the owners in Scotland ought not to be allowed.

Appeal by the defendants, Dunlop & Sons, from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, J.) refusing to set aside service of a writ out of the jurisdiction.

This was an action under Lord Campbell's Act. The plaintiff, Harriet Witted, the widow of John Witted, commenced the action by issuing a writ against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. and Dunlop & Sons, claiming damages for the death of her husband, for which she maintained that the defendant firms, or one or other of them, were liable.

The deceased, who was a stevedore, met with his death in consequence of injuries which he received by falling through a hatchway of the steamship Queen Adelaide while he was engaged in discharging a cargo from that ship in the London and India Docks.

The plaintiff alleged that some bags were allowed by those in charge of the ship to remain covering the hatchway, which thus constituted a hidden danger.

The defendants Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. were shipbrokers, carrying on business in London. They acted as the inward brokers of The Queen Adelaide, and, on her arrival in the port of London, they made an agreement with the Joint Committee of the London and India Docks, under which the Joint Committee were to find the ship a berth and discharge her cargo. Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. were not otherwise interested in the ship or her management. The defendants Dunlop & Sons were the owners of The Queen Adelaide, and they carried on business and resided in Scotland.

It appeared that the deceased was at the time of his death in the service of the Joint Committee of the London and India Docks.

The writ having been served on Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., the plaintiff applied ex parte at chambers, under ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and ord. 6, r. 2, and obtained from Bruce, J., an order directing that she should be at liberty to issue a concurrent writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and to serve the same on Dunlop & Sons at Glasgow or elsewhere in Scotland. Dunlop & Sons, having been served with such concurrent writ, gave the plaintiff notice of motion, under ord. 12, r. 30, to set aside the service and to discharge the order authorizing such service. Kennedy, J., before whom the application came, referred the matter to the court. The Divisional Court thought that this was a case in which the plaintiff might reasonably bring her action against the two sets of defendants in the alternative; and, on the authority of Massey v. Heynes, 36 W. R. 834, 21 Q. B. D. 330, refused to set aside the service of the writ.

Dunlop & Sons appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Hollams, for Dunlop & Sons.—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g), allows service of a writ out of the jurisdiction where "any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." In order to bring this case within that rule, the plaintiff must show that this action is properly brought against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. But there is no reasonable ground for supposing that Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., can be under any liability to the plaintiff. They had no control over the ship. The only persons who can be under any liability to the plaintiff for this cause of action are Dunlop & Sons. And, as they are out of the jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot sue them directly in the English court, ord. 11, r. 1, not providing for any such case. The plaintiff ought not to be allowed indirectly to bring them into the English court by the mere expedient of adding as co-defendants persons within the jurisdiction against whom she has no primâ facie cause of action. Massey v. Heynes is not an authority for allowing service out of the jurisdiction in this case. This is not a bonâ fide alternative claim.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUDKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bernard Coleridge, Q.C., and W. Howland Roberts, for the plaintiff.—The case is within ord. 11, r. 1 (g). The action is properly brought against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co.; and Dunlop & Sons are, if not necessary parties, at least proper parties to the same action. Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., as brokers of the ship, were agents to procure the discharge of her cargo, and were bound to protect from concealed dangers persons who were invited by them on to the ship for the purpose of unloading; and their liability is not affected by the fact that the ship was under the control of persons other than their own servants: John v. Bacon, 18 W. R. 894, L. R. 5 C. P. 437. See also Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, and Indermaur v. Dames, 15 W. R. 434, L. R. 2 C. P. 311. If both sets of defendants had been within the jurisdiction it could not be said that it was frivolous or vexatious to join Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. And Dunlop & Sons being proper parties to the action, Massey v. Heynes is a case directly in point to show that the order for service out of the jurisdiction was rightly made.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is whether this is a proper case for allowing a concurrent writ to be served on shipowners, who are Scotchmen residing out of the jurisdiction. The action is brought against these Scotch owners and also against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., the brokers of the ship, who are within the jurisdiction, and have been already served with the writ. The theory on the part of the plaintiff is that one or other of these two sets of defendants can be rendered liable in this action. It is clear that there is no method of suing the Scotch owners in England unless the case can be brought within ord. 11, r. 1 (g). That rule says that service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons may be allowed whenever "any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." The plaintiff says that this action is properly brought against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co., and that the Scotch owners are proper, if not necessary, parties to that action. But if we should come to the conclusion that the action was brought against Galbraith, Pembroke, & Co. merely for the purpose of trying to bring in the Scotch owners under this rule, then I think we should be bound to say that the action was not properly brought against them, and that, therefore, the case did not come within the rule. The best test to apply seems to me to be to ask the question, whether, if both the owners and the brokers had been in this country, they would have been joined as defendants in the action? Would the plaintiff in that case have been advised to join the brokers as defendants? It seems to me quite certain that she would not have been so advised. And if not, it is clear that they are now sued merely for the purpose of proceeding against the Scotch owners under this rule. I think, therefore, that this is not a bonâ fide action against the brokers, and that consequently the rule does not apply. The appeal must be allowed.

KAY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, F. Deakin.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) — March 6, 14.

WHITE v. COHEN. (a.)

County court—Practice—Costs—Action commenced in High Court and transferred to county court—Less than £20 recovered—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 65, 116.

Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, applies to actions brought in the High Court and transferred to the county court under section 65. Therefore, where an action of contract for less than £50 is brought in the High Court and transferred to the county court, and less than £20 is recovered, the county court has no power to allow the plaintiff any costs of the action, notwithstanding the provisions as to costs contained in section 65.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.), ante, p. 250, affirmed.

Armitage v. Fison, 67 L. T. N. S. 415, overruled.

Appeal from the judgment of a divisional court, (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.), ante, p. 250.

The action, which was founded on contract, and was for less than £50, was brought in the High Court, and transferred under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to the City of London Court. The plaintiff obtained judgment for less than £20. The judge of the City of London Court affirmed the refusal of the registrar to tax the plaintiff's costs, holding that section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, precluded the plaintiff from recovering any costs. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the judge of the City of London Court.

The plaintiff appealed.

E. Hume Williams and Herdman, for the appellant.—The plaintiff is entitled to be allowed his costs incurred in the county court. In Armitage v. Fison, 67 L. T. N. S. 415, Day and Charles, JJ., allowed a plaintiff to tax his costs incurred in the county court under exactly similar circumstances. That case was not brought to the attention of the court below. Section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is the section which deals with the transfer of actions from the High Court to the county court, and it expressly enacts that when such a transfer is made the costs of all proceedings subsequent to the transfer, i.e., the costs incurred in the county court, shall be allowed on the county court scale. The effect of the section is that when an action has been transferred, then, so far as regards the costs of the proceedings in the county court, the action is to be treated as if it had never been in the High Court. The decision in Harris v. Judge, ante, p. 9, [1892] 2 Q. B. 565, is authority in support of this construction, and is in the plaintiff's favour. Section 116 does not apply to actions which are transferred to the county court, but to actions which are brought and tried in the High Court. An examination of the language of the section shows that it must be limited to proceedings which take place in the High Court. If section 116 includes the case of a transferred action at all, the rules laid down therein can only apply to costs incurred in the High Court up to the time when the action is transferred. Costs incurred subsequently to the transfer are governed by section 65. This view is consistent with the case of Harris v. Judge.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also cited Barker v. Hempstead, 37 W. R. 685, 23 Q. B. D. 8, and Wilson v. Statham, 39 W. R. 686, [1891] 2 Q. B. 261.

Haldinstein, for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 14.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was read by

LINDLEY, L.J.—This appeal raises the point left undetermined by Harris v. Judge. But that case turned on the same sections of the County Courts Act, 1888, as have to be considered on the present occasion, and throws considerable light on their true construction. The sections are 65 and 116 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43. Section 65 applies in terms to actions commenced in the High Court and sent for trial in the county court. Section 116 applies in terms to all actions brought in the High Court which might have been brought in the county court. The two sections, therefore, are not mutually exclusive; they may both stand together so far as their subject-matter is concerned; and so far as they are not inconsistent they ought to be read together. This was the view taken in Harris v. Judge. Upon the particular point which had there to be decided, the two sections could not be construed together, and section 65 was held to prevail over section 116. But it does not follow that the result ought to be the same in the present case. The last part of section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, says in terms what rule of costs is to be allowed in the cases to which it relates; it applies as well to plaintiffs as to defendants; but it does not say or mean that the costs which, if allowed, are to be taxed according to the rule mentioned, are in all cases to be allowed either to the plaintiff or to the defendant. Whether they are to be allowed or not, and to whom, depends on other sections. The section which enables the county court judge to give costs is section 113. But as regards actions brought in the High Court, but which might have been brought in the county court, there are specific directions or rules contained in section 116; and these specific directions or rules must be applied by the judge of the county court to whom an action brought in the High Court, but which might have been brought in the county court, is sent for trial. This is what I said in Harris v. Judge, and I think on reconsideration I am still of opinion is correct. The language, however, which I used in Harris v. Judge was too wide, and was understood by Bowen, J., to mean that the county court judge should give the certificate referred to in section 116. I agree with him that the county court judge cannot do that, and my language to that extent ought to be corrected. The clause in section 116 relating to the certificate or order allowing costs can only come into operation when the action is tried in the High Court. This result was relied upon by the appellant's counsel as a ground for holding that section 116 had no application to actions brought in the High Court, and ordered to be tried in a county court under section 65. If the last part of section 65 was an enactment that the costs should be allowed in all cases, partly on the county court scale and partly on the High Court scale, his argument would be very strong. But if, as we think, the last part of section 65 is only a direction as to the taxation of the costs, if any, which one party is to pay to the other, the argument loses its force.

Again, it was urged that the costs referred to in section 116 were not all the costs of the action, but only those incurred in the High Court; and that in a case brought in the High Court and ordered to be tried in the county court under section 65, the plaintiff might lose the costs incurred by him in the High Court, and yet recover the costs incurred by him in the county court. For this construction reliance was placed on Armitage v. Fison. But with deference to the learned judges who decided that case, we think the language of section 116, if it applies at all, is too clear and unambiguous to be confined to part only of the plaintiff's costs. In the cases to which the section applies, if the plaintiff recovers less than £20 in an action founded on contract the section says "he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action," unless he gets such a certificate as is afterwards mentioned, and which in an action ordered to be tried in a county court under section 65 the plaintiff cannot get. For these reasons we are of opinion—first, that the rules laid down in clauses 1 and 2 of section 116, depriving a plaintiff of costs, wholly or partially, are applicable to all actions brought in the High Court which might have been brought in the county court, whether tried in the High Court or ordered to be tried in the county court under section 65; and, secondly, that those rules apply to all the costs of such actions, and not only to so much of them as in a case ordered to be tried in the county court have been incurred previously to such order. The judgment appealed from must be affirmed, and the appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Henry Pumfrey.

Solicitors for the respondent, Prince, Ayres, & Austen.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley, L.J.) March 23.

In re TARN. (a.)

Practice—Interpleader—Appeal—Decision in summary manner—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 17—Ord. 57, rr. 9, 11.

Where, upon an interpleader summons, the question is one of law, and the judge decides it under ord. 57, r. 9, without directing an issue or a special case, his decision is a decision in a summary manner, and is final and conclusive, and there is no power to give leave to appeal.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., at chambers upon an interpleader summons.

Certain furniture, having been seized in execution, was claimed by the trustees of the debtor's marriage settlement. An interpleader summons was taken out before Kekewich, J., in chambers, and the learned judge, as the question was one of law, the facts not being in dispute, decided the question himself, under ord. 57, r. 9, in favour of the execution creditor, without directing an issue or ordering a special case to be stated, and certified that he did not require further argument.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claimants appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and Sargant, for the claimants, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay, upon the ground that this was a decision of the judge in a summary manner, and that by ord. 57, r. 11, the decision was final, and leave to appeal could not be granted.

They referred to Waterhouse v. Gilbert, 15 Q. B. D. 569, 33 W. R. Dig. 158; Lyon v. Morris, 35 W. R. 707, 19 Q. B. D. 139; Dodds v. Shepherd, 24 W. R. 322, 1 Ex. D. 75; Bryant v. Reading, 34 W. R. 496, 17 Q. B. D. 128; Dawson v. Fox, 33 W. R. 514, 14 Q. B. D. 377; Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 17; ord. 57, rr. 8, 9, 11.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and F. Dodd, for the execution creditors, contended that the authorities only went to this, that the decision of a judge in a summary manner under rule 8 was final, and that no leave to appeal could be given; but that a decision under rule 9 was not a decision in a summary manner, and under rule 11 leave to appeal could be given. The judge certified that he did not require further argument, and that amounted to leave to appeal. Section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, said nothing about leave to appeal, and to this extent was altered by rule 11.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Before the Judicature Acts and Rules, by reason of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and the earlier Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 58), every decision of a judge in an interpleader matter, where he did not direct an issue or order a special case to be stated, was a decision by him in a summary manner, and no appeal lay. That was the state of the law when the Rules of 1883 were framed. The next inquiry is whether those rules have made any alteration. The matter is full of difficulty; but, as I understand the decisions of the Court of Appeal, they lay it down that the rules did not intend to, and did not, make any alteration in this respect. Accordingly, where there was no appeal before those rules, no appeal is now given.

In the present case Kekewich, J., decided the question without directing an issue or ordering a special case to be stated. His decision, therefore, was a decision in a summary manner, and no appeal lies.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the rules had stood alone I should have thought that there would have been an appeal from a decision of a judge under rule 9. But rule 11 commences with the words "except where otherwise provided by statute," and when the statutes are looked into I cannot see that there is much of rule 11 left. Under section 17 (which is still in force) of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, no appeal lay from the decision of a judge at chambers under section 14, which corresponds with ord. 57, r. 8, nor under section 15, which corresponds with rule 9. So that when one looks into the statutes, which by rule 11 are made applicable, as to interpleader proceedings, it is seen that no appeal in either case lies. Rule 11 is very awkwardly drawn, and the difficulty can only be solved by looking out of the rule at the statutes still in force which regulate interpleader proceedings.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Birchalls.

Solicitors for the respondents, Loughborough & Gedge.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Nov. 9, 10; Feb. 3.

DAVID v. SABIN. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Covenant—Implied covenant—Title—"Beneficial owner"—Fraud of third party—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 7 (1) A.

In 1885, the defendant, being tenant for life of certain land, granted to B. a lease for ninety-nine years. B. executed three mortgages, by way of sub-demise, of the land so leased to him. In June, 1887, B., as beneficial owner, surrendered the term to the defendant for valuable consideration, without disclosing the mortgages. A few days later the defendant, "as beneficial owner," conveyed the land to B. in fee. B. subsequently, as beneficial owner, conveyed to the plaintiff in fee for valuable consideration, without disclosing the existence of the mortgages. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for breach of the covenant for title implied by virtue of section 7 (1) A of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, by reason of his conveyance to B. "as beneficial owner,"

Held, that the existence of the mortgages created by B., which constituted a defect in the defendant's title, arose from an act done by the defendant to which his implied covenant extended, and that he had, therefore, committed a breach of such covenant; and that, inasmuch as the covenant was one which ran with the land, and the plaintiff sued as assignee of the land in respect of privity of estate as distinguished from privity of contract, the defendant could not successfully set up the fraud of B., by which the breach had been induced, as an answer to the plaintiff's claim.

Decision of Romer, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Romer, J.

The facts are considered to sufficiently appear from the headnote and the judgments of the Lords Justices.

Romer, J., held that the defendant had not committed a breach of covenant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and W. R. Sheldon, for the appellant.—The defendant has committed a breach of covenant. He has himself done something which prevents his having a good title to convey so as to give quiet enjoyment of the land free from incumbrance. He has not given what he bargained to give, and, if a man bargains to give what he has not, to give, so much the worse for him.

Neville, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the respondent. No breach has been committed. If the appellant's contention is right, it comes to this, that the covenant for title is an absolute warranty, which it is not. Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 13 (see per Lord Eldon, C.J., at p. 22, and per Buller, J., at p. 2[illegible]); Sugden Vend. and Purch., 14th ed., p. 605, ch. [illegible], s. 3, sub-section 3. The covenant is obviously limited by the introductory words of the clause. The defendant was a purchaser for value from Baylis. The surrender which he took was perfectly good, he got back the term he had created, and the concealment of the sub-leases was a fraud and a crime—it is a misdemeanour by statute—and he could not protect himself against a crime. It was not the defendant's act or in any way through him that the mortgages were fraudulently concealed. [BOWEN, L.J.—He parted with the right to possession and did not get back: was not that something "omitted" within his covenant?] No; conveyancers put in or leave out the word "omitted" indifferently; they say, "done, omitted, or knowingly suffered" and "done or knowingly suffered" with indifference: see Davidson's Precedents. [BOWEN, L.J.—I do not feel sure that they do.] The presence of the word merely means that the covenantee must use all reasonable care as a business man, and that the defendant has done. He "suffered" rather than "omitted" something and then unless he has "knowingly suffered" the covenant does not apply. Again, if there has been a breach, the plaintiff is not in a better position than his assignor, Baylis, the original covenantee: Taylor v. Needham, 2 Taun. 282; Baylis has incapacitated himself by his fraud, and his assignee is equally incapacitated.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Haldane, Q.C., in reply.—What word is more apt than "omitted" to express what the defendant has here actually done, in failing to get in the outstanding mortgages or to provide against them?

Cur. adv. vult.

February 3.—LINDLEY, L.J., read a written judgment, to the following effect:—By a deed dated June 16, 1887, the defendant, Sabin, conveyed some land to a Mr. Baylis, in fee for valuable consideration. Sabin, who was the vendor, was tenant for life under his father's will, and conveyed under the powers conferred on tenants for life by the Settled Land Act; he conveyed as "beneficial owner." He did not expressly enter into any covenants for title; but the vendor's covenant for title set out in section 7 (1) A of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), must by that Act be treated as contained in the conveyance. The plaintiff is the present owner of the land; he claims through Baylis, and contends that he is entitled, as Baylis's grantee of the land, or, in other words, as his assign, to the benefit of the covenant for title to which I have referred. This action is brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for a breach of that covenant. The alleged breach is that when Sabin conveyed to Baylis the property was subject to three outstanding mortgages and that Sabin, therefore, was not in a position to convey the land in fee free from incumbrances, which, the plaintiff contends, is what Sabin professed to do. The existence of these incumbrances is indisputable. They were unknown to Sabin when he conveyed to Baylis. They had been created by Baylis himself, and must have been known to him, and have been concealed from Sabin. They arose in this way. On the 24th of June, 1885, Sabin, who was tenant for life of the land in question, granted a lease to Baylis for ninety-nine years. In 1885 Baylis executed three mortgages of the land so leased to him. These mortgages were sub-leases by way of mortgage. On the 5th of June, 1887, by a deed indorsed on the lease of the 24th of June, 1885, Baylis, as beneficial owner, surrendered that lease to Sabin. The sub-leases, of course, were not merged or extinguished by this surrender, and they are the incumbrances against which the plaintiff seeks to be indemnified by Sabin.

Two questions were discussed—viz. (1) Whether Sabin's covenant extended to these incumbrances? (2) If it did, then whether the plaintiff, who claims through Baylis, is in a better position than Baylis would be himself if he were suing on the covenant. The first question was decided against the plaintiff by Romer, J., and from that decision this appeal is brought. On looking at the covenant set out in section 7 (1) A of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it will be seen that the covenants for right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, freedom from incumbrances, and for further assurance are not four separate and distinct covenants, but parts of one entire covenant beginning with and controlled throughout by the words, "That notwitstanding anything by the person who so conveys or any one through whom he derives title otherwise than by purchase for value." These words render a vendor's covenant a qualified covenant, and not an absolute warranty of title, as is the covenant by a mortgagor who conveys as beneficial owner (see clause C of the same section). The statute has, in this respect, following the long-established and well-known practice of conveyancers, as may be seen from Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 13, Church v. Brown, 15 Ves. 263, and the ordinary forms of conveyances. But, although a vendor's covenant for title is not an absolute warranty of title, it is very wide. The acts and omissions covenanted against are reducible to four heads—viz., (1) the acts and omissions of the vendor himself; (2) the acts and omissions of persons through whom he claims otherwise than by purchase for value; (3) the acts and omissions of persons claiming through him; (4) the acts and omissions of persons claiming in trust for him. These last two are, it is true, not enumerated in the words at the beginning of the covenant, but they are introduced afterwards, and may be very important.

In this particular case the acts and omissions of persons claiming in trust for Sabin may be disregarded as immaterial. The acts and omissions of persons through whom Sabin claims—i.e., Baylis—may be also passed over for the present, because Sabin, so far as he claims through Baylis, claims through him by purchase for value. Let us then leave out the second and fourth of the above heads, and see how Sabin's covenant will then stand. It will run thus—"That notwithstanding anything by the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin) made, done, executed, or omitted or knowingly suffered, the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin) has full power to convey the subject-matter expressed to be conveyed, and that, notwithstanding anything as aforesaid, that subject-matter shall remain to and be quietly entered upon, received and held, occupied, enjoyed, and taken by the person to whom the conveyance is expressed to be made (i.e., Baylis) and any person deriving title under him (i.e., the plaintiff David), and the benefit thereof shall be received and taken accordingly without any lawful interruption or disturbance by the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin) or any person rightfully claiming or to claim by, through, or under the person who so conveys (i.e., Baylis's incumbrancers claiming immediately through him, but also claiming through Sabin), and that freed and discharged from or otherwise by the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin) sufficiently indemnified against all such estates, incumbrances, claims, and demands as either before or after the date of the conveyance (i.e., Sabin's conveyance) have been or shall be made, occasioned, or suffered by that person (i.e., the person who so conveys—i.e., Sabin) or by any person rightfully claiming by, through, or under the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin); and, further, that the person who so conveys (i.e., Sabin) and every other person rightfully claiming any estate or interest in the subject-matter of the conveyance by, through, or under the person who so conveys (i.e., Baylis's incumbrancers, claiming immediately through him, but mediately through Sabin) will from time to time and at all times after the date of the conveyance (i.e., Sabin's conveyance), on the request and at the cost of any person to whom the conveyance is expressed to be made (i.e., Baylis) or of any person deriving title under him (i.e., the plaintiff), execute and do all such lawful assurances and things for further or more perfectly assuring the subject-matter of the conveyance to the person to whom the conveyance is made (i.e., Baylis), and those deriving title under him (i.e., the plaintiff), as by him or them or any of them shall be reasonably required." This covenant in terms extends (1) to the term created by Sabin himself, and (2) to the underleases created by Baylis, who claimed through Sabin.

Let us consider these a little more closely. Although the term created by Sabin in favour of Baylis was afterwards surrendered and no longer exists as a separate and distinct term, still it is not wholly extinguished even at law. The surrender of the term only operated as an assignment of the surrenderor's interest in it—see Co. Lit. 338b; 1 Wm. Saund. 235c, note m; Davenport's case, 8 Co. 145b; Mellor v. Watkins, L. R. 9 Q. B. 400, 22 W. R. Dig. 127. The term was not merged in the sense of being extinguished for all purposes. The right to the possession of the land, to hold and enjoy it, created by Sabin still exists, although for purposes of securing money only; but the continued existence of this right constitutes a defect in Sabin's title, and it is a defect of his own creation arising from an act done by himself. Further, the incumbrancers claim through Sabin himself, though their claim through him is based immediately on what was done by his lessee. The plaintiff's case is therefore brought directly within the words of those parts of Sabin's covenant which relate to quiet enjoyment and freedom from incumbrances and further assurance. The incumbrancers "claim by, through, or under the person who so conveys"—i.e., the vendor Sabin. So that this case is really brought within the words of every part of the covenant, confining it throughout to the acts of Sabin and of persons claiming through him.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to decide whether Sabin's omission to get in the underleases would of itself amount to a breach of his covenant. Upon this point, therefore, I will say no more than that as he knew nothing about them he did not knowingly suffer them to remain outstanding; and although in one sense he omitted to get them in, I see no answer to his counsel's contention that if a vendor who takes all reasonable care is liable for not getting in an incumbrance of which he knows nothing the statutory covenant would really be a warranty, which it clearly is not. But, even if Sabin is not liable for his own omission to get in these underleases, I am by no means clear that he is not liable for Baylis's omission to get them in. Sabin's covenant extends not only to the acts but also to the omissions of those who claim under him; and the fraudulent concealment from him of these incumbrances does not, in my opinion, affect the construction of this part of the covenant, and does not deprive the plaintiff of any rights which he would otherwise have against Sabin.

It must not be overlooked that this is not a case in which a vendor creates an incumbrance, then sells the fee, then repurchases, and afterwards sells again with the ordinary covenant for title. The covenant by a vendor in fee is not understood as extending to acts done previously to the last preceding sale. On each sale the title is investigated, and conveyancers are content with a series of covenants of title each of which covers the time which has elapsed since the last covenant from a vendor in fee. The covenants set out in the Conveyancing Act must be construed with reference to the ordinary course of business in sales of land and to the practice of conveyancers. This is the true answer to many of the cases ingeniously suggested in argument with a view to show that the construction adopted by Romer, J., was correct.

But reliance is placed upon the protection afforded to Sabin as a purchaser for value from Baylis. The words "otherwise than by purchase for value" have, however, no reference to the covenantor's own acts or omissions since the last sale of the fee, nor to the acts or omissions of persons claiming through him. Those words are confined to acts or omissions of persons through whom he claims since the last sale of the property. They would protect Sabin from liability in respect of what Baylis did if the only connection between them was that Sabin derived title through Baylis, but the words in question have no application to his liability for what he did himself nor to his liability for the acts of persons claiming through him, and these include Baylis himself. The defence based upon the words "otherwise than by purchase for value" cannot be sustained unless the true construction of the whole covenant is that an incumbrance specially excepted from one class of acts and omissions covered by it is also excluded from the other classes, or, in other words, from the whole covenant. But such a construction is, in my opinion, inadmissible; it is inconsistent with the constant use of the disjunctive "or," which is employed in order to enlarge and not to diminish the acts and omissions covenanted against. Let us suppose that the term had been granted, not to Baylis, but to a third person who created incumbrances, and then, concealing them from Sabin, surrendered the term to him, and that he then conveyed the fee to Baylis, who afterwards conveyed it to the plaintiff. Had that been the case the defendant would, in my opinion, be plainly liable on his covenant. I cannot see that he is less so by reason of Baylis being the grantee of the term and the creator of the incumbrances.

It was also urged for the defendant that the injury and damage to the plaintiff were the direct result of what Baylis did, and not of what the defendant did, and that the damages suffered by the plaintiff were too remote to be attributable to the defendant's breach of his covenant. But the damages sustained by the plaintiff are directly occasioned by the inability of the defendant to make a good title, and that inability arises from his own act as well as from the acts of a person claiming through him, as already pointed out. From this point of view the damage sustained by the plaintiff is not too remote.

Having, for the above reasons, arrived at the conclusion that upon the true construction of the covenant Sabin has committed a breach of it, I pass on to consider whether he can avail himself as against the plaintiff of any defence which he would have at law against Baylis if Baylis were the plaintiff in the action. Let us first consider the effect of Baylis's fraud on Sabin when Sabin conveyed the fee to him. The fraud committed by Baylis in concealing the incumbrances when he surrendered the term and took a conveyance of the fee did not prevent the fee from passing to himself. Moreover, the covenant for title contained in the deed conveying the fee was not void, but voidable only; it was Sabin's deed and covenant; non est factum could not have been pleaded by him to an action brought against him upon it even by Baylis himself (Whelpdale's case, 5 Co. 118b). Sabin might have pleaded fraud and rescission of contract as a defence to such an action, or he could have brought a cross action for damages against Baylis, or have counter-claimed for damages against him. But it is plain that Sabin could have no cross action or counter-claim against the plaintiff for damages; and rescission of the sale of the land to Baylis is not now possible, nor does the defendant seek to rescind it. The covenant with Baylis was voidable against him, but became unavoidable after he sold to the plaintiff.

Let us next consider the position of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's right to sue in this case is a right to sue in his own name at common law as grantee of the estate in the land to which the benefit of the defendant's covenant for title is an incident: see Middlemore v. Goodale, 1 Ro. Ab., 521 K. Pl. 6; s. c. Cro. Car. 503-505, and 1 Smith's L. C., 8th ed., p. 87. And for the reasons I have already given, fraud on the part of the person through whom the plaintiff claims cannot furnish a defence to an action on such a covenant, nor is there any case which shows that it can. Although the benefit of the defendant's covenant with Baylis runs with the land, and the plaintiff can sue on it, the fraud committed by Baylis on the defendant was personal to Baylis, and does not run with the land, and does not in any way affect the plaintiff. At one time I had some doubt whether the plaintiff could be in a better position at law than the original covenantee through whom he claimed. But on reflection I have come to the conclusion that he is; for the right to sue at common law on a covenant running with the land depends on and is a consequence of the ownership in the land. The action is brought in respect of privity of estate as distinguished from privity of contract, and is not governed by the same rules as an action by the assignee of a covenant grounded on privity of contract: see Lewis v. Campbell, 8 Taunt., 715; Kingdon v. Nottle, 4 M. & S. 53; Thursby v. Plant, 1 Wm. Saund., 234 a and b), which, however, was an action on the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, by the assignee of the reversion against the lessee. In equity it is hardly necessary to observe that the plaintiff's right to sue is unassailable. The plaintiff is a purchaser for value of the legal estate without notice of Baylis's fraud, and the defendant cannot set up any equitable rights based on such fraud as a defence to the action.

The judgment, therefore, must be reversed and be entered for the plaintiff, with costs here and below, and there must be an inquiry as to damages. The result, although arrived at by technical reasoning, is conformable to good sense and justice; for Sabin in fact professed to convey more than he had a right to convey—viz., an estate free from incumbrances created by himself or by any person claiming under him. Subsequent purchasers, including the plaintiff, paid for such an estate, but did not get it. As between the plaintiff and the defendant it seems, therefore, only right and just that the loss sustained by the purchaser should be borne by the vendor, although no blame is attributable to either of them. Sabin in his turn is entitled to redress against Baylis, but I fear that this right to redress has no practical value.

BOWEN, L.J.—That the benefit of the implied covenant created by section 7, sub-section 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, runs with the land cannot be disputed. The real questions to be discussed are, first, whether there has been, on the part of the defendant, a breach of his covenant; and, secondly, whether the defendant can now avail himself of the fraud of Baylis (the plaintiff's predecessor in title) as an answer to the action. After much consideration and some fluctuation of view I find myself, in the end, of the same opinion as that which I entertained at the conclusion of the arguments.

At the outset it is necessary to determine whether there has been any breach at all of the covenant. The learned judge below held that there had been none, upon the ground that the incumbrances, consisting as they do of the sub-leases executed by Baylis, were in no sense the act of the defendant. But the point is not, as it seems to me, whether the incumbrances are themselves the act of the defendant, but whether the defendant's conveyance does all that the defendant covenanted that it should. By virtue of section 7 he has covenanted that he had full power to convey, notwithstanding anything done by himself which is calculated to affect the virtue of his conveyance. What has he himself done? In 1885 he parted with a term of years in the land and with the right of possession in the land during that term. But for his parting with the term—which he never re-acquired—he would have had a good fee simple in possession to convey to Baylis. He parted with it, and as he never got it back he was unable to convey the fee with possession. It is a mere conveyancing illusion to suppose that the defendant ever by the so-called surrender of 1887 got back the term which he had granted so as to extinguish it. He only recovered it mangled by the sub-leases and shorn of all right to possession. During the time of the duration of these sub-leases he had no right of possession to give, yet he purported to sell it, and covenanted that he had a good title to do so, notwithstanding his own acts.

In opposition to this view it was argued that the damage caused by the breach arose, not from the defendant's act in parting with the term, but from incumbrances subsequently created by another person. But here again one must not lose sight of the real issue, which is not whether the act done by the defendant in parting with the term led directly, and as a natural consequence, to the damage suffered by the plaintiff. No doubt between the defendant's parting with the term in 1885 and the damage occasioned to the plaintiff there was an intermediate cause—a novus actus interveniens—without which no damage would have occurred. But the action is not for damage caused by what the defendant had done in 1885, but for breach of limited covenants of a later date for title, for quiet enjoyment, and for freedom from incumbrances. The plaintiff has not got such title, is disturbed in his enjoyment, and is hampered by incumbrances, and the act of the defendant in 1885 is a cause sine quâ non, an act notwithstanding which, or against which, the covenantee was to be secured.

The above interpretation of section 7, sub-section 1, leads, no doubt, to some apparent anomalies. If the defendant had never had any interest in the land before he acquired the term from Baylis in 1887 he would not have been liable for the mischief arising from these prior incumbrances. Is the defendant, it will be asked, to be in a worse position because he had previously possessed the fee, or the term, and then parted with it in 1885 for a time to a person who defrauded him? Why—it will be said—is he to bear the burden of the fraud of another person in one case more than in the other? The answer seems to me to be that the Legislature has so chosen to enact. The language hardly admits of escape. What the defendant has "done"—to use the expression of the section—was to part with the term and the right to possession. Let us therefore suppose that for the words "anything done" we were to substitute in the statutory covenant an equivalent describing in detail the thing which has been actually done. The defendant will then have covenanted to make a good title to the fee simple in possession, notwithstanding the fact that in June, 1885, he parted with a term involving the right to possession itself. His only answer can be that though he parted with the term he would have recovered it intact but for a fraud committed on him. This is not a defence to an action by a covenantee except so far as the fraud disqualifies the plaintiff from suing. There is in other words a breach of covenant, but one which has been induced by a fraud; it remains to be seen whether the defendant can set up a defence founded on this fraud against a subsequent bonâ fide purchaser of the land.

I answer to the first inquiry by saying that there has been a breach by the defendant of the statutory covenant.

We have to consider next whether, if Baylis himself had been the plaintiff, he could, after the fraud which he had committed, have sued the defendant in respect of such a breach, and, lastly, whether, if Baylis could not do so, the present plaintiff is involved in any similar difficulty. A contract of sale procured by a purchaser's fraud is not void at law, but voidable. Even as against Baylis the defendant could not have pleaded that the contract of sale had been procured by fraud without also electing to rescind the contract as a whole and returning the purchase-money. A defrauded party cannot repudiate a contract in part only; he cannot pick out the plums of a bargain into which he has been misled and reject the remainder. But there is another and a different principle of law and equity which the defendant, without rescinding the contract, might, as between himself and Baylis, have successfully invoked. No person can successfully sue for a breach of covenant when the breach has been occasioned by his own fraud. To take advantage of such a breach would be a dishonesty, and the maxim, "Ex turpi causâ non oritur actio," though usually applied to a different class of cases, in fact covers this. To hold otherwise would be to allow a man to recover damages through, and to make a profit out of, his own fraud. To any action on the covenant by Baylis the defendant might therefore have pleaded, not, indeed, that the contract was induced by Baylis's fraud—a plea which could only be pleaded on the terms of rescinding the contract as a whole—but that the breach of the contract had been induced by it. Such a defence, however, is one that would be personal to Baylis, a personal bar or exception only rendering him unfit in the eyes of the law to sue for this particular breach. And as Baylis could not sue for this particular breach, so neither could he assign the rights to be protected against this particular breach to another. If the present plaintiff had simply been an assignee of the rights of Baylis under his special covenant to be protected against this particular breach, the plaintiff, as such assignee, could not have been in a better position than his assignor. But the plaintiff is not suing as the assignee of a chose in action, but as the assignee of the land itself. His cause of action is based on the original liability of the covenantor to all persons into whose hands the land may come. As against such an assign of the land no plea can prevail which is in the nature of a personal bar only to the original covenantee. It would, indeed, be a grave matter to add such an element of hidden danger to titles of landed property, as would arise from sanctioning the idea that the covenants of a conveyance which run with the land cannot be invoked by a bonâ fide purchaser against some breach traceable to and caused by a fraud on the part of the original covenantee. The benefit of the covenant runs with the land, but the burden of the fraud does not. On this point also the argument of the respondent seems to me, therefore, to fail; and the appeal must accordingly be allowed, and the order be drawn in the form suggested by my brother Lindley.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The facts may be shortly stated as follows.

On the 24th of June, 1885, the defendant Sabin, who, for the purposes of this case, may be taken as being owner in fee, granted to Baylis, a builder, a lease of certain land at Hurstpierpoint for the term of ninety-nine years. Baylis thereupon, to secure present advances, created three mortgages by way of sub-demise. On the 5th of June, 1887, Baylis, as beneficial owner and for valuable consideration, purported to surrender the term of ninety-nine years to Sabin; but fraudulently concealed from him the fact that he had created these three mortgages. And on the 16th of June, 1887, Sabin, as beneficial owner, believing that he was owner in fee, conveyed the land to Baylis in fee. Baylis, as beneficial owner, subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff in fee, fraudulently concealing from him, as he had done from Sabin, the existence of the mortgages which were then, and still are, subsisting.

That both the plaintiff and the defendant could sue Baylis is undeniable, but Baylis is a bankrupt and not worth suing, and the question raised is whether the plaintiff, as assignee of the estate from Baylis, can sue Sabin for breach of his covenant contained in the conveyance by him to Baylis of the 16th of June, 1887, wherein Sabin, "as beneficial owner," conveyed to Baylis in fee.

There is no question as to the covenant running with the land so as to enable the plaintiff to sue upon it as assignee of the estate. The question is, Was Sabin, in the circumstances above stated, committing any breach of his covenant with Baylis, and, if so, can he be sued by the plaintiff for such breach? Romer, J., has held that he has not committed any breach, and hence the present appeal.

It becomes necessary to consider section 7 (1) A of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, for the covenant contained in this section is the covenant entered into by Sabin when he conveyed as "beneficial owner" to Baylis. This section, when applied to the admitted facts of the case, reads as follows:—

1. That, notwithstanding anything made, done, executed, or omitted, or knowingly suffered by Sabin himself, he has full power to convey the subject-matter as expressed to be conveyed to Baylis—i.e., to Baylis in fee.

2. That, notwithstanding anything made, done, executed, or omitted, or knowingly suffered by Sabin himself, the subject-matter should be quietly enjoyed by Baylis, and any person deriving title under him, without any lawful interruption (1) by Sabin himself, (2) by any person rightfully claiming through Sabin, (3) by any person rightfully claiming through anyone (other than a person who claims in respect of an estate subject whereto the conveyance is expressly made) through whom Sabin derives title other than by purchase for value. (This last does not apply to this case.)

3. That Sabin would indemnify Baylis against all such claims—i.e., (1) (2) (3) above stated.

4. That Sabin, and any person rightfully claiming any estate in the subject-matter (other than an estate subject whereto the conveyance is expressly made) through Sabin, would execute all lawful assurances.

It cannot be disputed that Sabin has covenanted with Baylis (a) that he (Sabin) had not made, done, or executed anything which limited his full power to convey to Baylis in fee; and (b) that, notwithstanding anything made, done, or executed by Sabin, Baylis, and any person deriving title under him, should quietly enjoy the subject-matter conveyed without lawful interruption by anyone rightfully claiming through Sabin. I have left out the words in the section "omitted or knowingly suffered," for the words "made, done, or executed" raise the point I have to consider.

It is said that Sabin is liable upon this covenant, firstly, because Sabin created the term for ninety-nine years in favour of Baylis which he had never got in, and thus he had made, done, or executed that which limited his power of conveying in fee to Baylis; and, secondly, that, by reason of Sabin's acts, the mortgagees of Baylis could rightly claim through Sabin, and thereby lawfully interrupt Baylis and anyone deriving title under him—that is, the plaintiff—in the quiet enjoyment of his estate.

Now it appears to me to be clear, if Sabin, being owner in fee, had created the term of ninety-nine years in favour of a third person, reserving to himself the reversion expectant upon the determination of the term, and before getting it in had conveyed as beneficial owner to Baylis in fee, that Baylis could have sued Sabin upon his covenant, because Sabin would then have made, done, or executed the very thing which disabled him from conveying to Baylis in fee. In such a case the reason why he had not got the term in would be immaterial, and it would be no answer for Sabin to say to Baylis, "I thought I had got it in, but have been deceived by the third person," for if, in fact, he had not got it in, and had conveyed as beneficial owner to Baylis in fee, he, Sabin, would have broken his covenant with Baylis. But it seems that in the present case Sabin did not create out of his estate a term in favour of a third person, but did so in favour of Baylis; and the question arises, Does this fact, cause that which otherwise would, in my judgment, have been a breach of the covenant if the term had been created in favour of a third person not to be a breach when created in favour of Baylis? The breach is for having made, done, or executed precisely the same thing in each case, whereby he (Sabin) was unable to convey in fee. Romer, J., came to the conclusion that the act which incapacitated Sabin from conveying to Baylis in fee was not anything made, done, or executed by Sabin, but was the creation of the mortgages by Baylis, and he likened the present case to a young man selling his estate in fee and then, fifty years afterwards, buying it back after many dealings with it in the interval by the owner for the time being, and he said that under this covenant the young man would not be liable for such dealings when reselling as beneficial owner. In this I agree, for in such case the young man would not have made, done, or executed anything, while he was retaining possession of his estate in the land, whereby he was subsequently prevented from conveying in fee. But the present case is not the case of a man selling his estate out and out, and afterwards repurchasing it, it having been dealt with by others in the meantime, in which case I agree the covenant would not apply, but it is the case of a man who whilst he is owner of an estate in fee carves out of it a term retaining the reversion expectant upon the determination of that term in himself, and then conveying as beneficial owner in fee with the term created by him still outstanding. It seems to me, with deference to the great experience of Romer, J., in these matters, that the case put by him is not in point, for in the one case the vendor, whilst retaining possession of the estate, has done nothing to incapacitate himself from conveying in fee, whilst in the other he has. As I have before stated, if he (the vendor) has made, done, or executed that which prevented him subsequently conveying as beneficial owner in fee—viz., as in this case creating the term—the reason why he has been unable to get the term in is immaterial when considering whether the covenant has been broken or not.

In my judgment, whether the term was created in favour of a third person or in favour of Baylis, Sabin has committed a breach of his covenant. He has covenanted with Baylis that he had title to convey to him in fee free from incumbrances, whereas as a matter of fact he had not. Why, then, has he not broken his covenant? It appears to me that he has.

But I agree that, though he has broken his covenant, no effective action could be maintained by Baylis against him for such breach; firstly, because Sabin could have pleaded to such an action that he was induced by the fraud of Baylis to enter into the covenant, and that he, Sabin, had rescinded the contract upon discovering the fraud (if he had done so); secondly, because Baylis could only have recovered nominal damages from Sabin—though Baylis did not get the fee under the conveyance by Sabin to him of the 16th of June, 1887, as Sabin had covenanted, yet, coupling that conveyance with the conveyances which had theretofore passed between Sabin and Baylis, as a matter of fact the fee which Sabin once had had passed out of him into Baylis and his nominees, and Baylis's damages would be nil; and, thirdly, because Sabin in such action could have counter-claimed against Baylis upon the covenant which he gave when he purported to convey the term as beneficial owner to Sabin on the 5th of June, 1887, for any damages Sabin might sustain by reason of the breach of that covenant by Baylis. For these reasons it appears to me that Sabin did commit a breach of his covenant with Baylis, but by reason of the personal acts of Baylis he (Baylis) is prevented from effectively prosecuting an action for such breach against Sabin.

The point now arises whether a plaintiff who sues as assignee of the estate for breach of a covenant running with the land is prevented from suing the original covenantor (Sabin) for a proved breach of his covenant, because the original covenantee (Baylis) has committed personal acts which have prevented him from taking advantage of these breaches; or, in other words, is a plaintiff who sues as assignee of the estate for a proved breach of a covenant running with the land affected by defences purely personal to the original covenantee. In such an action the plaintiff does not sue by reason of privity of contract, but by privity of estate, and this differentiates this case from that put in argument—viz., that an assignee suing by reason of privity of contract is usually in no better position than his assignor. Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., have fully dealt with this point, and I have nothing to add to what has been said thereon; and for the reasons they have given I am of opinion that the personal act of the covenantee (Baylis) which would prevent him effectively suing the covenantor does not debar an assignee who sues not upon privity of contract but upon privity of estate from suing and recovering upon a breach of covenant committed by the original covenantor.

I now come to a further breach of covenant by Sabin which the plaintiff claims that Sabin has also committed—viz., that for quiet enjoyment. It is said that by reason of Sabin's act in creating the term the mortgagees of Baylis rightfully claiming though Sabin can lawfully interrupt the plaintiff in the possession of his estate to which he derives title under Baylis; and that Sabin has covenanted against this. I can see no answer to this point if it be the true view, as I think it is, that Sabin committed an act in breach of his covenant in creating and not getting in the term before he conveyed as beneficial owner to Baylis in fee. Suppose that the mortgagees were to bring ejectment against the plaintiff, what defence would he have? They would produce their mortgage deeds and prove that they were existing sub-demises of the term which Sabin, when owner in fee, had created. They could prove that Baylis had lawfully created these sub-demises when he did, and that they were valid and subsisting. What answer could the plaintiff have to such an action? These mortgagees in their action against the plaintiff would rightfully claim through Sabin and would bring themselves within Sabin's covenant for quiet enjoyment to Baylis and

The agreement, however, did not contain any express stipulation as to copyright, nor any stipulation by the defendants not to engage in a similar business on behalf of themselves or others after their employment by the plaintiff had terminated. The defendants, having ceased to be employed by the plaintiff, proposed to supply to a rival publication copies of the headings and advertisements appearing in the plaintiff's work.

Held, that the "headings" in the plaintiff's publication were a good subject-matter for copyright; that, on the facts, the reasonable inference was that the headings were composed on the terms that the copyright therein should belong to the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain infringement of his copyright in the "headings."

Semble, that the plaintiff would also be entitled to copyright in respect of the collocation and arrangement in his work of a series of the advertisements.

Held, also, that it was a reasonable inference from the nature and object of the defendants' employment that all documents and materials prepared and obtained by the defendants in the course of that employment were for the purposes of the plaintiff's publication only, and that the plaintiff was entitled, notwithstanding that his employment of the defendants had come to an end, to restrain the defendants making any use of such documents or materials for any other purpose—the plaintiff's right in this respect depending, not in any way on copyright, but on the ground that it would be contrary to the good faith implied by the nature and object of the defendants' employment that the defendants should use documents or materials compiled while in the plaintiff's employment for any other purpose than that of the plaintiff's publication.

Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron, 43 L. J. Ch. 661; Abernethy v. Hutchinson, 3 L. J. (O. S.) Ch. 209; and Morison v. Moat, 9 Ha. 241, discussed.

Appeal by the defendants from the decision of Chitty, J.

The plaintiff was the proprietor and publisher of a book called the "International Guide to British and Foreign Merchants and Manufacturers," a portion of which (called the "Continental Section") was devoted to Continental tradesmen; and it was with reference to this portion of the work that the present case arose. The whole work had been registered by the plaintiff at Stationers' Hall.

The Continental section of the plaintiff's work was arranged under special headings arranged in alphabetical order, descriptive of various trades and articles of manufacture; each of these headings were printed in four languages—viz., English, French, German, and Spanish; and under each heading were printed the names, in alphabetical order, of such foreign traders as desired their goods to be advertised in the work, with their addresses, trade-marks, and other similar illustrations. These advertisements were also in the above four languages.

The plaintiff had employed travellers or canvassers in order to obtain these advertisements. By the terms of the agreement entered into between the plaintiff and each such traveller, the plaintiff agreed to employ the traveller for the purpose of obtaining these advertisements in a particular allotted district, and the traveller agreed to devote himself therein exclusively to the plaintiff's service, receiving by way of remuneration a very high percentage on the cash received from the traders for such advertisements, and being bound to furnish, free of charge, to the plaintiff all blocks (for illustrations, &c.) and translations necessary for producing the advertisements. None of the agreements, however, contained any stipulation that the traveller should not on the termination of the agreement engage in a similar business either on his own account or on behalf of any other person.

The defendants, two brothers named Evans, had been employed by the plaintiff as travellers, under such agreements. The agreements with the defendants terminated in April, 1892.

Shortly afterwards a publication called the "Commercial Directory" was proposed to be started. This publication was intended to contain also a Continental section, and was a rival publication to that of the plaintiff.

The defendants assisted in the preparation of the Continental section of this proposed rival publication; and it appeared that the materials from which certain printed specimen copies of the proposed rival publication were produced consisted of printed portions cut out of the "Continental Section" of the plaintiff's work, with the addition of written matter supplied by the defendants; the result being that these specimen printed copies of the rival publication were almost a verbatim reprint of the plaintiff's Continental section.

The plaintiff thereupon instituted this action against the defendants Evans, and the printers and publishers of the proposed rival publication, praying an injunction to restrain the defendants Evans from selling or communicating to the rival publishers, and the rival publishers from publishing or using, and the printers from printing or copying, any copies or blocks of advertisements or trade-marks procured by, or then or late in the possession of the defendants Evans as agents of the plaintiff; or any advertisements copied from or only colourably differing from any of the advertisements in the plaintiff's publication; and from otherwise infringing the plaintiff's copyright therein.

A motion for an interlocutory injunction came on for hearing on the 12th of August, 1892, before Chitty, J., who granted an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants Evans and the rival publishers, their servants and agents, from printing, selling, or publishing any copy or copies of so much of the plaintiff's book as consisted of headings (not forming part of advertisements therein), so, or in such a way, as to infringe the plaintiff's copyright in such headings; and, further, from displaying or using, for the purpose of obtaining advertisements for any work other than the plaintiff's work, so much of the copies of the rival publisher's book already printed as consisted of such headings, and from using blocks or materials obtained by the defendants Evans, or either of them, whilst in the employment of the plaintiff and for the purposes of the plaintiff's work, or any copies thereof, for the purposes of any work other than the plaintiff's; but the injunction was not to extend to prevent the defendants, or any of them, making legitimate use of the plaintiff's work, or any part thereof, for the purposes of obtaining advertisements or otherwise.

The defendants Evans appealed.

Section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), so far as material, enacts "that when any publisher . . . shall carry on or be the proprietor of any encyclopædia, review, . . . or work published in a series of books or parts, or any book whatsoever, and shall have employed or shall employ any persons to compose the same . . . or any portions thereof for publication in or as part of the same, and such work . . . or portions shall have been or shall hereafter be composed under such employment, on the terms that the copyright therein shall belong to such proprietor, publisher, or conductor . . . and paid for by such proprietor, publisher, or conductor, the copyright in every such encyclopædia review, . . . and work published in a series of books or parts, and in every . . . part . . . and portion so composed and paid for, shall be the property of such proprietor, publisher, or other conductor, who shall enjoy the same rights as if he were the actual author thereof, and shall have such term of copyright therein as is given to the authors of books by this Act. . . . Provided also that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the right of any person, who shall have been or who shall be so employed as aforesaid, to publish any such his composition in a separate form, who by any contract express or implied may have reserved or may hereafter reserve to himself such right; but every author reserving such right shall be entitled to the copyright in such composition when published in a separate form, according to this Act, without prejudice to the right of such proprietor, publisher, or conductor as aforesaid."

Farwell, Q.C., and Ribton, for the appellants.—The plaintiff has no copyright in the "headings." The defendants and other canvassers employed by the plaintiff were really the authors or composers of these "headings." Under section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the plaintiff, as publisher, would only be entitled to copyright in the "headings" if it were a term of the employment between the plaintiff and the persons employed by him that the copyright in the headings should belong to the plaintiff. There is no such term contained in the agreement under which the defendants were employed; and the onus of proof that that was a term of the employment lies on the plaintiff: Walter v. Howe, 29 W. R. 776, 17 Ch. D. 708. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519, 16 C. B. 459, and read the passage (at p. 484) in the judgment of Maule, J., in that case, beginning with the words "it was urged that these reports were not within," and ending "the reports in question."] Then, on the question of agency, apart from copyright, the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants was in writing, and it contains no stipulation that the defendants are not to engage or assist in a similar business on the termination of their employment with the plaintiff; a negative stipulation to that effect cannot be read into a written document. There was nothing confidential in the materials collected—viz., the advertisements—by the defendants while in the plaintiff's employment; the materials were collected for the purpose of being made public; the defendants, therefore, cannot be restrained from using on their own behalf the materials so collected: Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron, 43 L. J. Ch. 661. [KAY, L.J., referred to Albert (Prince) v. Strange, 1 Mac. & G. 25, and Merryweather v. Moore, 40 W. R. 540, [1892] 2 Ch. 518.] The injunction as granted would prevent the defendants using or publishing any new copy of any block, even though at the request of the advertiser himself. It is not contrary to good faith for the defendants to use the information they acquired while in the plaintiff's employment. Conveyancers' pupils are in the habit of taking copies of the conveyancers' precedents and using them afterwards for their own purposes, and possibly in competition with the conveyancers from whom they obtained the information.

Abernethy v. Hutchinson, 3 L. J. (O. S.) Ch. 209; Morris v. Ashbee, L. R. 7 Eq. 34, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 34; and Kelly v. Morris, 14 W. R. 496, L. R. 1 Eq. 697, were also referred to.

Byrne, Q.C., and Morshead, for the plaintiff, the respondent, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—[The Lord Justice stated the facts, and proceeded:—] There is no stipulation in the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants that the defendants shall not engage in a similar kind of business. But the plaintiff relies for protection against what the defendants propose to do for the rival publication, first of all, upon his (the plaintiff's) copyright in his publication; and, secondly—as regards the use by the defendants of the blocks and materials—upon the principles of the law, not of copyright, but of agency.

First, as to the copyright. Chitty, J., has restrained the defendants from printing, selling, or publishing any copy or copies of so much of the plaintiff's book as consists of headings, not forming part of the advertisements therein, so, or in such a way, as to infringe the plaintiff's copyright in the headings. The defendants (the present appellants) contend that that part of the order is wrong, on the ground that the plaintiff has no copyright in that part of his work which is called "headings." The defendants say that that is not a subject-matter of copyright; and that, even if it were, there is no proof such as required by section 18 of the Copyright Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45) that the parts which Chitty, J., has protected of the plaintiff's work, have been published upon the terms that the copyright in them is vested in the plaintiff. As regards the point as to copyright in general—without for the moment considering the question as to section 18 of the Act—I rather think that Chitty, J., has not gone quite far enough. I do not myself see the difficulty in having a copyright in a sheet of advertisements. I do see a difficulty in having a copyright in a single advertisement, because, as Chitty, J., pointed out, that might prevent the advertiser from republishing his advertisement in another paper, which would be absurd. But to say that it follows from that that the proprietor of a publication—such as the Times, for example—has no copyright in a sheet of advertisements, so that he cannot restrain anyone from copying that sheet, appears to me, a very different proposition. A person having a copyright in a book has not a copyright in every word of it; he cannot restrain other persons using words to be found in his book. That is obvious enough; but it appears to me that Chitty, J., rather overlooked the difference between the right to publish a sentence out of the sheet of a paper and the right to publish a whole sheet. It is not necessary, however, to decide this point, and I do not decide it, as the plaintiff here does not claim an injunction larger than Chitty, J., has granted him.

As regards the particular portions—the "headings"—which Chitty, J., has protected, I do not think there is any real difficulty. It appears to me that the plaintiff has an exclusive right to the publication of those "headings," with the translations, and so forth—not that he can restrain other people from publishing the same sort of thing if they go about it in the right sort of way—but he has a right to restrain other people from copying his book. There is so much in common to the plaintiff's book and to other books of the same sort that they very likely will contain the same sort of information. It is like the case of a person who publishes a map of a particular country; another may publish a map of the same country, although the two maps may be exactly alike; but the first person can restrain the other from copying his map, which is a totally different thing.

I see no difficulty, either, in that part of the argument which turns on section 18 of the Copyright Act. [The Lord Justice read section 18 so far as material, and proceeded:—] Mr. Farwell's argument is that the plaintiff has not obtained the copyright in these headings, because he has not shown that they have been published upon the terms that the copyright therein should belong to the plaintiff. I think he is right in saying that the burthen of proof lies upon the plaintiff to show that they have been; but the statute says nothing at all about the kind of evidence to be resorted to for the purpose of proving that an article has been published on these terms. If there is no express agreement about it, it is left to inference. What is the inference to be drawn in a case of this sort, where regard must be had to the kind of article, which in the present instance consists of the "catch-words" or headings, with translations? I take it that the passage in the judgment of Maule, J., in Sweet v. Benning, 16 C. B., at p. 484, which I referred to in the course of the argument, may be fully acted upon—viz., that, primâ facie at all events, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be inferred from the fact of employment and payment that one of the terms was that the copyright should belong to the persons employed and paid. That is not the necessary inference, but in a case of this sort, where any other inference would be, I should say, unbusinesslike, I should not hesitate myself to draw that inference. That is not acting on the terms of an agreement, it is merely drawing an inference of fact from the employment and payment and from the kind of work which the one person was doing for the other. Having regard to those materials, the inference I should draw would be that this was done upon the terms that the copyright and all these things, which are of no use to anybody but the plaintiff, should be his. Therefore, so far as the copyright is concerned, it seems to me that Chitty, J., was perfectly right.

Another point is that this injunction goes on to restrain the defendants from using blocks or materials obtained by the defendants while in the employment of the plaintiff and for the purpose of his work, or any copies thereof, for the purpose of any works other than the work of the plaintiff. This point gave rise to some controversy, and it was pointed out that the expression "any copies thereof" might go a little too far, because those words unqualified would cover the case (which nobody thought of covering) of the advertiser getting back his block from the plaintiff (the block belonging to the advertiser), and, having got it back, applying to the defendant to print it, which, of course, the advertiser would have a perfect right to do. Mr. Byrne, however, not objecting, that difficulty will be obviated by adding, as a qualification to those words, that the order is not to prevent the defendants, or any of them, from publishing any copy of any block at the request or by the direction of the owner thereof.

That leaves only one matter still to be considered—viz., that part of the injunction which restrains the defendants from using blocks or materials. Mr. Farwell argued that the injunction goes too far as regards "materials"; but the whole—both blocks and materials—is qualified by this, that they are obtained by the defendants while in the employment of the plaintiffs and for the purpose of the plaintiffs' work. That raises the question—and it is one which has nothing to do with copyright—whether any agent has a right to use materials obtained by him in the course of his employment, and for his employer, against the interest of that employer. I am not aware of any such right. It appears to me that it would be contrary to the relation which exists between principal and agent. It is contrary to the good faith of the employment, and good faith underlies the whole of an agent's obligation to his principal. Subject to one observation which I will presently make, I should say that no case can be found which is contrary to the general principle upon which this injunction is framed. I do not think an agent has a right to employ, as against his principal, materials which the agent has obtained only for his principal and in the course of his agency. Such materials are the property of the principal in this sense, that the principal has such an interest in them as entitles him to restrain the agent from the use of them except for the purpose for which they were got. It is said that the case of Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron, before the late Master of the Rolls, is contrary to that. I think that case goes rather too far. If that case rests upon this—viz., that the application was merely interlocutory, and the Master of the Rolls, was not satisfied that the case was plain for an injunction—then it need not be questioned; but if it goes further than that, then there can, I think, be no doubt that the true principle was applied in that case more narrowly than it ought.

But in the present case I see no reason for questioning this part of the injunction; and, therefore, with the addition I have mentioned by way of qualification to the words "or copies thereof" in the order, this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. First, with regard to the headings. That the headings are the subject of copyright I do not think can be disputed. They are the result of literary labour both as regards the composition of the headings themselves, and their collocation and concatenation in the book. If they are the subject of copyright, in whom is the copyright? For that purpose we have to look to section 18 of the Act of 1842.

They were composed by persons who were employed and paid to compose them by the plaintiff. They are parts of a book. Mr. Farwell urged that the plaintiff was not entitled to the copyright in them, because the persons who composed them were not shown to have composed them on the terms that the copyright should belong to the plaintiff. To my mind, as between the plaintiff and the defendants, that point might easily be disposed of by saying that in the agreement between the two primâ facie evidence is afforded that the book and parts of the book thereafter belong to the plaintiff; by which, as a matter of business, one would understand that as to those of them which were susceptible of copyright, the copyright, as between the two, must be taken to belong to the plaintiff. But quite apart from the evidence inter partes which is in the nature of admission, it seems to me that the same result follows from a really intelligent application of the way in which these headings came into existence. Did they come into existence on the terms that the copyright should belong to the proprietor? It is clear law that the terms which are necessary as a condition precedent to the vesting of the copyright under section 18 need not be terms that are in writing. It is equally clear law that they need not be terms that are expressed; they are terms which may be either expressed, or which may be gathered from the transaction. For that proposition, if authority be necessary, Sweet v. Benning is a sufficient authority. But I do not apprehend that it could be doubted that that would be the true interpretation of the section apart from authority. From where are you to collect the terms? You are to collect the terms from what passed between the parties it is true—i.e., in this case between the plaintiff and the persons whom he employed—but one may also collect the terms from the nature of the business itself. It seems to me to be impossible, as a matter of business, to suppose that these headings were composed and furnished to the plaintiff upon any other terms than that he was to have the copyright in them, because otherwise, having furnished them to the plaintiff, those who composed them might have published them themselves, and defeated the plaintiff's object. It appears to me that the headings are matters in which copyright can exist, and that the plaintiff is entitled to copyright in them.

With regard to the prints and illustrations, it is equally clear law that the prints—and I am not referring to separate prints, but to prints which are part and parcel of the book—are covered by the law of copyright, and I should have thought that the prints in this book, as distinct from the prints separate from the book (which is a totally different thing) were the subject of copyright; and I should have said, in the same way, that in this book they are the copyright of the plaintiff.

With regard to the advertisements—though it is not necessary to decide that—I am by no means satisfied that Chitty, J., did not take on this interlocutory motion rather a narrower view of the law of copyright as it applies to those advertisements than perhaps he would take at the hearing. It is perfectly true that each separate advertisement may not have become in its separate form, and as a distinct entity, the copyright of the plaintiff, but in respect of the collocation and concatenation of the advertisements, nevertheless, he would have a copyright—just as I believe the proprietor of the Times would have a right of action against any other paper that took the whole (or a substantial part of the whole) sheet of the Times with the advertisements as therein arranged, and reprinted and republished it in their columns after the Times had once had it, although the proprietors of the Times might not have a right of preventing any person, who furnished them with an advertisement, inserting the advertisment in some other paper, because I think that the terms upon which they received the advertisement would be obvious, and would show that it was not intended to vest the copyright in them in respect of that. But it is not necessary to decide this point as to the advertisements, as it is not really before us at present.

Then we come to the second part of the case. Ought not the plaintiff to be allowed to restrain the defendants from using such blocks and materials, or copies, as they obtained while in the employment of the plaintiff and for the purposes of the service and of the work which they had to do—that is to say, which they obtained really for the purpose of doing their duty to the plaintiff? Ought not the plaintiff to be able to restrain the defendants from using those materials and those documents in competition with the plaintiff himself afterwards? It is not a question of copyright. I agree that copyright must be kept out of sight altogether; nor is it, I may observe, a simple question of the absolute property at law in the documents themselves or in the blocks themselves. It is a question of whether the plaintiff—whatever the property in the documents or the materials may be—has not sufficient special property in the matters to entitle him to restrain the use of them against himself, when they were really obtained in the course of the agents' employment for his (the principal's) own use. That depends entirely, I think, upon the terms upon which the employment was constituted upon which the fiduciary relation of principal and agent came into existence. The other Lords Justices have already, in the course of the argument, expressed what I fully believe to be the correct view—that there is no distinction between law and equity as regards the law of principal and agent. The common law, it is true, treats the matter from the point of view of an implied contract; because it assumes that there is a promise to do that which is part of the bargain, or can be fairly implied as part of the good faith which is necessary to make the bargain effectual. What is an implied contract or an implied promise at law? Why it is that promise which the law implies and authorizes us to infer, in order to give the transaction that minimum of equity which the parties must have intended it should have, and without which the transaction would be unintelligible and futile. I agree that there may be cases of businesses in which the terms would differ, and where the terms as to the use which might be made of materials obtained might be necessarily different.

But let us take the case of this business as a business of an ordinary kind. An employer gives his agent the means (by employing him) of obtaining in his name, and for the purposes of the contract, certain materials and certain information which has been committed, for the purposes of that contract, to writing. Is it intelligible that the bargain made between the principal and agent should be any other than one which implies that the agent was not—having obtained this under the cover of this agency—to turn round and use the materials against his employer as soon as the agency is determined? It seems to me that in this case the proper inference to be drawn would be that it was part of the understanding that these materials were not to be used otherwise than for the purposes of the employment in the course of which they were obtained. It is true that you must find out the terms here, as elsewhere, partly from the written document and partly from all the surroundings of the written document, such as the nature of the transaction with regard to which the document is brought into life. But it is not true to say that because you cannot find it in the written document itself, or by any implication to be extracted from the words used, that therefore you are not to imply it. You must take the words used with reference to the subject-matter about which they are used, and taking the subject-matter and the document together you must ask yourself what is the necessary implication to be drawn.

Nothing could be a clearer illustration of the way in which you are to treat this examination of the inference of fact to be drawn than the well-known cases cited in the argument in this case. One of these, Abernethy's case, is a typical instance. There a student attending Abernethy's lectures proposed afterwards to publish the lectures for profit. That case was very near the dividing line. The question there depended upon what was the real relation which must have been understood by both parties to have been created between the student and the lecturer. Was it possible to suppose that the student was to be at liberty to destroy the value of the lectures, to the lecturer, by publishing them for profit afterwards? The Lord Chancellor thought not, and on that line the case was decided. Mr. Farwell put another case by way of illustration, the case of a pupil in a conveyancer's chambers. It is true that the pupil carries away the conveyancer's precedents for his own use and profit afterwards, but that is because it is the understanding between the parties. The pupil goes to learn and to carry away precedents for his own use and profit afterwards by a purely traditional understanding of the profession; and that case accordingly would fall on the other side of the line. It does not, however, follow from that, that a student who goes to a conveyancer could take all the precedents of the conveyancer and publish them in a book as against the conveyancer afterwards; that would fall more on the line of Abernethy's case. You must look at the whole transaction, and consider what the parties must at least have intended, in order to give the transaction any business-like efficiency at all. If you see that it could not have been intended by the parties that the agent should be allowed to deal with materials in this way, then the law will imply that that was part of the bargain. It was said by Mr. Farwell that it must have been intended that the confidential fetter imposed upon the use of these documents should terminate as soon as the book was published, for which they were being compiled; otherwise, that we should be importing the question of copyright into the discussion of this branch of the case. On the contrary, it is by insisting on that view that he imports the idea of copyright into this branch of the case. That question has nothing to do with it. It is perfectly true that you must look at the whole transaction to see what the documents and materials had been collected for; but that would by no means sufficiently protect the employer if the agent was to be left free to do what he liked with the materials the moment the volume was published. That argument, it seems to me, does not apply.

The only case at all inconsistent with the law as expressed, in my opinion, by the Legislature, and as I have tried to explain it, is Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron. The actual decision in that case was doubtless right, but I do not think that the language which Sir George Jessel is reported to have used can be supported as sound law. It seems to me that if the language of Sir George Jessel is to be read as justifying the action of the defendants in that case as a matter of law or as a matter of equity, it cannot be justified to the extent to which that learned judge goes. I cannot find that Reuter's case has ever been cited as an authority since; but whether cited as an authority or not, it is not a case the language of which I should myself be at all prepared to follow.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In the first place, I have no doubt that the headings used in this book of the plaintiff's are themselves the subject of copyright. The headings are a short description of the particular trades which are there gathered together; but each separate heading of those is put so that the proper catchwords occur first in alphabetical order in the book, and each of those headings is repeated in three other languages after the English heading has been put there. I am not quite satisfied at present that the defendants themselves, or persons in their position, furnished the whole of these headings. Mr. Farwell did not satisfy me that the evidence showed that the defendants, or any agent of the plaintiffs, furnished or had anything to do with the English headings. However, each English heading was certainly translated by persons in the position of agents of the plaintiff, and these translations were supplied by persons who were employed to do it for that purpose. Suppose all the headings — English, French, German, and Spanish, which are the languages used — were supplied by the defendants, and were arranged for that purpose by the plaintiff. They are published in the plaintiff's book in a certain alphabetical order, and in each case are followed by a series of advertisements, rightly coming under each particular heading. Mr. Farwell contended that if there were any copyright whatever in these headings—which I understand he denied—it must be the copyright of the persons who composed them, because, in order to make them the copyright of the owner of the book, it is necessary, under section 18 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, for the owner of the book to prove that it was a term of the arrangement between him and his agent, the composer, that the copyright should belong to the owner of the book. I will accept that statement of the law. In the first place, these headings are, from their nature, the subject of copyright. There is sufficient literary labour involved in the production of them to make them properly the subject of copyright. I will assume that the whole of the English composition of these headings and all the translations into the other languages were prepared by an agent of the plaintiff. Neither the statute, nor any principle of law that I am aware of, makes it necessary that the terms, as between the owner of the book and the person he employs as composer that the copyright should belong to the owner of the book, should be in writing. In fact, the decisions are to the contrary. The decisions show that you may establish that in any way by the usual rules of evidence. In the present case we have to deal with a very bulky book, with numerous things in it prepared doubtless by numerous hands: one person possibly furnishing the headings and others furnishing the translations. We are not informed precisely how it was done, but probably it was done in some such way. Surely the "fair" inference from the facts of the case is that the person who goes to the expense of printing and publishing this book, as between him and the agents whom he may have employed to assist him in the compilation of it, will have whatever property the law will give him in that book in himself. In the absence of any distinct evidence to the contrary, the primâ facie inference which I should certainly draw in this case is, that the terms of the employment of the several agents involved this, that the copyright in that production, which was to be treated as the subject of this book, should belong to the owner of the book.

I will add a few words on the other part of the case, which involves a perfectly different question, which has nothing whatever to do with copyright.

The defendants were persons employed by the plaintiff upon the Continental part of this book, which is a small part comparatively. They were employed in various countries of Europe to travel about and to obtain from manufacturing producers of all sorts and kinds authority from them to enter, under the particular heading to which their respective businesses related, advertisements of the names and addresses of the manufacturers, and in some cases of the trade-marks of those particular individuals whom I will call advertisers in this book; and each person who chose to furnish his name and address and sufficient particulars could obtain the insertion of an advertisement under the proper heading in this book on the payment of a certain sum which the agent—he is called agent in the contract—was to receive. He was to receive it, of course, on behalf of his principal, but as between his principal and himself it was part of the agreement that he should deduct and retain from that a very large commission—a percentage of 65 per cent. in one case and 62½ per cent. in the other case. In doing what had to be done by the agent there would come into his hands various materials. He would probably have a note-book containing all the information collected from the people whom he canvassed, and he would also get certain blocks from which the trade-marks and things of that kind were in some cases printed in these advertisements. His duty was to put these advertisements into shape, from such materials as he obtained; sometimes, it is true, they might be a mere copy or translation of a foreign advertisement given him by the particular advertisers. Whatever the materials were, his duty was to put them into shape and translate them into English, and then to transmit them to the plaintiff, his employer, to be printed under the proper heading in this book. That was the process. I suppose that each of these defendants had a note-book which contained practically all the materials which he has supplied to this book, including the headings which he may have copied into his note-book. The part of the injunction complained of on this point is the restraining the defendants from displaying or using for the purpose of obtaining advertisements for any book other than the plaintiff's work, so much of the copy of the plaintiff's book already printed as consists of the headings, and from using (and this is the part now complained of) blocks or materials obtained by the defendants, or either of them, while in the employment of the plaintiff and for the purpose of the plaintiff's work, or any copy thereof, for the purpose of any work other than the plaintiff's work.

It was asked, on behalf of the defendants, why should they not retain these note-books, having now left the plaintiff's employ, and use them in order to find out the persons abroad with whom they had formerly entered into engagements, and to obtain from those advertisers authority to put advertisements of theirs into a publication to be used as a rival to the plaintiff's book? The answer is a very simple one. All those materials were obtained while you, the defendants, were acting as the plaintiff's agents, while you were in that confidential relation to him, and for the purpose for which he employed and paid you—viz., of compiling this book of the plaintiff's; and, therefore, to allow you to use any of those materials for your own purposes would be allowing you to use them for a purpose for which they were not compiled; you being, when you compiled them, in the position of the plaintiff's agent, and there being a confidential relation between you and the plaintiff.

Turning to one of the leading cases on this subject, I will read the language of Turner, V.C., in Morison v. Moat, 9 Ha. 241, at p. 255: "That the court has exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature does not, I think, admit of any question. Different grounds have, indeed, been assigned for the exercise of that jurisdiction. In some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract, or in others again it has been treated as founded upon trust or confidence, meaning, as I conceive, that the court fastens the obligation on the conscience of the party, and enforces it against him in the same manner as it enforces against a party to whom a benefit is given the obligation of performing a promise on the faith of which the benefit has been conferred; but upon whatever grounds the jurisdiction is founded, the authorities leave no doubt as to the exercise of it." Then the judgment goes on to give several instances, many of them being cases where a man, being in the employment of another, has discovered the secrets of the manufacture of that other person, or has surreptitiously copied something which came under his hands while he was in the possession of that trust and confidence, and he has been restrained from communicating that secret to anybody else, and anybody who obtained that secret from him has also been restrained from using it. [The Lord Justice then read the passages (9 Ha., at p. 256) in the judgment of Turner, V.C., in Morison v. Moat commenting on Abernethy's case and Prince Albert v. Strange; and continued:—] I think, therefore, that the doctrine does extend to every case in which a man has obtained materials—and I use that word advisedly, because it would be very difficult to grant an injunction to prevent a man using his knowledge—while in the position of agent for another, and which were obtained by him in the course of that agency to use for the purposes for which his principal had employed him. In such case it is not going too far to say that he shall not use those materials for any other purpose than the purpose for which he was employed to obtain them, and the employer, if he can make out that the intended use is one which would tend to damage him, has a distinct right to an injunction against the agent.

Mr. Farwell has ingeniously asked that, assuming that the doctrine would extend to prevent the use of materials obtained for the purpose of the principal's publication, why should not the agent be at liberty to use them after the publication of the principal has been issued to the world? I would answer that question in the words used by Turner, V.C., in another part of his judgment in Morison v. Moat. [His lordship read the passage (9 Ha., at p. 258) commencing with the words, "It was much pressed," and ending with the words "good title against the defendant," and proceeded:—] That seems to me a complete answer. The jurisdiction against the defendants exists because these materials which they want to use, were obtained by them while they were in the position of agents for the plaintiff. Even if it were established that the plaintiff could not prevent anybody else in the world from publishing or using these materials which the plaintiff wishes to prevent the defendants from using, that would be no answer to the plaintiff's claim for an injunction against the defendants, because the defendants, from the position in which they were, are put under a duty towards the plaintiff not to make this use of the materials. Subject to the verbal correction made in the order by Lindley, L.J., I do not think that the order of the court below goes at all too far. [His lordship added that on the evidence before the court, the inclination of his view as to whether any copyright existed in the advertisements or in the publication of the advertisements collected and arranged as they were, was that there was a copyright in them, but he considered it unnecessary to express any confident opinion on that point.]

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rye & Eyre.

Solicitor for the respondent, Cecil J. Rawlinson.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Jan. 31.

ELLIS v. GOULTON AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Principal and agent—Sale of land—Vendor and purchaser—Payment of deposit to vendor's solicitor—Recovery of deposit on sale going off—Liability of solicitor—Following trust money.

Upon a sale of land the purchaser, in accordance with the conditions of sale, paid to the vendor's solicitor, as agent for the vendor, a deposit upon the purchase-money. The vendor being unable to make a good title, the sale went off, and the purchaser sued the vendor's solicitor to recover the deposit money.

Held, that, as the solicitor received the money solely as agent of the vendor, the action would not lie against him at the suit of the purchaser.

Appeal by the defendant Jackson from the judgment of Cave, J., in an action to recover a sum of £100 which had been paid to Jackson by the plaintiff as a deposit upon the purchase of certain land.

The defendant Goulton was the vendor and the defendant Jackson acted as his solicitor in the matter of the sale.

The land was put up for sale, one of the conditions of sale being that the purchaser should pay to the vendor's solicitor, as agent for the vendor, a deposit of £10 per cent. upon the purchase-money.

The plaintiff purchased the property, and paid to the defendant Jackson £100 as a deposit, and Jackson signed a memorandum of receipt as agent for the vendor. The latter being unable to make a good title to the property, the plaintiff brought this action to recover the deposit.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared that Jackson did not pay this sum to Goulton, but retained it against disbursements made by him on account of Goulton; but it appeared also that Jackson, in an account which he sent in to Goulton, did not include this sum of £100.

There was evidence that when the sale went off Goulton directed Jackson to repay the deposit to the plaintiff.

At the trial Cave, J., directed a verdict for the plaintiff as against Jackson as well as against Goulton, and gave judgment accordingly.

The defendant Jackson appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for Jackson.—The deposit was received by Jackson as agent for Goulton, and, therefore, it is the same as if it had been paid to Goulton. The contract was made by the plaintiff with Goulton, and Jackson cannot be made liable to the plaintiff.

They referred to Edgell v. Day, 14 W. R. 87, L. R. 1 C. P. 80; Bamford v. Shuttleworth, 11 A. & E. 926; Stephens v. Badcock, 3 B. & Ad. 354.

Channell, Q.C., and T. Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff.—This money was to be returned to the plaintiff if the sale went off. Jackson received it on those terms. There was a fiduciary relation between the plaintiff and Goulton, and this money can be followed. The money was kept separate and capable of ascertainment by Jackson, and, therefore, can be followed in his hands. It was omitted by him from the account he sent in to Goulton.

They referred to In re Hallett's Estate, Knatchbull v. Hallett, 28 W. R. 732, 13 Ch. D. 696.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The defendant Goulton had some property, which he desired to sell, and he employed the defendant Jackson, a solicitor, to carry out the sale. The property was sold subject to certain conditions, one being that the purchaser should pay a deposit upon the purchase money. If the deposit had been paid to the auctioneer, inasmuch as an auctioneer acts for both vendor and purchaser, he would receive it on behalf of both to be handed over to one or other of them in one or other event. In this case, however, the deposit was paid to Jackson, who was the vendor's solicitor, as agent for, and on account of, the vendor. That was a payment to the vendor himself through the hands of Jackson, who received it for the vendor. Title to the property not being made out, the purchaser became entitled to have the deposit repaid to him. Under these circumstances Jackson never was in the relationship of agent to the purchaser. He was acting solely as agent to the vendor. There was no relationship at all between Jackson and the purchaser, and consequently there was no fiduciary relation between them. It is said, however, that what happened between Jackson and the vendor made Jackson liable as trustee of the deposit for the purchaser. The answer to that is that as between Jackson and the purchaser there never was any contract, whether of bailment or otherwise, nor was there any relation, as principal and agent, between them, and no authority has been cited to us to show that there was any fiduciary relation between them. In the cases that have been cited the distinction is pointed out between a stakeholder, who is the agent of both parties, and a person who is agent for one of the parties only. The question of following trust money only arises where a fiduciary relation exists. In this case there was no fiduciary relation. The judgment as against the defendant Jackson must therefore be reversed and judgment must be entered for him.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When a purchaser makes a deposit he may make a special agreement that the person to whom the deposit is paid shall hold it as agent for both vendor and purchaser. That would make the person who receives the deposit a stakeholder. In the present case the deposit was paid to the vendor's agent without any such agreement, and that is the same thing as if it had been paid to the vendor himself. If so, it is impossible to treat the money in the hands of the agent as impressed with any trust for the purchaser. The solicitor of the vendor is not in the position of a stakeholder, nor is there any privity of contract between him and the purchaser. The cases of Bamford v. Shuttleworth and Edgell v. Day show this.

It is said, however, that the facts here show that this money was impressed with a trust in favour of the purchaser, and that accordingly the money can be followed. In the first place, there was no fiduciary relation at all here. In the next place, even if there was a fiduciary relation, money can only be followed as long as it is kept separate in the sense of being capable of ascertainment. This money was not kept separate by the defendant Jackson at all, but was spent by him for his principal on the faith of the money being available in his hands. There was no separate existence of this fund, and therefore, even if the equitable doctrine of following trust money applied, the doctrine could not be applied here.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This money was received by Jackson solely as the agent of the vendor. How is it sought to make Jackson liable? He cannot be sued in contract. It is said that Goulton was in a fiduciary position towards the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff can follow the money in the hands of Jackson. But before money can be followed a fiduciary relation must exist, which is not the case here. Further, this money did not remain as money in Jackson's hands, and therefore in any case cannot be followed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Harvey & Capron, for Kenyon & Son, Thorne.

Solicitor for the defendants, H. R. P. Brooke.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. — March 15.

STEVENS v. TREVOR-GARRICK. (a.)

Married woman—Separate estate—Settlement by husband and wife—Infancy of wife—Subsequent repudiation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 2, 19.

The 19*th section of the Married Women's Property Act*, 1882, enacts that nothing in the Act shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement respecting a married woman's property.

Any property of a woman married after the commencement of the Act which would have been bound, apart from the Act, by an assignment of the husband alone in a settlement, is still bound by such assignment in virtue of the 19th section, notwithstanding the second section of the Act, which makes the property of a woman married after the Act her separate property.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hancock v. Hancock, 36 W. R. 417, 38 Ch. D. 78, applied and followed.

In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816, W. N., 1884, 225, not followed.

Summons.

By an ante-nuptial settlement, dated in April, 1890, the parties to which were the intended husband, the intended wife, who was then an infant, and the trustees, after reciting that the intended wife would upon her marriage become entitled to £1,000 payable by way of dowry out of the Bombay Civil Service Fund, but that such sum should be retained by the India Office until she should attain the age of twenty-one years, and recitingan agreement that the £1,000 should be assigned to the trustees upon the trusts therein declared concerning the same, the intended wife and the intended husband respectively assigned to the trustees the £1,000, to be held by them upon the usual trusts for the benefit of the intended wife, her husband, and children. This settlement was not made under the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855.

The marriage was shortly afterwards solemnized, and notice of the above assignment of the £1,000 was given by the trustees to the India Office.

In October, 1891, the wife attained the age of twenty-one years, and thereupon disaffirmed the said settlement, and by a deed poll of the 19th of May, 1892, she formally repudiated and disavowed the same, and declared her execution of the indenture of settlement to be null and void.

The rules of the Bombay Fund did not make the £1,000 payable to the wife for her separate use. The wife claimed, notwithstanding, to be absolutely entitled to it; but the authorities at the India Office declined, under the circumstances, to pay it either to her or to the trustees. The trustees then brought the present action against the husband and wife for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court upon the question; and the present summons was taken out by the plaintiffs in the action, asking for a declaration that the plaintiffs as trustees of the said indenture of settlement, were entitled to the £1,000.

Vernon R. Smith, for the plaintiffs.—This fund would only have been the separate property of the wife by virtue of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, making the property of a woman married after the Act her separate property. But section 19 of the Act says that nothing in the Act is to interfere with any settlement; and the effect of that section in connection with section 2 is that this fund is bound by the husband's assignment notwithstanding the Act, as is shown by Hancock v. Hancock, 36 W. R. 417, 38 Ch. D. 78. That was a decision of the Court of Appeal on the effect of section 19 in connection with section 5, but the reasoning is quite as applicable to section 2. See also In re Johnson, Moore v. Johnson, 39 W. R. 509, [1891] 3 Ch. 48; In re Stonor's Trusts, 24 Ch. D. 195, 31 W. R. Dig. 169; In re Whitaker, Christian v. Whitaker, 35 W. R. 217, 34 Ch. D. 227. The trustees are, therefore, entitled to the fund.

Brinton, for the defendants.—The fund, if settled at all, is settled by the husband, and not by the wife, and that the wife's separate property should be bound in such a case could never have been intended by the Legislature, see In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816, W. N. 1884, 225. [CHITTY, J.—That case was not approved of in Hancock v. Hancock.] There being now no settlement by the wife, there is no settlement within the meaning of section 19; and this fund belongs to her absolutely by virtue of section 2.

CHITTY, J.—The 19th section relates to settlements made or to be made, to be made that is at any time after the passing of the Act, not only to settlements made before the Act.

The settlement here was made before the marriage. The wife became entitled after marriage to a sum of £1,000, which was not settled to her separate use, and would have been her husband's, apart from the Act, had there been no settlement. Both assigned the fund to the trustees. The lady was an infant at the time, and now disaffirms the settlement. It was argued that there was no settlement here within the meaning of section 19. In my opinion there is a settlement which, apart from the Act, would be a valid settlement by the husband. The Court of Appeal has held that the words "Nothing in this Act contained" in section 19 include section 5, see the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Hancock v. Hancock. The reasoning of that judgment is as applicable to section 2 as to section 5, and I am bound by the principle of that decision. I cannot say that section 2 is excluded from the operation of section 19 if section 5 is not. The trustees are therefore entitled to this sum of £1,000.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lovell, Son, & Pitfield.

Solicitor for the defendants, A. J. Nash, for Ginn & Matthew, Cambridge.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Nov. 15; March 18.

In re BEDINGFIELD, NORRIS, AND HERRING. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Settlement—Power of sale by trustees, with consent of tenant for life—Incumbrances on life estate—Bankruptcy of tenant for life—Concurrence of trustee in bankruptcy and incumbrancers.

The trustees of a settlement were empowered to sell the property comprised therein, with the consent in writing of the tenant for life. They sold the property at a public auction. The tenant for life was bankrupt, and had encumbered his life estate. The trustees refused to procure any consent but that of the tenant for life.

Held, that the concurrence of the incumbrancers and the assignees in bankruptcy of the tenant for life was essential in order to effect the sale.

Adjourned summons.

By a post-nuptial settlement, dated the 3rd of December, 1878, H. W. Nevill assigned the trust funds comprised therein to R. P. Bedingfield and A. J. Norris, as trustees, upon trust for himself for life and as therein mentioned. The settlement empowered the trustees to lay out the funds in the purchase of lands, tenements, &c., at the request of Nevill, to be held by the trustees upon trust for sale with the consent in writing of Nevill during his life. In 1886 Nevill purchased a property known as "The Pines." In August, 1887, Bedingfield and Norris, as trustees of the settlement of 1878, purchased "The Pines" from Nevill. On the 2nd of June, 1892, the trustees sold "The Pines" to Herring at a public auction subject to conditions of sale. The 7th condition was to the effect that Nevill, who in 1886 purchased "The Pines," had executed a post-nuptial settlement with powers to the trustees at his request to lay out the trust funds in land, &c., and hold them on trust for sale with

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nevill's consent, that no objection should be taken to the title on account of the trustees having purchased from Nevill, and that neither the consent of Nevill nor that of the beneficiaries under the settlement was to be required in the conveyance, but that Nevill's written consent would be given afterwards. In the course of his inquiries the purchaser ascertained that Nevill had incumbered his life estate and had become bankrupt. In his requisitions on the abstract of title the purchaser required the consent of Nevill's trustee in bankruptcy and the incumbrancers on his life interest. The trustees refused to procure such consent, or any but that of Nevill.

This was a summons by the purchaser under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for a declaration that the requisitions were not sufficiently answered, that the consent of the trustee in bankruptcy of Nevill and the incumbrancers on his life interest was necessary to effect the sale, and that the purchaser was not precluded by the 7th condition from making such requisitions.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Micklem, for the purchaser, referred to Hardaker v. Moorhouse, 32 W. R. 638, 26 Ch. D. 417; Cooper v. Slight, 32 W. R. 1015, 27 Ch. D. 565; Badham v. Mee, 7 Bing. 695, 1 My. & K. 32; Jones v. Winwood, 3 M. & W. 653, 10 Sim. 150; Hole v. Escott, 4 My. & Cr. 187, 2 Keen, 444; Leigh v. Ashburton, 11 Beav. 470; Morgan v. Rutson, 16 Sim. 234; Warburton v. Farn, 16 Sim. 625; Hurst v. Hurst, 1 W. R. 105, 16 Beav. 372; Hill v. Pritchard, 2 W. R. 297, Kay, 395; Long v. Rankin, Sugden on Powers, Appx. 895, ed. of 1861; Eisdell v. Hammersley, 31 Beav. 255, 10 W. R. Dig. 66; Simpson v. Bathurst, 18 W. R. 772, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 193; Alexander v. Mills, 19 W. R. 310, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 124; In re Sebright, 35 W. R. 49, 33 Ch. D. 429; Cardigan v. Curzon, 37 W. R. 247, 40 Ch. D. 338; and In re New Land Development Association v. Gray, 40 W. R. 295, 551 [1892] 2 Ch. 138.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the vendors, relied on Walmsley v. Butterworth, Coote on Mortgages, 2nd ed., p. 698; and Holdsworth v. Goose, 9 W. R. 443, 29 Beav. 111.

March 18.—NORTH, J.—In this case the contention of the vendors was partly rested, in the first instance, on the 7th condition of sale. But that condition was framed for a totally different purpose. It was intended to preclude any objection upon the ground that the person who was entitled to call upon the trustees to purchase was himself the vendor to them, and for that object was clear and efficient. But in my opinion it would have been impossible to take advantage of it to defeat an objection arising out of a subsequent alienation (not disclosed in the conditions) of the vendor's life interest in the purchased property, if, but for such condition, the objection would have been well founded, and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, apparently taking the same view, did not press that objection.

Upon the main question I think it clearly settled by a long course of authorities that, if an owner of a limited interest with power of selling, or requesting, or directing, or consenting to a sale, disposes of his interest, the power is not extinguished, but is still capable of being exercised by him so far as such exercise does not derogate from or interfere with his previous disposition.

I do not think it necessary to refer to any earlier case than Jones v. Winwood, where an estate was settled to the joint appointment of husband and wife, and, in default, to the use of the husband and wife in succession for life (with intervening remainders to a trustee to preserve), with successive remainders to the sons and daughters in tail and to the husband in fee simple. In 1824 the husband became insolvent, and on his discharge from prison bargained and sold all his real and personal estate to the provisional assignee, who subsequently conveyed it to the plaintiff Jones. In 1828 the husband and wife in exercise of their joint power appointed the property to Brown in fee. Upon a subsequent sale by Jones, Brown, and the husband, to the defendant Winwood, the latter objected to the title upon the ground that the conveyance by the husband destroyed the joint power; and in the action commenced against him for specific performance the Court of Exchequer decided on a case sent for their opinions that the joint power had not been determined, and had been validly exercised, but that such exercise did not affect the husband's original interest (viz., his life estate and ultimate remainder in fee), which had been previously conveyed away by him, as he could not by exercising his power derogate from his own conveyance. This decision was adopted and confirmed by the Vice-Chancellor, and specific performance with costs was decreed against the purchaser: 10 Sim. 150. This case has never been dissented from, but has often been adopted and followed. In Hole v. Escott the circumstances were very similar, and it was held that a husband could not join his wife in exercising a power of appointment so as to interfere with the rights of the person who had purchased his life estate and ultimate remainder in fee from the assignees in bankruptcy of such husband. In Warburton v. Farn trustees of a money settlement had power to invest in land, and afterwards to sell, with the consent of the tenant for life. After a purchase of land had been made, the tenant for life sold his life interest. It was held that such alienation did not deprive him of the power of consenting to a subsequent sale by the trustees. It was clear that the power was not destroyed, but was still subsisting, and though it could not be exercised so as to prejudice the rights of the purchaser of the tenant for life's interest, still, as the conveyance to such purchaser expressly recognized the continuance of the right of the tenant for life to consent to a sale, and as, moreover, the purchaser of the life interest offered to concur in the sale by the trustees specific performance was enforced against the purchaser from them. In Hurst v. Hurst a tenant for life with power of charging portions mortgaged his life interest and covenanted not to exercise that power. He did subsequently exercise it in favour of persons who had notice of the mortgage, and it was held that the power was well exercised, but that the portioners could only come in behind the mortgagee. In Eisdell v. Hammersley it was held that a power in trustees to sell real estate with the consent of husband and wife, successive tenants for life, was exercisable after the husband's bankruptcy by the trustees with the consent of the tenants for life, and the assigns of the husband's interest, all of whom were willing to concur. In Simpson v. Bathurst a tenant for life had power to renew leases for lives, taking for his own benefit the fines on renewals. He first mortgaged his life interest, and afterwards became bankrupt. It was decided that the power of renewal was still continuing, but could only be exercised with the concurrence of the mortgagee and of the trustee in bankruptcy. In Alexander v. Mills trustees had a power to sell real estate at the request and by the direction of the tenant for life, who was also the owner of the ultimate reversion in fee. After he had absolutely conveyed away his whole interest for value the trustees sold the property under their power at the request of both the tenant for life and his alienee to a purchaser who objected to the title. The Master of the Rolls held that the power was destroyed and incapable of being exercised by reason of such alienation. The Court of Appeal held that the power was not destroyed, but existed, and could be exercised with the concurrence of the alienee. In Hardaker v. Moorhouse I expressed a doubt whether the concurrence of the alienee was a material part of the decision. Upon further consideration I think it was. But that case has no bearing on the present. Lastly, in In re Cooper, Cooper v. Slight, where trustees had, with the consent of a tenant for life, a power of advancement in favour of a child, which they wished to exercise, it was held that the power of consenting was not, indeed, extinguished by the bankruptcy of the tenant for life, but could only be exercised with the consent of his trustee in bankruptcy.

In opposition to this series of decisions Mr. Cozens-Hardy relies on two cases—Walmsley v. Butterworth and Holdsworth v. Goose. The former case is only reported in the appendix to Coote on Mortgages, 2nd ed., p. 698. The plaintiff there was tenant for life with remainders over. The trustees had a power of sale on his request and direction. The tenant for life first mortgaged his life estate and afterwards contracted to sell to the defendant, who was a willing purchaser, but objected that the power of sale was extinguished by the alienation, and that the defect could only be cured by a reconveyance by the mortgagee before sale or by the mortgagee's joining in the conveyance to the purchaser, either of which courses the mortgagee was willing to take. The court decided (as I understand the report) that the power was not extinguished, and that a good title could be made in the way proposed. But the only question there was whether a title could be made, even with the assistance of the mortgagee. It was not decided or suggested that the consent of the mortgagee, which the vendors offered to procure, was unnecessary or could be dispensed with, nor that a good title could be made without his concurrence, and unless the case goes that length it does not help the present vendors.

In the case of Holdsworth v. Goose the facts were very similar to those in the last case; there was a settlement of land on husband for life, with a limitation over on his parting with his interest, remainder to the wife for life, with remainders to children of the marriage, and with power to the trustees to sell "at the request and by the direction of the husband and wife during their joint lives." The husband afterwards became bankrupt, and subsequently the trustees, on the joint request of the husband and wife, sold to the defendant. His advisers objected to the title. All parties were anxious to complete, including the purchaser and the assignees of the husband, who offered to give a request in writing or join in the conveyance. A special case stated for the opinion of the court raised two questions—first, whether the power was extinguished by the bankruptcy, and, second, whether the request and direction given by the husband and wife were sufficient to enable the trustees to exercise the power, and whether they could, with or without their consent and direction, make a good title and convey effectually. The Master of the Rolls held that the power remained, that the case was exactly like Walmsley v. Butterworth, and that the sale by the trustees by direction of the husband and wife, with the consent of the assignees, would give a perfect title, and he added that the first question must be answered in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

The remarks I have made as to Walmsley v. Butterworth apply to this case also, but Mr. Cozens-Hardy contends that it is an authority in his favour because the second question and answer, expressly affirm that a good title could be made either with or without the concurrence of the assignees. This criticism on the language is correct, but there is no substance in it. The Master of the Rolls expressly said that the sale "with the consent of the assignees" would give a good title. They did consent and were anxious that the sale should go through. The question whether their concurrence could be dispensed with or was immaterial never arose nor was argued or decided, and the argument founded upon the literal construction of the very words of the second question and answer is of no weight.

Applying the authorities to the present case, the trust property is now land, to the rents and profits of which the incumbrancers and assignees of Mr. Nevill are entitled. It is proposed to convert the land into money and to substitute the income arising from the investment of the net proceeds of sale for the rents and profits. For this the consent in writing of Mr. Nevill is necessary. His giving such consent would clearly affect the interests which he, or the law acting for him, have created; and this cannot be done without derogating from Mr. Nevill's dispositions thus made. Under these circumstances I think it clear that the requisitions have not been sufficiently answered, and that the concurrence of the incumbrancers and assignees in bankruptcy of Mr. Nevill in the sale is essential; and as the vendors have declined to procure the consent of those persons they must pay the costs of this application.

Solicitors for the purchaser, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Rackham, Norwich.

Solicitors for the vendors, Norris & Norris.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew, J.) Feb. 18, 28.

DRIVER v. BROAD. (a.)

Frauds, Statute of, s. 4—Debenture—Debenture charging undertaking and property of company and creating floating security—Contract for sale of such debenture —Necessity for written contract—"Interest in land."

A debenture, issued by a company carrying on the business of candle manufacturers, charged with the payment of principal and interest "the undertaking and all the property of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital," and the charge created by the debenture was to be a floating security upon the property and rights of the company.

Held, that a contract for the sale and purchase of the debenture, was a contract for an interest in land within the meaning of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and that the contract must be in writing.

Further consideration by Mathew, J., of an action tried by him with a jury.

The action was for damages for breach of a contract to purchase debentures and shares in a company called Broad's Patent Night Light Co. (Limited).

The plaintiff alleged in his statement of claim that he had suffered damage by breach of a verbal contract for the sale and transfer by the plaintiff to the defendant of twenty debentures for £100 each, one founder's share, and 1,000 £1 ordinary shares in the above-mentioned company, at the price of £2,300.

The defendant, in his defence, denied the making of the contract, and he also pleaded that "the alleged contract (if any) was a contract or sale of land or an interest in or concerning land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, or of goods within the 17th section, and that the requirements of these sections were not complied with."

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

The jury found that the defendant agreed to buy the plaintiff's shares and debentures, and the question of law was reserved for further consideration whether it was necessary that this contract should be in writing, that is, whether the contract for the sale and purchase of these debentures was a contract for an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds.

It appeared from the memorandum of association that the company was formed for the purpose of acquiring and taking over as a going concern and carrying on the business of night light and candle manufacturers, and with a view thereto to enter into, adopt, and carry into effect, an agreement with the defendant and a Mr. Fowler, who had previously been partners in the carrying on of the business.

The memorandum of association also gave power "to borrow, or raise, or secure the payment of money for the purpose of the company, and for such purpose to mortgage and charge the undertaking, or all or any part of the property or warrants of the company present or after acquired or its uncalled capital, and to create, issue, &c., perpetual or redeemable debentures or debenture stock," and "to sell, convey, or otherwise deal with the undertaking, or all or any part of the property of the company.

In pursuance of the powers contained in the memorandum and articles of association, the company issued, as first mortgage debentures, 300 debentures of £100 each, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum payable half-yearly.

By these debentures the company "hereby charged with the payments aforesaid"—that is, the payment of the principal and interest—"its undertaking and and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever both present and future including its uncalled capital for the time being." The conditions, which were to be read as incorporated with the debentures, provided: "This debenture is one of a series of like debentures issued or to be issued by the company for the aggregate sum of £30,000 in the sums of £100 each, and all which said debentures whatever the date of issue shall rank pari passu in point of charge, and the charge hereby created shall be a floating security, and accordingly the company, until the appointment of a receiver or the commencement of a winding up, shall be at liberty, but only in the ordinary course of its business, to sell, deal with, and dispose of the property charged. Provided that this condition shall not authorize the creation of any specific or floating charge ranking equally with or in priority to the said debentures, or any specific or floating charge except subject to the charge thereby created."

The question now argued was whether the debenture was a charge on the land, in which case a contract for the sale of the debentures would be a contract for an interest in land "within the 4th section of the Statute of Fraud, and would require to be in writing.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and E. Morten, for the plaintiff.—The debenture is not a charge on the land, and a contract for the sale thereof is not a contract for an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, so that the verbal agreement for sale of these debentures and shares is a good agreement. The charge created by the debenture is a charge by way of floating security, and the remedy on a floating security is by the appointment of a receiver, or the winding up of the company: Lindley on Companies, 5th ed., pp. 196-7; Palmer's Company Precedents, 5th ed., p. 476, where the nature of a floating security is explained. The debenture here does not constitute a specific charge upon the property, but it leaves the company at liberty to deal with its property in the ordinary course of its business, and, therefore, it does not constitute an agreement relating to land. There is a number of cases under the Statute of Mortmain (9 Geo. 2, c. 36) showing, in favour of the plaintiff, that a contract for the sale of these debentures is not an agreement for the sale of an "interest in land." These cases are Walker v. Mylne, 11 Beav. 507; Myers v. Perigal, 1 W. R. 57, 2 De G. M. & G. 599; Entwistle v. Davis, L. R. 4 Eq. 272; Holdsworth v. Davenport, 25 W. R. 20, 3 Ch. D. 185; Attree v. Hawe, 26 W. R. 871, 9 Ch. D. 337, In re David, 38 W. R. 162, 43 Ch. D. 27; Gray v. Smith, 38 W. R. 310, 43 Ch. D. 208; Gardner v. London, Chatham, & Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201; Ashworth v. Munn, 28 W. R. 965, 15 Ch. D. 363.

A. T. Lawrence and J. G. Wood, for the defendant.—These debentures are a charge upon all the property of the company for the time being. Unless that be so, they are no security at all. They are a charge upon the property, and the charge is by way of a floating security, with power in the company to deal with and to sell the property. By the debenture the property can be sold, but this power of sale does not prevent there being a charge upon the property. What is in this debenture is nothing more than a power in a mortgage that the mortgagor is to remain in possession until default, and being analogous to a mortgage, it is within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. The case of In re David is a very strong authority for saying that a debenture which mortgages tolls is within the statute, as being an interest in land.

They also referred to the cases already cited for the plaintiff.

Morten in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 28.—The following judgment was delivered by MATHEW, J.—This was an action brought to recover damages for the refusal, by the defendant, to purchase, amongst other things, certain debentures in a company called the Broad Night Light Company.

The defence was, in the first place, that as a matter of fact there had been no such contract as the plaintiff insisted upon, and, in the second place, that, if there were such a contract, it was a verbal contract only, and that the contract ought to be in writing under the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds.

Now, in order to see what the debentures really were, and whether they constituted a charge upon realty or not, it was necessary in the first place to see what the memorandum and articles of association entitled the directors of the company to do. It is clear, and indeed it is not disputed, that the articles of association conferred upon the directors power to issue the debentures in question. On turning to the debenture, it appeared to be in the modern form, and to create in the first place a charge upon the undertaking, and all the property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including the uncalled capital of the company. By the conditions, which formed part of the bond, it was provided that the bond should be a floating security in the ordinary way, but not to involve a charge which would prevent the company from carrying on its operations, and there was a proviso that the directors should not be authorized to create any specific or floating charge ranking equally with, or in priority to, the debentures, or any specific or floating charge except subject to the charge thereby created. Then there were the other ordinary provisions that upon default in payment of the amount of interest, or upon proceedings being taken to wind up the company, there should be the usual power to appoint a receiver, over all the property of the company, and so to enable the debenture-holder to receive payment in priority of the amount of the debenture.

It was strenuously argued for the plaintiff that the debenture in question did not create a charge upon land, that it was only a contract like any other contract, one that might ripen into a judgment and a charge upon property, but of itself conferring no right to recover the amount of the debenture by the realization of any real property of the company.

My attention was called to numerous cases upon the subject, first under the Mortmain Act, and then under the Companies Clauses Act. I regret to say that neither class of authority seems to me to be in point; I am constrained to look at the terms of the particular debenture, and that its terms, when so looked at, involve a charge upon real property, appears to me to be beyond all doubt, and it is not now necessary to refer at length to authority on the subject.

There are two cases which seem to me to lay down the principle applicable to this case. The first is a case which may now be described as an old one—Toppin v. Lomas, 3 W. R. 446, 16 C. B. 145—where an attempt was made to establish in an action very like the present one that a bond and debenture issued by the Westminster Improvement Commissioners was not a bond creating a charge upon land, and therefore did not require a written contract for sale or purchase. The argument in that case was very much the argument addressed to me here. It was addressed to the Court of Common Pleas ineffectually. It was perfectly clear, although the machinery was different, that such a charge was created upon the land as was intended to be created, as it appears to me, by the terms of this debenture.

The true principle is further illustrated by a recent case of In re Duvid, where the debenture, amongst other things, created a charge upon the tolls, and this very remote and limited interest in the realty was held to be sufficient to necessitate a contract in writing, if the debenture were dealt with by contract for sale or purchase.

Upon the authority of these two cases, and of many others that were cited in the course of the argument, which I do not think it necessary to refer to at length, I am of opinion that the defendant is right, and I regret to say that the plaintiff fails.

Under these circumstances my judgment in the case must be for the defendant, and as to the question of costs, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has been unfairly and inequitably dealt with, and that, therefore, each party should pay his own costs of the action, inclusive of the costs of the trial, and that the costs of this argument should be paid by the plaintiff.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, James White.

Solicitors for the defendant, Faithfull & Owen.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) March 27, 28.

In re FRAPE.
Ex parte PERRETT. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Costs—Agreement for remuneration—Signature of one party—Taxation after payment—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 8.

An agreement for remuneration under sub-sections 1 and 2 of section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, is sufficiently signed if signed by the person who seeks to repudiate it, and need not be signed by both parties.

Where such an agreement signed by the client is impeached by him as being, and evidence is brought forward showing that it is, unfair and unreasonable, it is competent to the court, upon a taxation summons by the client, although payment has been made under the agreement, to make an order for taxation, and to direct the taxing master to certify whether or not the agreement is unfair and unreasonable.

Dictum of Cotton, L.J., in In re Palmer, 38 W. R. 673, 45 Ch. D. 291, approved and acted on.

Appeal from a decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 232).

The question was whether, after payment of a solicitors' remuneration under an agreement entered into between the solicitor and the client under section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, the costs could be taxed.

The facts are considered to appear in the report of the case in the court below sufficiently for the purposes of the present appeal, except that, having regard to the ground upon which the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of North, J., being different from the grounds on which his lordship had decided the case, it is thought necessary to add that the evidence was conflicting as to the exact circumstances under which the "agreement" for the "£80 agreed costs" was come to; the client alleged that he had accepted it under protest, being in need of money at the time; the solicitor denied that there was such protest or that any undue influence had been used to obtain the settlement; on the contrary, he said that his client appeared perfectly satisfied. It was admitted by both, that at the time of the settlement the solicitor had stated that he thought, if a bill were made out, his costs would exceed £100, but he was willing to accept £80 in settlement of his claim.

North, J., held that the costs must be taxed.

The solicitor appealed.

C. J. Peile, for the appellant.—There ought to be no taxation.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the respondent.—The agreement was unfair and unreasonable. In In re Palmer, 38 W. R. 673, 45 Ch. D. 291, Cotton, L.J., expressed the opinion that the 4th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881 gives the court power, where an agreement is impeached as unfair and unreasonable, to refer it to the taxing master to consider the question.

Peile replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this appeal from North, J., the first question is, Does the agreement in question constitute such an agreement as comes within the 8th section of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881? That section says this: "(1) With respect to any business to which the foregoing provisions of this Act relate, . . . it shall be competent for a solicitor to make an agreement with his client, and for a client to make an agreement with his solicitor, before or after or in the course of the transaction of any such business, for the remuneration of the solicitor, to such amount and in such manner as the solicitor and the client think fit, either by a gross sum, or by commission or percentage, or by salary, or otherwise: and it shall be competent for the solicitor to accept from the client, and for the client to give to the solicitor, remuneration accordingly." That provision made an alteration of the law and enabled an agreement for remuneration to be made between a solicitor and his client which should be binding. The section then goes to say: "(2) The agreement shall be in writing, signed by the person to be bound thereby, or by his agent in that behalf."

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, what does this mean? Does it mean that the agreement must be signed by both the parties to it? It seems to me that it must be signed by the party who seeks to repudiate it; in the present case the agreement has been signed by the client who seeks to repudiate it, and that is, I think, sufficient.

I cannot help thinking that the phrase "agreed costs" here, although North, J., seems to have been of a somewhat different opinion, means all costs incurred down to the then present time.

We have, then, an agreement binding the client because signed by him. Then the solicitor says there ought to be no taxation of the costs covered by the agreement. Sub-section 4 of section 8 says: "The agreement may be sued and recovered on or impeached or set aside in the like manner and on the like grounds as an agreement not relating to the remuneration of a solicitor; and if, under any order for taxation of costs, such agreement being relied upon by the solicitor shall be objected to by the client as unfair or unreasonable, the taxing master or officer of the court may inquire into the facts and certify the same to the court; and if upon such certificate it shall appear to the court or judge that just cause has been shown either for cancelling the agreement or for reducing the amount payable under the same, the court or judge shall have power to order such cancellation or reduction, and to give all such directions necessary or proper for the purpose of carrying such order into effect, or otherwise consequential thereon, as to the court or judge may seem fit."

It is urged on behalf of the solicitor that the agreement cannot be set aside as unfair and unreasonable unless there is some order or proceeding under which to impeach it. I do not myself think there is anything in that. In In re Palmer Cotton, L.J., expressed himself thus: "It is said that, having regard to the 4th sub-section of the 8th section, this agreement ought to be referred to the taxing master. But the appellant has not brought forward any evidence showing that this charge is unfair and unreasonable; and although the 4th sub-section does, in my opinion, give the court power, where an agreement is so impeached, to refer it to the taxing master to consider whether the charge is fair and reasonable, no foundation for such an order has been made. Mr. Farwell has argued that this is a very unreasonable charge, but I do not think that he says it is unfair."

We ought not, on the materials which we have before us, to say that the agreement is unfair and unreasonable, but we can direct the taxing master, on going into the bill, to report as to that. The right order for us to make is to vary, or rather add to, the order of North, J., by directing the taxing master to certify whether the agreement is fair and reasonable, reserving the costs of the taxation, of the appeal, and of the adjournment into court before North, J.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that this is a proper case for taxation after payment. I think that "agreed costs" here mean all costs. The language of the 2nd sub-section is inartificial, probably taken from the language of the Statute of Frauds. It seems to me that if a person seeks to enforce such an agreement and it is signed by the person against whom he seeks to enforce it, the fact of his seeking to enforce it shows that he means to be bound by it himself, and you have the actual signature of the other party; that, in my opinion, is sufficient.

It is competent to us to refer the matter to the taxing master to report as to whether this is or is not a fair and reasonable agreement. The facts are to my mind suspicious.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I also agree.

Order appealed from added to.

Solicitors, Venn & Woodcock, for H. D. Frape, Brighton; Atkinson & Dresser, for Trevor, Pollard, & Co., Brighton.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Dec. 5, 6.

RUABON BRICK AND TERRA COTTA CO. v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Mine owner—Statutory powers—Minerals—Custom of working usual in district—Minerals worked by quarrying—Statutory right of mine owner to enter upon and break up surface land of railway—Trespass—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77-79.

The respective rights under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, of a railway company, as owner of land compulsorily taken, and of the owner of minerals under such land, are different from, and are not governed by the principles of law applicable to, the respective rights of land surface owners and mineral owners in other cases.

The owner of minerals lying under or near the land and line of a railway company, which, according to the usual manner of working in the district are won by open quarrying, is, by section 79 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, if desirous of working such minerals, and if the railway company are not willing to purchase the same, entitled to enter upon and break up the surface of the land of the railway company for the purpose of winning the minerals, even though the consequence be the destruction of the railway.

Appeal of the defendant company from the decision of Kekewich, J.

In 1889 the defendant company promoted a Bill in Parliament to obtain power (inter alia) to purchase a branch railway, part of which ran over the land of which the plaintiff company were owners. The plaintiff company opposed the Bill, but their opposition was withdrawn upon the terms of an agreement, dated August 10, 1889. Clause 3 of that agreement provided that if the Bill should be passed the defendant company should, before the 13th of September, 1889, serve upon the plaintiff company notice to treat in pursuance of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for the portion of land occupied by the branch line. Clause 4 provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in the Bill when it became an Act of Parliament, the defendant company should be entitled to purchase under their compulsory powers from the plaintiff company only the land occupied by the branch line. Clause 11 provided that, in the event of the plaintiff company, in pursuance of the powers reserved by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, working the minerals lying under or within forty yards of the branch railway line, the defendant company should be entitled, as and when such minerals were worked out and removed, to enter in and upon the mines so worked for the purpose of constructing, and to construct, such pillars or columns as the defendant company's engineer might consider necessary for the protection of the railway and works, but so that the defendant company, in constructing such works, shall not interfere with the working of the minerals in accordance with the provisions of the said Act: provided that nothing in the said agreement contained should interfere with or affect the right of the plaintiff company to compensation for minerals as provided by the said Act or for any interference with the free working and getting of same.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Bill passed and became a special Act in 1889.

The defendant company afterwards, under their statutory powers, gave the plaintiff company notice to treat in respect of the land above referred to; the purchase-money paid, which was fixed by arbitration, expressly not including the value of the clay used by the plaintiff company for the purpose of their manufactures, on the ground that such clay was a mineral within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; and the land was accordingly, on December 30, 1890, conveyed by the plaintiff company to the defendant company, the mines and minerals, including the clay, being expressly excepted and reserved out of the conveyance.

On January 18, 1892, the plaintiff company gave to the defendant company notice, under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, of their intention to work the clay lying under and within forty yards of the railway.

According to the custom of the district, clay, such as was used by the plaintiff company in their manufactures, was worked from the surface, and not by underground workings, the practice being, in the first instance, to remove the surface soil (which varied in depth from three to eight feet) so as to prevent it mixing with the clay, and then to get the clay.

The defendant company were not willing to treat with the plaintiff company for payment of any compensation in respect of the clay, and the plaintiff company accordingly, in pursuance of their notice to work the clay, proceeded, in September, 1892, to do so; and for the purpose of removing the surface soil and the ballast on the land purchased as aforesaid by the defendant company, laid down a tramway (part of which extended over the land of the defendant company), and proceeded to clear and remove the surface soil and the ballast thereon. The defendant company thereupon removed so much of the tram lines as were on their land and replaced the ballast.

The plaintiff company then brought this action praying an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the plaintiff company in getting the clay from under the railway or in removing for that purpose the surface soil and ballast, and from removing the plaintiff company's tram lines; and damages were also claimed.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff company were entitled to work the clay from under the land purchased as aforesaid by the defendant company; and for that purpose that the plaintiff company were entitled to enter upon the land of the defendant company and to remove the ballast and surface soil lying or being above the clay; and he accordingly granted the injunction.

The defendant company appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Cripps, Q.C., and Medd, for the appellants.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and F. Dodd, for the respondents.

The arguments and the cases cited appear from, and are fully dealt with in, the judgments of the Lords Justices.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case raises an important question which has come before the court, I will not say for the first time, but the importance of it is now realized more vividly than it has been before. [The Lord Justice read the order appealed from, and proceeded:—] Now, in all the previous cases in which a railway company has been in litigation with a mine owner, the railway company has been complaining of the loss of support under their railway, and the controversy has always been whether they are to buy the minerals in order to retain and exercise or preserve that right of support. But the peculiarity of this case is that, in consequence of the agreement of August 10, 1889, the railway company do not care anything about the support by the subjacent minerals. They have, under that agreement, a right to support, which renders it immaterial to them whether the clay under the railway is dug out or not. And the whole controversy in this case is not as to the right of the mineral owner to work under the railway, and, if necessary, to let it down, but the controversy is as to the right of the mineral owner to come upon the surface and work his minerals from above downwards. That is the controversy. It is a controversy which, in this acute shape at all events, is so far as I know, substantially a new one.

Now the first point to consider is whether the rights of the parties depend upon the ordinary principles of real property law or upon the statutory enactments contained in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, because their rights will depend very much upon the answer to be given to that question. I proceed, therefore, to investigate how that matter stands. [The Lord Justice then stated the facts as above set out; and commenting on clause 11 of the agreement of August 10, 1889, between the plaintiffs and the defendants, said:—] The railway company therein stipulate for a right which they otherwise would not have—a right to go into the clay pit and support their line as and when the clay is worked out. It is the existence of this clause which puts them in the peculiar position to which I have alluded, and which enables them to say, "We do not care anything at all about right to support by clay, as we have a right of support independently." When you look at the history of this transaction, and at the terms of that agreement, and at the recitals in the conveyance, I think it is obvious and beyond all doubt that the rights of the parties are to be determined, not by the ordinary principles of real property law, but by the clauses relating to mines in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845. Once get at that, and you get a very long way, because it is well known now that the rights, as I will call them, of the surface owner and the mineral owner under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, are totally different from the respective rights which they would enjoy if it were not for those statutory enactments. Nothing can show that, more plainly than a contrast, which I will not pause to make, of the decisions under the mining clauses in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and those other cases upon the rights of lessors and lessees under mining leases, or in such cases as those which have arisen on the true construction of Inclosure Acts. The contrast between the two is most marked, and it is impossible to say that cases governed by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act are governed by the same principles as those which relate to leases or Inclosure Acts or anything of the kind.

We are driven then to the study of the sections relating to mines and minerals in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that is to say, to that bundle of sections which are prefaced by the words, "And with respect to mines lying under or near the railway, commencing with section 77 and running down to and including section 85. The first of these sections is section 77, which provides that the company shall not be entitled to any mines (I will read it shortly now) under any land purchased by them except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works unless the same shall have been expressly purchased. As I have pointed out, in this particular case the mines were excepted and not purchased by the railway company. Then comes section 78, which I need not read in full, that mines lying near the railway are not to be worked if the company are willing to purchase them. Then comes section 79, which is very important: "If before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not state their willingness to treat with such owner, lessee, or occupier for the payment of such compensation, it shall be lawful for him to work the said mines or any part thereof for which the company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, so that the same be done in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same shall be situate." Then there are provisions about damage and so on.

Now what does that involve? It certainly involves this, that the mineral owner is entitled, if that section applies, to work his mine under the railway and as close up to it as the minerals extend, although the consequence is to derogate from his own grant and destroy the surface by letting it down, a right which no mineral owner has at common law, under a conveyance worded similarly to the conveyance in this case. Again, a mineral owner has a right to work his mine, not only, as I understand it, from below upwards, but, under certain circumstances, from above downwards. He has a right to work it so that the same be done in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mine in the district where the same shall be situated. What does that mean? It means, I apprehend, that if in any particular spot the minerals come so close to the surface that it is necessary for the beneficial working of those minerals, and, according to the usual manner of working them in the district, that they shall be worked from above downwards, the mine owner has a right to do it. The consequence is in that case the destruction of the surface. The consequence in the other case, which I have already alluded to, is also destruction of the surface. It is destruction in different ways, it is true. It is destruction in the one case by picking the surface up, and destruction in the other case by letting the surface down. The result is the same—destruction of the railway. That appears to me the necessary consequence if you once get out of the common law doctrines applicable to matters of this kind, and are forced to rely upon the true construction of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act

Now, if we look at such decisions as there are on this point, they almost all of them are based upon the theory to which I have alluded, the theory being that, as regards mines, the railway company have nothing to do with them until the time comes when the owner wants to work them so as to endanger the railway. It may never come at all. They may be minerals which cannot be worked at a profit, or so situated that it is not worth working them, and in such a case the railway company get the right of support for ever for nothing. But if, on the other hand, the time does come for the mine owner to work these mines, he is at liberty to say to the railway company, "If you do not buy me out in accordance with these sections, which of course you have a right to do, I shall work my mines regardless of your rights; that is to say, regardless of the rights which, but for the statute, you would have had at common law." That is the position which these plaintiffs have taken up. Now that that is the view which has been taken through a great number of decisions is, I think, apparent from a study of them. I am not going through them at any length; but it is perfectly impossible to my mind for any lawyer to read the decisions upon these sections, beginning with The Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 15 W. R. 647, L. R. 2 H. L. 27, and coming down to The Midland Railway Co. v. Robinson, 38 W. R. 577, 15 App. Cas. 19, both before the House of Lords, without seeing that the reasoning I have applied to this case is the reasoning which has been applied uniformly and without any exception whatever, so far as I know, except the possible exception in the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in The Midland Railway Co. v. Robinson, 15 App. Cas., at p. 36. Lord Macnaghten does throw some doubt upon the question of whether the mine owner can go upon the surface and work from above downwards. The doubt thrown upon the proposition by a noble lord of his eminence requires the greatest attention; but he stands alone, and, without enumerating the long list of lords and judges who have taken the view of the sections which appears to me to be the right view upon the study of them, it appears to me it is impossible for us to give effect to the doubt expressed by Lord Macnaghten. I think Sir Horace Davey was justified in his remark that there is a difference apparent enough to the minds of those who are accustomed to think of these things with reference to legal rights. He said the plaintiffs have no right to use the defendants' property to work theirs, and that that is a very different thing from a right to work their own property to the detriment of the Great Western Railway Co. I see the difference, of course; but, asking myself whether any such difference is drawn by these legislative enactments, I say, "No, I see no trace of it."

It appears to me, therefore, without going further into the decisions, that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I should add nothing were it not for the great importance of this question. But as it is a most important one, perhaps it is right that one should give one's opinion separately.

It seems to me that the whole case turns upon the true construction of section 79 and the two preceding sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The point turns upon the words in section 79 which reserve to the mine owner the right, if the company is unwilling to purchase, to work the mines, which include clay, stone, and minerals which can be got by open working, in the usual manner of working such mines in the district. And we have to decide whether, under the words "the usual manner of working such mines in the district," the owners of the clay are entitled not merely to work underground, and let down the surface, but actually to go upon the lands which the railway company has in the first instance acquired, to disturb the surface and remove it so far as is necessary to reach the clay.

We are driven, therefore, in the first place, to consider carefully the code or fasciculus of enactments contained in the three sections I have mentioned, and the following ones down to section 86. Section 77 provides, with respect to mines lying under or near the railway, that the company is not to be entitled to any mines or minerals under any land purchased by them except only such parts as are necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of the lands unless they be expressly named therein and conveyed thereby. Now it is not perhaps a very admirable way of dealing with an Act of Parliament which is intended to be read as a whole, to read one section without the light of the sections which follow; but for the purpose of making the meaning clear of what I am about to say, I will assume that the Act of Parliament paused there, and that there was no other limitation of right or creation of right contained in the sections which follow. What would be the position of the railway company if the Act of Parliament were so worded? According to the ordinary theories of law a person who grants to an individual or to a corporate body, land for the purpose of making upon the land some work like a railway, a canal, or other buildings, impliedly is taken, unless there is any provision to the contrary contained in the document which describes the rights, to grant also that necessary support which both parties must be intended to have known would be required, and without which the enjoyment of his grant by the grantee would become wholly ineffectual and futile. You must look very carefully at the document which creates the rights of the parties to see what was the true intention of the document —whether it is a grant or an Act of Parliament— what was the true intention of the parties, or the true intention rather of those who drew the document, as to the exact amount of title which is intended to be conveyed out of the grant. If that section, however, stood alone, it seems to me there would be nothing to show that the ordinary implication of law was not to follow, and that the mine owner, although his mines are excepted out of the grant, would be nevertheless bound to leave to the railway company all the necessary support without which it would be idle to sell the land to the railway company. I think, therefore, that that is what would be the result of section 77 if it stood alone. I do not think I am alone in this view, not only because Lindley, L.J., who has preceded me, has stated that to be his impression, but also because I think it is the view of Lord Selborne in Dixon v. Caledonian Railway Co., 29 W. R. 249, 5 App. Cas. 520, which no doubt must be read by the light of the Scotch Act, but which for the purpose of the point in question covers exactly the same ground as the English Act. Lord Selborne there says that, in his opinion, if section 70 of the Scotch Act (which is similar to section 77 of the English Act) stood alone, there would be nothing in it to deprive the railway company of the ordinary right to support. I do not myself follow the contrary view expressed by Lord Westbury in Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 12 R. 2 H. L., at p. 41. But section 77 does not stand alone, and it is by virtue, it seems to me, of section 79, and the words which define what is to be reserved to the mine owner, that we get language of the Legislature which does interfere with that complete enjoyment of the railway for railway purposes, that otherwise the railway company would have possessed. What we have to decide is, to what extent does section 79 go?

I pause for a moment to remark that, although the cases use the expression "surface land" as distinguished from land below the surface, what the railway company really gets under section 77 is all the land, whether on the surface or below, which is not mines. In the present case the only matter which we have to consider is the actual surface. That is the point alone raised, and we have to construe the Act with reference to that. There is no such distinction drawn in section 77, or as it seems to me in section 79, as a distinction between lands on the actual surface and lands which are not mines, although they are below the surface.

What, then, does section 79 do in favour of the mine owner? It certainly takes away from the railway company rights of adjacent and subjacent support to some extent, from and after a particular moment. If the mine owner wants his mines, and is desirous of working them, then the occasion arises, and if the railway company upon notice are unwilling to purchase them, then he may, so far as is necessary for the enjoyment of his own mine, destroy the adjacent and subjacent support. In the case of an underground mine he may let down the surface, from and after that moment; up to that moment the railway company are not threatened, and they enjoy the benefit of the adjacent and subjacent support. It is not perfectly correct to say that under section 77 the railway company get no right to adjacent and subjacent support; they get every right to adjacent and subjacent support, it seems to me, which they want, except so far as the mine owner at any particular moment requires to utilize his mines. It is admitted, therefore, as I have said, that from and after that moment, and on the fulfilling of all the conditions precedent up to that moment, the mine owner may, if he requires it, let down the surface even if it involves letting down the railway. No injustice can be caused, because the railway company can purchase: if they do not, the mine owner is free. But the distinction raised in this particular appeal is with reference to the extent to which section 79 goes. Does it also intend to justify such acts of trespass—such acts as otherwise would be acts of trespass—upon the surface, in addition to giving the right to withdraw the support to the surface? Now this distinction, for business purposes of course, would naturally strike one as a fine one. If the mine owner may, in the enjoyment of his property, let down the railway, it seems somewhat subtle to suppose that, provided the usual manner of working the mine justifies it, he may not enter upon the surface and dig upon the surface. But, although the distinction is a subtle one, to the eye of the lawyer it is a perfectly clear one, and that it has a business value is apparent from what we have been told in the argument in the present case.

The question, therefore, really arises whether it is a distinction which we can find in the Act of Parliament. If that distinction is to be drawn, the first observation which seems to me to arise is, that you have to exclude from the protection of section 79 the rights of a mine owner whose mines consist of clay, gravel, or such minerals as are worked from the surface in cases where what he wants to work is the mineral lying immediately under the line, and which can only be got conveniently, according to the usual manner of working, by taking up the railway. You have to exclude it from section 79 because, although the usual manner of working the mines in the district would justify the taking away the surface, yet, nevertheless, in this particular case it is said the Act of Parliament did not mean to give it.

The second observation which arises, and which seems to me arises with considerable force, is that if that distinction is to be drawn there is no provision made, as far as I can see, in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act itself for the assessment of compensation for the purchase by the railway company, and the payment by the railway company, of that right of the mine owner. You are taking from him, if that is the true construction of the section, the natural facility of working his mineral by means of quarrying, which is usual and which is convenient. When is he paid for it, and how is he paid for it? There is nothing in section 81, I think, treating it as a mere matter of the construction of the section, to give the mine owner the means of obtaining compensation for that facility of which he is deprived. Section 81, as has been pointed out in argument, does not cover all the cases that would arise; and Sir Horace Davey and Mr. Cripps, with whose argument I was very much impressed, could only reply to the difficulty which arose in respect of that point, by turning to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and saying that under that Act the mine owner would be able to obtain compensation. But still when would he obtain it? When would the railway company have to pay it? It seems to me that they would have to purchase it when they purchased the land, but if that is so, they would have to purchase it before they are threatened. They would have to purchase it before it was at all certain that the mine owner would want the clay, and they would therefore have to buy it in the dark. It would be almost impossible to assess the proper value which they ought to pay, because you never could tell the exact chances of the mine owner wishing to work his quarry, or the extent or depth to which he would work it. And if you have to pay him the price before you know whether the mine owner would require the clay, consider how you would defeat the whole object, the cardinal object of this code, as it has been expounded by judge after judge and court after court. What does Lord Cranworth say in Bennett's case, L. R. 2 H. L., at p. 40: "The object of the statute evidently was to get rid of all the ordinary law on the subject and to compel the owner to sell the surface, and if any mines were so near the surface that they must be taken for the purposes of the railway, to compel him to sell them, but not to compel him to sell anything more. The land was to be dealt with, just as if there were no mines to be considered; nothing but the surface. That being so, justice obviously requires that when the mine owner thinks it beneficial to him to work his mines, and proceeds to do so, he should be just in the same position as if he had never sold any part of the surface at all. If he had not compulsorily parted with the surface, he might have worked his mines sinking his shaft from the very surface down to the very bottom of the mine. The object of the statute was that, for the purpose of the railway, the company was to take (and it was a very beneficial provision for the company) that, and that only, which is necessary for the purpose of the railway; and that all the rest should be left to be dealt with, whenever the time for working the mine should arrive. It is plain to me, upon the construction of that clause of the statute, that that was the intention of the Legislature." Therefore if compensation is to be given to the mine owner at the time the land is purchased, he gets it at a moment when to give it him would defeat this cardinal object of the code which we are construing, and, as was pointed out by A. L. Smith, L.J., it would be extremely difficult to measure the compensation which ought to be given; and in practice I think I may say that it is unheard of, that compensation of the kind alluded to, should be asked for at the time of purchase of the land.

We come back, therefore, to the meaning of the words in section 79, and ask ourselves whether there is anything in the words, "usual manner of working such mines," which is reasonably intended to cover such cases as the present; and for the reasons I have given it seems to me that the words ought to cover them as a matter of business and as a matter of fair play between the company and the mine owner. It is said, indeed, that section 79 cannot be intended to take away from the railway company what they have purchased, namely, the right to the surface, and to use the surface for the purposes of their railway; but that argument goes too far. Section 79 certainly does operate from and after a particular moment to deprive the company of the full enjoyment of the surface. It is not therefore a question of the existence of any right of interfering with the enjoyment by the company of the lands which they have bought; but the question is, How far does the right of interference go? That is the view which, I think, one would form as to the interpretation of the code, keeping in mind what is the cardinal object of the code, that the railway company shall not be obliged to pay anything for the mines until the mine owner desires to work, and that the mine owner shall be at liberty, unless the railway company shall then buy, when the critical moment comes, to enjoy his property to the full; otherwise this code would really become a means of confiscation.

Now with regard to the authorities I shall say very little. In The Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett it is obvious that Lord Chelmsford's language and Lord Cranworth's language, if read in the ordinary sense of the words, justified the judgment below. And Lord Cranworth's reasoning as to the object of the Act, I think, explains the position which the respondents assume here. We come next to Errington v. The Metropolitan District Railway Co., 30 W. R. 663, 19 Ch. D. 559, where the late Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) and the present Master of the Rolls (then Brett, L.J.) both in terms say that you may dig the surface to get at the mineral, which is properly worked by digging the surface. It is true those are expressions of opinion, and cannot be said to be strictly a decision upon the point, but they are expressions which indicate the view that those learned judges took of the objects of the Act. We come next to The Midland Railway Co. v. Miles, 35 W. R. 76, 33 Ch. D. 632, where Stirling, J., adopts the same view, basing his judgment upon the previous decisions and upon the reason of the thing. Finally we come to the case by which I feel myself very much impressed—viz., The Midland Railway Co. v. Robinson. I desire to say a word or two upon what must have been decided by that case. It was an action in which the mine owner was approaching the railway at some little distance and he served a notice to treat in respect of the land between his then workings and the railway line, which notice covered the land under the line and the land adjacent for some considerable distance. He threatened in his notice that unless the company bought, he would work those minerals which were minerals of the exact description—of the exact legal kind—to which the minerals in the present case belong. He threatened, that is to say, to work the minerals close to and under the line by open quarrying. It is said, and said with truth, that the chief point which the court were in that case considering, was the validity of the notice; but the action was one for an injunction to prevent the mine owner from working, and the mine owner was justifying his threat by the notice, and if the notice broke down, or if the threat went beyond what is legal, the injunction would have been modified; it must have been granted in a modified form and not in a complete form. The business importance of the point may not have struck the court in the manner in which our attention has been called to it here. But the right of the mine owner to work the minerals underneath the line by open quarrying seems to me to be involved in that case. Chitty, J., gave judgment dismissing the action. When the matter came before the Court of Appeal, Cotton, L.J., seems to imply that the judgment he was giving as to the right of the mine owner to advance upon the railway included his right to quarry right through the line, because in answer to the argument that that would destroy the line, he replies, "Well, but the railway company have only got to purchase." Still it is true that the importance of the point perhaps was not brought to the attention of the court there. But when the case came to the House of Lords, it seems to me that the point was actually pressed upon the House of Lords in argument. The argument used by Mr. Rigby is that the Legislature could not have intended to give the land owner leave to break up the railway line by quarrying through it. Sir Horace Davey replied, "There is no difference in principle between stripping off the surface and picking out the minerals, and working underground within six feet of the surface, and so letting the railway down." Upon that Lord Macnaghten intimated his doubt—a doubt to which he adhered in his judgment, but a doubt in which he was not followed by the rest of the House—as to the logical necessity of allowing a man to trespass on the surface because he had a right to destroy the surface by underground working. Although, therefore, the exact point which is raised in this case may be said not to be the point which was decided by the House of Lords in their judgment, it was pointedly brought, it seems to me, to the attention of the Lords. The construction which they put upon section 79, if they held that mines and minerals there included such mines and minerals as could only be got by digging through the surface, would, of necessity and as a logical sequence, lead to the conclusion that you might quarry right through the line in order to get at the minerals under the line. And with that logical sequence in their minds, Lord Herschell and Lord Watson used language which seems to me to imply that that was a consequence which they faced, and which they thought must be faced in order to give the railway company on the one side and the mine owner on the other side the full benefit which the Act intended they should respectively enjoy. Lord Herschell was perfectly alive to the difficulty of the point. He was perfectly alive to the desirability, if you could do so, of construing the sections so as to limit the powers of interference with the railway company. But, nevertheless, having looked all round it he came to the conclusion that there was no distinction to be made between mines and minerals which could conveniently only be quarried from above, and the mines and minerals which could be obtained from underground working. I think that, although it cannot be said to have closed the door to the argument which has been addressed to us, and that it still is open to the counsel for the appellants to ask us to pronounce a contrary view to that which was expressed by Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, nevertheless their judgments follow a long chain of authority which seems to me to imply that section 79 gives the power to disturb the surface in order to get at minerals which are worked from the surface if that is the usual and ordinary way of working them in the district. The judgment of the court below, therefore, seems to me to be correct, and this appeal ought to be dismissed with the usual consequences.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is whether the mine owners, the Ruabon Brick and Terra Cotta Co., can justify what they are doing and are intending to do, under the group of sections in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, commencing with section 77, and more especially under section 79 of the Act. It has now been held by the highest authority that the minerals mentioned in these sections include, not only minerals won by underground workings, but also minerals won by open workings, such as by quarrying; and it is not disputed that the terra cotta clay, which is in question in this case, is a mineral within those sections. It has also been held by like authority that if when due notice is given by the mine owner to the railway company to purchase the underground minerals lying under its railway, and the company is not willing to do so, then the unpaid mine owner (if he works his minerals in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof and according to the usual manner of working in the district) may work such minerals underground even though by so doing he lets down and destroys the surface of the railway and its works. In such case, upon action brought by the railway company against the mineral owner for letting down the surface of the railway, the mineral owner can justify under section 79 and the other sections grouped therewith; and this is not disputed. Why then, having got thus far by means of decided cases which cannot be controverted, is an unpaid mine owner who wins his minerals by quarrying in the accustomed manner to be in a worse position than an unpaid mineral owner who wins his minerals by mining? I cannot myself see why if the one can justify under the statute the other cannot. If the action against a mine owner for letting down the surface of the railway were in trespass it would be identical with the present case; but does the fact that the one cause of action is upon the case, and the other in trespass, affect the nature and the validity of the defence which the mine owner has under the statute? If pleadable with success in an action upon the case, why is it not equally pleadable in an action of trespass? If Sir Horace Davey and Mr. Cripps are correct they must establish that different rights are given to the mine owner in section 79 when applied to an owner whose minerals are worked underground, and to an owner whose minerals are worked above ground. In the one case it is conceded that the unpaid mine owner may win his minerals (working them in the accustomed manner) without let or hindrance from the railway company, whereas, in the other, it is now said he cannot. I can find no such distinction in the section. The fact is, that when once the word "owner" in section 79 is held to include both an owner whose minerals are worked from underground, and also an owner whose minerals are worked from the surface, it follows, as it seems to me, that each, if he works in the accustomed manner, has the same protection under the statute, and it makes no difference whether in the one case the surface is let down, or in the other it is trespassed upon. The substance of the defence under the statute is, that if the mine owner is unpaid for the minerals, and the company does not purchase them when the time arrives for it to do so, that is, when the mine owner desires to work his minerals, then the mine owner may proceed to win his minerals in the accustomed way irrespective of the company's works. The company must pay for the minerals whether the minerals are worked by mining or quarrying, otherwise the mine owner may proceed in the accustomed manner to win them. This is my view of section 79 of the statute. There has been, however, upon the point now in dispute at the least a sequence of dicta of peculiar authority all tending in the same direction, and in antagonism to Sir Horace Davey's contention with one exception, that of Lord Macnaghten, weighty though it be. The dicta, without referring further to them, are those of Lord Chelmsford, Lord Cranworth, Sir George Jessel, Brett, L.J., Cotton, L.J., Stirling, J., Lord Herschell, and Lord Watson. They are all one way, all in antagonism to the point which is now argued before us, and, though I agree that, in regard to the bulk of those at any rate, they are not direct authorities upon the point, they are nevertheless the weighty opinions of those learned judges. I do not consider Lord Esher's two dicta, the one in Errington v. The Metropolitan District Railway Co. and the other in Pountney v. Clayton, 31 W. R. 664, 11 Q. B. D. 833, to be necessarily in conflict. There are, however, besides these dicta, two decisions which require consideration, for they appear to me to be very much in point. The one is the case of The Midland Railway Co. v. Miles, in which Stirling, J., decided the present point, excepting, if it be an exception, that upon the locus in quo in that case the rails were not actually laid down. And I say, having considered that case, I agree in the conclusion he has arrived at. There is also the case of The Midland Railway Co. v. Robinson in this court and in the House of Lords, which is very much in point also. I agree with the observations which have fallen from Bowen, L.J., as to that case.

For these reasons, whether you take the section by itself or take these dicta, and the two authorities I have alluded to, I am of opinion that Kekewich, J. was correct in the judgment he arrived at, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, R. R. Nelson.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., agents for Brabner & Court, Liverpool.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — March 15.

GRAHAM AND WIFE v. MAYOR, &c., OF NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE. (a.)

Highway — Surveyor — Limitation of action — Urban authority—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 26, 109—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 144, 264.

By section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, no action shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of the Act after three months next after the fact committed for which such action is brought. By section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, urban authorities (including, by section 6, corporations of boroughs) are made surveyors of highways within their district, and are subject to all the powers, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force. By section 264 every action against any local authority for anything done, or intended to be done, or omitted to be done, under the provisions of the Act shall be commenced within six months after the cause of action accrued.

In an action to recover damages for negligence on the part of the defendants as surveyors of highways, Held, that the defendants were entitled to the protection of section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, and that the action must be commenced within three months after the cause of action accrued.

Taylor v. Meltham Local Board, 47 L. J. C. P. 12, 26 W. R. Dig. 95, and Kay v. Atherton Local Board, 42 J. P. 792, overruled.

Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford, 31 W. R. 815, 11 Q. B. D. 286, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirming the judgment of the county court judge at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in favour of the defendants.

The action was brought in the county court to recover damages for personal injuries to the female plaintiff owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants.

It appeared that on the 22nd of January, 1892, the plaintiff and his wife were driving along a street in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, when the carriage in which they were driving was upset through coming into contact with a heap of snow which had been removed under section 26 of the Highway Act, 1835, by the defendants as surveyors of highways from other streets within their district and collected in this street, and the female plaintiff was injured. The action was brought on the 13th of July, 1892. The county court judge found that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendants, but held that under section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, the action ought to have been commenced within three months of the accrual of the cause of action, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) affirmed this judgment. The plaintiff by leave appealed.

Section 26 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50:—"If any impediment or obstruction shall arise in any highways from accumulation of snow . . . the surveyor is required from time to time . . . to cause the same to be removed."

Section 109.—"No action or suit shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act . . . after three calendar months next after the fact committed for which such action or suit shall be so brought."

Section 144 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55.—"Every urban authority shall within their district, exclusively of any other person, execute the office of and be surveyor of highways, and have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force, save so far as such powers, authorities, or duties are, or may be, inconsistent with the provisions of this Act; every urban authority shall also have, exercise, and be subject to all the powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities which, by the Highway Act, 1835, or any Act amending the same, are vested in and given to the inhabitants in vestry assembled of any parish within their district."

Section 264.—"Every action" against a local authority or any member thereof, or any officer of a local authority, or person acting in his aid, for anything done or intended to be done or omitted to be done under the provisions of this Act "shall be commenced within six months next after the accruing of the cause of action, and not afterwards."

Lowenthal, for the plaintiff.—The action was brought in time, as it was commenced within six months after the cause of action accrued. Section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, makes urban authorities surveyors of highways within their districts, and section 264 requires an action for anything done under the provisions of the Act to be brought within six months. The defendants, therefore, acted as surveyors under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the three months' limitation prescribed by section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, is no longer applicable. The cases of Taylor v. Meltham Local Board, 47 L. J. C. P. 12, 26 W. R. Dig. 95, and Kay v. Atherton Local Board, 42 J. P. 792, are directly in point, and if necessary the decision of Cave, J., in Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford, 31 W. R. 815, 11 Q. B. D. 286, ought to be overruled. The fact that the defendants were made surveyors of highways by the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Improvement Act, 1853,* does not affect the case.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also referred to sections 6, 42, 44, and 340 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Channell, Q.C., and John Strachan, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case we have to say whether we agree with the decision of Grove and Denman, JJ., in Taylor v. Meltham Local Board, or with the decision of Cave, J., in Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford. It is true that in the latter case Cave, J., distinguished it from the former case, but I must candidly confess that the distinction seems to me to be too fine. The two cases cannot stand together, and therefore we must choose between the two. How does the matter stand? There are two statutes, the Highway Act, 1835, and the Public Health Act, 1875. The Public Health Act does not purport to touch the Highway Act. It leaves the Highway Act untouched as to every part of the management of highways. It makes corporations and local boards surveyors of highways within their own districts, but it leaves other surveyors of highways untouched. It makes a different class of persons surveyors of highways, but it leaves them to act under the Highway Act, 1835. A corporate surveyor of highways is therefore only a surveyor of highways in the ordinary sense of the term, and, that being so, such a surveyor is subject to all the liabilities and entitled to all the privileges of a surveyor of highways under the Highway Act, 1835. The limitation, therefore, as to the time for bringing actions prescribed by section 109 of the Highway Act, 1835, to three months after the cause of action accrued, is applicable. I adopt the reasoning of Cave, J., in Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford, and I apply it to the present case and say that the action must be brought within three months. I deliberately put the case upon this broad ground. It might be put upon the narrow ground that the removal of the snow of the defendants was an act expressly done under the powers conferred upon them by section 26 of the Highway Act, 1835, and that therefore section 109 was applicable to that particular act. But I prefer to place my decision upon the broad ground that for every act done by an urban authority as surveyors of highways their rights and liabilities are governed by the Highway Acts. I am unable, therefore, to agree with the decisions in Taylor v. Meltham Local Board and Kay v. Atherton Local Board, and those decisions must be considered as overruled.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I decide this case apart from the Newcastle Improvement Act, 1853, though that Act brings the case exactly within the decision of Cave, J., in Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford. I assume for the purposes of this case that the defendants were made surveyors of highways under section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls upon the construction of the Acts.

LOPES, L.J.—Section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, makes corporations and local boards surveyors of highways, and when so constituted they act as surveyors under the Highway Act, 1835. That disposes of the case. This act of the defendants in removing the snow was done under section 26 of the Highway Act, 1835. The principle of the decisions is that, to entitle the surveyor to the protection of the Act, it is sufficient if he bonâ fide and reasonably believes that he is acting under the Act. But this case is stronger, for here the defendants did in fact act under section 26. Therefore the period of limitation prescribed by section 109 applies. I only desire to add that I agree with the reasoning of Cave, J., in Burton v. Mayor, &c., of Salford, and I cannot agree with the decisions in Taylor v. Meltham Local Board and Kay v. Atherton Local Board.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Dix & Warlow, for Keenlyside, Forster, & Forster, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hill-Motum, Newcastle-upon Tyne.

* 16 & 17 Vict. c. clxxxii., s. 17.—"The council, and none other, shall be the surveyors of all highways within the borough, and shall have all such powers and authorities and be subject to all such liabilities as surveyors of highways are invested with and subject to by virtue of the laws for the time being in force," &c.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) — March 14.

FORSTER v. FARQUHAR AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Discretion of court over costs—Trial with jury—"Good cause"—Ord. 65, r. 1.

The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for breach of contract to put the drains of a house, which he agreed to take on lease from the defendants, into sound condition. Shortly after the plaintiff had gone into occupation of the house, some members of his family became ill with scarlet fever. The plaintiff, acting upon the opinion of his medical man, alleged that the scarlet fever was caused by the defective condition of the drains, and claimed, in addition to the cost of putting the drains into sound condition, £366 19s. as special damage in respect of the expenses of medical attendance, medicine, and nurses, the cost of disinfection of the house and furniture, and the cost of houses to which the plaintiff's family and household were removed, and expenses of removal. The jury found that the drains were not in sound condition, but that the scarlet fever was not caused by their defective condition, and awarded the plaintiff £12 12s., the amount expended in making good the defects therein. The judge having ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs occasioned by the claim in respect of the above items of special damage,

Held, that, though this claim was not an issue in the strict sense of the term, it was a separate head of claim involving a distinct class of evidence, and that it was not fair to the defendants to make them pay the costs of resisting it, and that, therefore, "good cause" for making the order existed.

Appeal from the judgment of Cave, J., at the trial.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract to put the drainage of a house, which the plaintiff agreed to take on lease from the defendants, into sound condition, and to remedy certain defects therein. Shortly after the plaintiff entered into occupation of the house his children and some of his servants became ill with scarlet fever, and the plaintiff, acting upon the opinion of his medical man, brought this action, alleging that the scarlet fever was caused by the defective condition of the drains. The following were the particulars of special damage alleged:—

1. Medical attendance, medicines, and nurses	£217	19	0
2. Cost of disinfection of house and furniture, and renewal of same .	109	0	0
3. Cost of houses to which plaintiff's family and household were removed and expenses of removal .	40	0	0
4. Fees and expenses of sanitary engineers	26	18	6

The action was tried before Cave, J., and a jury, when, after hearing medical evidence, the jury found that the scarlet fever was not caused by the condition of the drains, but gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £12 12s., in respect of the fees and expenses of sanitary engineers. The learned judge thereupon made an order that the costs occasioned by the claim in respect of the first three items of special damage should be paid by the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed from this order.

Barnard Lailey, for the plaintiff.—First, the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order that the plaintiff should pay the costs occasioned by these three items of claim. They are not separate issues; they are only separate heads of damage. The judge had, therefore, no jurisdiction to treat them as separate issues, and to make the plaintiff pay the costs occasioned by them. Secondly, no "good cause" existed within ord. 65, r. 1, to give the judge jurisdiction to make a special order as to costs. There must be some misconduct, oppression, or unreasonable conduct on the part of the plaintiff to constitute "good cause": Cooper v. Whittingham, 28 W. R. 720, 15 Ch. D. 501. Here the plaintiff acted reasonably in commencing this action and making these claims, as he relied upon the opinion of his medical man.

He also referred to Jones v. Curling, 32 W. R. 651, 13 Q. B. D. 262; Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Co., 37 W. R. 625, 14 App. Cas. 26; and Pearman v. Burdett-Coutts, 3 Times L. R. 719.

Channell, Q.C. (Marchant Williams with him), for the defendants.—Though this head of damage was not a separate issue in the strict sense of the term, the evidence upon it was severable from the evidence as to the rest of the claim. The costs occasioned by these claims were caused by the plaintiff alone. But for the technical rule that there is no issue as to damages the defendants would have got their costs upon these three items without any order at all. They were, to all intents and purposes, a separate issue. Therefore, it would be unfair to the defendants to make them bear the expense of litigating an unfounded claim, and "good cause" within ord. 65, r. 1, existed.

He referred to Roberts v. Jones, [1891] 2 Q. B. 194, 39 W. R. Dig. 159.

Lailey replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 14.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was read by

BOWEN, L.J.—The old question has been once more brought before us as to what constitutes within ord. 65, r. 1, "good cause" for an order of a judge after a trial by jury interfering with the ordinary result as to costs. It has often been pointed out by this court that it is impossible to define beforehand the circumstances which may constitute "good cause," and that it is by no means desirable to attempt to limit the language which the rule has left broad and simple. Light may, however, be thrown on the meaning of the words by considering the scope and object of the rule in which they occur. Subject to certain exceptions, costs in cases tried at common law used in former days to follow the event of the action. Ord. 65, r. 1, placed all costs, both at common law and in chancery cases, subject to an exception which need not be considered, in the discretion of the judge, but added a proviso in respect of matters tried with a jury. The proviso enacts that "where any action, cause, matter, or issue is tried with a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless the judge by whom such action, cause, matter, or issue is tried, or the court, shall for good cause otherwise order." The event which the costs are in general to follow is not, it will be observed, the verdict of the jury, but the event of the litigation. The jury may find a verdict for one party, and nevertheless the judgment in the end may be entered by the court for the other. In such a case the costs, if left to the ordinary course, would follow, not the verdict, but the judgment, as in the days before the Judicature Acts. When the verdict of the jury was decisive of the action, then costs would, by the general operation of the rule, follow the verdict of the jury, as also was the case in old times.

Then comes the exception engrafted on the proviso, "unless the judge shall for good cause otherwise order," the general intention being that where there is a jury trial the successful party shall receive costs and the loser pay them. Where will there be a good cause, or, in other words, a sufficient reason, for directing that it shall be otherwise? No nearer and no closer definition can be given than that there will be good cause whenever it is fair and just as between the parties that it should be so. This was, in fact, the view substantially taken in the Appeal Court in the case of Jones v. Curling. "The facts," says the present Master of the Rolls, "must show the existence of something, having regard either to the conduct of the parties or to the facts of the case, which makes it more just that an exceptional order should be made than that the case should be left to the ordinary course of taxation." "Good cause," says Bowen, L.J., "really seems to me to mean that there must exist facts which might reasonably lead the judge to think that the rule of the costs following the event would not produce justice as complete as the exceptional order which he himself could make." "I will not attempt," says Fry, L.J., "to give any definition of what 'good cause' is, but it plainly must be something which renders it reasonable that the judge should interfere with the rule that the costs should follow the event." It has become usual in cases which arise under this rule to cite to us language of the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, in the case of Cooper v. Whittingham, as if it contained an exhaustive definition of "good cause" under ord. 65, r. 1. The case of Cooper v. Whittingham was not a decision on the meaning of the term "good cause." It was an enunciation of a principle upon which, in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, judges should exercise their discretion under the earlier portion of the rule, which relates to actions tried before a judge without a jury. Against any attempt on the part of any court to impose by definition or otherwise a fetter on the discretion which the law has left to a judge in any particular case this court has always protested. It would be far too narrow a view were we to hold that good cause only exists where there has been misconduct, oppression, or injustice on the part of the successful party. No such limitation is to be found in the rule; and as a matter of reason it is clear that a successful litigant need not have been guilty of injustice or oppression to make it unfair that he should cast on his opponent all the costs of the litigation. The measure of what is fair as to costs is not to be found in a mere consideration of his conduct towards the opposite side. It may have been reasonable from his point of view to do that which it would be unreasonable to make the opposite litigant pay for. Although he has won the action, he may have succeeded only upon a portion of his claim under circumstances which make it more reasonable that he should bear the expense of litigating the remainder than that it should fall on his opponent. The point is not merely whether the litigant has been oppressive in the way he waged his suit or prosecuted his defence, but whether it would be just to make the other side pay. We can get no nearer to a perfect test than the inquiry whether it would be more fair as between the parties that some exception should be made in the special instance, to the rule that the costs should follow upon success. Such was, as has been stated already, the view of this court laid down in Jones v. Curling. Such was certainly the view adopted in the House of Lords in Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Co. "I cannot entertain a doubt," says Lord Halsbury, L.C., "that everything which increases the litigation and the costs, and which places on the defendant a burden which he ought not to bear in the course of that litigation, is perfectly good cause for depriving the plaintiff of his costs." The language of Lord Watson is to the same effect. "I shall not attempt," he says, "a complete definition of what is meant by these words. They at all events embrace, in my opinion, everything for which the party is responsible, connected with the institution or conduct of the suit, and calculated to occasion unnecessary litigation and expense."

Treated from the above point of view the present case under appeal appears to us to be easy of decision. The plaintiff, as the jury found, had a grievance against the defendant in respect of a breach of contract for which £12 12s. would be sufficient compensation. Serious expense, however, was occasioned at the trial by reason of the plaintiff's having put forward a claim under a head of damage, which he failed, in the opinion of the jury, to make good. The expert witnesses called to rebut this untenable head of damage cost money and time. The plaintiff cannot be said to have been acting oppressively or vexatiously in putting forward this portion of his claim. He was acting, in fact, on the opinion—though, as it afterwards turned out, the untenable opinion—of his own medical man. But why should the extra burden of this useless expense be paid for by the defendant? It is said by the plaintiff that the various items of damage claimed do not create separate issues in the pleader's sense, nor for purposes of taxation. That is perfectly true; but it is a mere technicality of pleading and of the taxing office which has survived to us from the time when pleadings were more accurate, and when the term "issue" had a recognized meaning with respect to them. The real controversy in the present action was as to the damage suffered, and the question as to damage, though not an issue in the pleader's sense of the word, was a matter in controversy, and one which could be split up into separate heads, each involving a different class of evidence. For all purposes of justice these separate heads of controversy were different issues, though not different issues, nor even issues at all, in the sense in which pleaders use the term. Why should the defendant, whose defence has succeeded on the most expensive and most important of these heads of controversy, bear the cost of litigating it? If, by making a special order as to costs, the judge could apply distributively to these heads of controversy the maxim that he who loses pays, was it not fair and reasonable so to direct? It seems to us that it was. So far from thinking that Cave, J., had no good cause for making the order he did, what he has directed appears to us, on the contrary, to be an exact and admirable instance of the way in which, in the hands of a competent and accurate judge, the rule as to good cause can usefully be applied. For these reasons we think that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Cave & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Walfords.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. } Feb. 23; March 7, 17.

DIBB v. WALKER. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), ss. 3, 5—Mortgage—Assignment of equity of redemption—Settlement—Payment of interest by tenant for life—Remedy on mortgagor's covenants—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6—Chose in action—Assignment before the 1*st of November,* 1875—Retrospective operation of section.

The payment of interest by an assignee for life of an equity of redemption is sufficient payment to keep alive the right of action on the covenants of the mortgagor, under the 5th section of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42.

Forsyth v. Bristowe, 8 Ex. 716, 1 W. R. C. L. Dig. 100, and Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. & J. 1, followed.

Section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, is retrospective, and applies to assignments of choses in action made before that Act came into operation.

Action.

On a transfer of mortgages in 1831 the mortgagor joined, and entered into a fresh covenant to pay the principal and interest. In 1833 he settled the equity of redemption expressly subject to the payment of the mortgage debts, and with a proviso that if he, the settlor, were required to pay them or the interest thereon the trustees of the settlement should, at his request, sell the lands and apply the proceeds in payment of the debts.

In 1870, after the death of the mortgagor, the mortgage debts and securities, including the benefit of the covenants, were transferred to persons from whom the plaintiffs derived title by assignment. Ellen Walker, the tenant for life under the settlement, joined in this transfer, and by way of further security covenanted to pay the interest during her life. It was formally admitted for the purposes of the trial that from November, 1866, to February, 1889, Ellen Walker was tenant for life in possession of the mortgaged estates and paid the interest on the mortgage debts.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The estate had recently been sold in a foreclosure suit, and, proving insufficient, the mortgagees brought this action in May, 1891, to recover the deficiency from the estate of the covenantor, the original mortgagor. Before commencing the action they gave the notice in writing required by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section (6), to the defendant, who was the surviving executor and trustee of the will of the covenantor, and also a beneficiary under such will.

The defendant contended that the plaintiffs had no title to sue; and that if they had they were barred by the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3: Shelford's Real Property Statutes, 9th ed., p. 202.

Levett, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the plaintiffs.—Our title is under the assignment of 1870, but the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (6), which deals with the assignment of choses in action, is clearly retrospective. The Statute of Limitations has not run in this case, as the tenant for life has paid the interest: 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 5; Shelford, p. 205; Barclay v. Owen, 60 L. T. N. S. 220, 37 W. R. Dig. 111; Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. & J. 1; Chinnery v. Evans, 13 W. R. 20, 11 H. L. Cas. 115, 132; Forsyth v. Bristowe, 8 Ex. 716, 1 W. R. C. L. Dig. 100; Hollingshead v. Webster, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651, 660; In re Frisby, 37 W. R. 603, 38 W. R. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106.

Byrne, Q.C., and Coltman, for the defendant.—Section 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873, is not retrospective, and the plaintiffs cannot sue. Again, Ellen Walker was under no liability under the covenant sued on, and payment of interest by her would not keep the debt alive. Such payment, to be effectual, must be made by someone who can be considered an agent. Her payments are to be attributed solely to her personal covenant: Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539; Newbould v. Smith, 34 W. R. 690, 38 W. R. Dig. 115, 33 Ch. D. 127, 14 App. Cas. 423; Dickenson v. Teasdale, 1 De G. J. & S. 52, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 55; Bolding v. Lane, 11 W. R. 386, 1 De G. J. & S. 122; Coope v. Creswell, 15 W. R. 242, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 112; Fordham v. Wallis, 1 W. R. 119, 10 Ha. 217.

Levett, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—The action is brought on covenants entered into in 1831. The plaintiffs are the absolute assigns of the debts covenanted to be paid and of the benefit of the covenants. The defendant is the surviving executor and trustee of the will of the covenantor.

Before commencing the action, and after the Judicature Act, 1873, came into operation, the plaintiffs gave the notice in writing required by the 6th sub-section of the 25th section of that Act. In these circumstances it is objected for the defendant that the sub-section does not apply, the point raised being that the covenants were entered into before the passing of the Act, and that the sub-section is not retrospective. In my opinion the objection must be overruled. The words "shall be deemed to have been effectual," which are found in the sub-section, are, I think, plainly retrospective, so as to apply to a debt assigned before the passing of the Act. The 25th section, as shown by the preamble, was passed for the purpose of amending and declaring the law to be "hereafter administered in England" as to the matters mentioned in the section. No just reason can be adduced for confining the operation of the sub-section to assignments made after the passing of the Act. The 3rd sub-section, as to a tenant for life without impeachment of waste, appears plainly to be retrospective. The sub-section in question deals rather with a matter of procedure than a matter of right. But even if I had thought that the objection could have been sustained, I should have given leave to amend by making the representatives of the covenantees parties either as co-plaintiffs or defendants. Before the Judicature Acts the plaintiffs could have maintained such a suit in equity as the present, making the legal personal representatives of the covenantees parties if the defendants had required them to be joined. No suggestion is made that such representatives are threatening to sue or claiming any right. The objection is purely formal.

The question of substance in the action relates to the Statutes of Limitations: the only statute relied on by the defendant's counsel is the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and the argument turned solely on the 3rd and 5th sections of that statute. A short statement of the facts extracted from the numerous and voluminous deeds and the admissions will suffice. [His lordship stated the facts, and, after observing that under the settlement the mortgaged lands were, as between the covenantor on the one hand and the persons claiming beneficially the equity of redemption under the settlement on the other, the primary fund for payment of the debts and interest, continued:—] It is obvious that if the payment of interest by Ellen Walker was effectual to keep alive the debt as against the assets of the covenantor, the statute relied on constitutes no bar to the action. Two points were made for the defendant: the first was special, turning on Ellen Walker's covenant in the transfer of 1870; the second was general, to the effect that payment of interest by a tenant for life of the equity of redemption is not sufficient to keep alive the debt as against the assets of the covenantor.

The first point was put in this way: it was said that the payments made by Ellen Walker ought to be attributed solely to her own covenant. I am unable to accept this proposition. Her covenant was expressly entered into by way of further security, and it would be a strange thing to hold that such a covenant had the effect of impairing the mortgagee's rights, as would be the case if the argument prevailed. The answer is that, in the language of the admissions, she paid the interest on the mortgage debts; moreover, the point seems to be covered by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Forsyth v. Bristowe, which is also an authority on the second point.

I proceed to consider the second question. The 5th section, as was observed by Lord Cranworth in Roddam v. Morley, does not specify by whom the payment is to be made. But there can be no doubt that it must be made by a party interested; payment by a mere stranger will not suffice. The question arose in that case on a specialty in which the heirs were bound, and the object of the suit was to recover payment out of the obligor's real estate. Lord Cranworth, with the assistance of the two learned common law judges who were called in, held that the effect of payment of interest by the devisee for life of the real estate was to set free the action generally, and accordingly that the action could be maintained against the remainderman of the lands devised. I followed the principle of this decision in Hollingshead v. Webster, a case of a simple contract debt not charged on the debtor's real estate, and consequently falling within the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, which makes the debtor's real estate assets in equity for payment of his simple contract debts as well as his specialty debts. Here the interest had been paid by the devisee for life of the real estate, who was also executrix, and the exact point decided was that the payment of interest was sufficient to keep alive the debt against all persons interested in remainder. The Statute of Limitations applicable to that case is not the statute relied on in this action. For the defendant it is said that payment of interest by the tenant for life of the mortgaged lands is not sufficient to keep alive the debt against the general assets of the mortgagor debtor by virtue of the covenant in the mortgage deed. This gives rise to the question, what is the relation of such a tenant for life to the debt? Undoubtedly the hand of the tenant for life in possession of the mortgaged lands is the proper hand to make the payment of interest. That is peculiarly the case where, as here, the covenantor settles the mortgaged lands without reserving any interest to himself except his right to have recourse to the land in the event of his being called upon to pay. It may be admitted that such a tenant for life could not be sued in an action at law by the mortgagee. But in equity it is plain that the tenant for life could be sued by the mortgagee covenantee in a foreclosure suit, and that he is liable in such an action to be deprived of the rents and profits by the appointment of a receiver if the interest is not kept down. He is liable also to the remainderman for default in payment of the interest, and also in such a case as the present to the settlor, who has a right to have recourse to the estate, as an indemnity against the interest, of all the persons liable by virtue of the indenture, whether at law or in equity, to pay the interest. Ellen Walker was the person primarily liable to make the payment. But this point appears to be covered by the principle of the decision in Roddam v. Morley to the effect that such a payment sets free the action generally, and also by the case of Forsyth v. Bristowe. There, on an assignment of the equity of redemption by the mortgagor, the assignee covenanted to pay interest on the mortgage debt; no distinction for the purpose of the statute under consideration can be drawn between a covenant for payment of interest by an assignor of the entire estate in the equity of redemption, and a like covenant entered into by an assign taking merely a life estate in possession in the equity of redemption. This observation applies to Ellen Walker's covenant, and I think it is immaterial whether the covenant is entered into on the assignment or by a subsequent deed by way of further security to which the representative of the covenantor is party. The additional reason given by Lord Wensleydale in delivering the judgment of the court in Forsyth v. Bristowe is not a mere dictum, but a ground of the decision itself. He lays it down that payment of interest by the assignee of the equity of redemption (which plainly includes tenant for life of the equity of redemption) is clearly payment of interest, and that the statute—viz., the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 5—did not expressly require that it should be made by the party liable or his agent; and that if it implied it, the assignee of the equity of redemption who covenants to pay is sufficiently an agent for the purpose. In regard to this doctrine of agency it is to be observed that payment of interest by an agent is not expressly mentioned in the 5th section of the statute under consideration; but it appears to be imported from the other part of the section, which speaks of acknowledgment made by writing by the party liable by virtue of the indenture or specialty, or his agent, and by the general tenor of the section, which treats payment of interest as an acknowledgment. In Chinnery v. Evans Lord Westbury speaks of the large import and meaning attributed to the words "person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent," which occur in the 40th section of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. Many other authorities were cited at the bar, but I think it is unnecessary to consider them, and that I may rest my decision on the second point in Forsyth v. Bristowe, which has not been overruled or questioned.

I hold, then, that the payment of interest by Ellen Walker was sufficient to keep alive the debt against the defendant as the surviving devisee and executor of the covenantor.

Solicitors, Oldman & Clabburn, for Albert Iveson & Son, Gainsborough; Gedge, Kirby, & Millett.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Feb. 14, 28.

CATTON v. BANKS. (a.)

Partition action—Costs—Incumbered shares—Discretion of court—Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), s. 10.

In partition actions, though the court has an absolute discretion as to costs, it will, as a general rule, allow only one set of costs out of the entire proceeds of sale in respect of each share of the property.

The chief clerk's certificate in a partition action found that the plaintiff was entitled to an unincumbered third share of the estate, that one of the defendants was entitled to another third share, subject to one mortgage, and that another defendant was entitled to the remaining third share, subject to two mortgages. The estate was sold and the money paid into court.

Held, that three sets of costs only—one in respect of each share of the property—were payable out of the entire proceeds.

Belcher v. Williams, 39 W. R. 266, 45 Ch. D. 510, not followed.

Further consideration.

By a marriage settlement, dated in 1834, and executed on the marriage of Richard Catton and Elizabeth his wife, certain freehold lands were conveyed to trustees upon trust for the husband and wife during their respective lives, and after the death of the survivor of them for their children upon attaining twenty-one years or marrying, in equal shares. The survivor of the husband and wife died in 1873.

There were three children of the marriage, all of whom attained twenty-one, namely, Richard T. G. Catton, Eleanor Catton, and the plaintiff, Elizabeth G. R. Catton.

Richard T. G. Catton died in 1863, having by his will devised all his property to Eliza Baxter, one of the defendants.

Eleanor Catton married James G. H. Webb, and died intestate in 1876. Her husband died in 1888, having devised all his real estate to trustees upon trust for his three children, who were infant defendants.

The action was brought for the partition or sale of the property, and the usual judgment was given.

By the chief clerk's certificate it was found that the plaintiff was absolutely entitled to one-third share of the property; that Eliza Baxter's share was subject to two mortgages, dated in 1875 and 1877 respectively; and that the remaining third share was vested in the defendant, the trustee of James G. H. Webb's will, subject to a mortgage made by Mr. and Mrs. Webb in 1875.

The property had been sold and the money was in court.

This was the further consideration of the action, and the question arose whether only one set of costs should be allowed in respect of each share of the property, or whether the incumbrancers should be allowed separate sets of costs out of the entire proceeds of sale. In the former case three sets of costs, in the latter case six sets of costs, would be payable out of the fund.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ingpen, for the plaintiff.

Leeke, for the beneficiaries under James G. H. Webb's will, for the trustee of the will, and for the mortgagee of Webb's share.

Keary, for Eliza Baxter and her husband.

Gatey, for the first mortgagees of Eliza Baxter's share.

E. S. Ford, for the second mortgagees of Eliza Baxter's share.

Methold, for the trustee of the settlement.

The case of Belcher v. Williams, 39 W. R. 266, 45 Ch. D. 510, was referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is not a light thing to contravene the deliberate decision of a brother judge, especially when that decision is upwards of two years old, and concerns a point of practice of which it may be difficult to obtain consideration by the Court of Appeal. Wherefore, and notwithstanding that on a previous occasion I carefully studied the case of Belcher v. Williams, and after careful study did not adopt North, J.'s judgment therein, I have deemed it right again to consider that judgment, and also to inquire of the officers of the court to what extent it has been departed from or followed. Strangely enough the question which I will presently define does not appear to have required frequent consideration. No case of argument and decision, unless Riddell v. Evans, before myself, can be so described has been discovered, and, on the other hand, neither the registrars nor the taxing masters, who have been consulted, can find me a case in which North, J.'s judgment has been followed, though possibly, and indeed probably, orders of that character have been made. The point was raised before Chitty, J., in Cleverton v. Cleverton in January, 1891. No decision was pronounced, but the judge expressed a doubt whether that of North, J., was correct, and an order on different lines was ultimately made by consent. Riddell v. Evans came before me shortly afterwards, and after some discussion I made an order according to Cleverton v. Cleverton, but though not prepared to follow North, J.'s judgment, I did not deliver any myself. There is no record of either approval or disapproval by Stirling, J. The point has now been argued before me, and a distinct utterance of opinion is imperative.

The point is this. It is settled practice to allow the costs of what is vulgarly called a partition action—that is, an action in which property is sold for the purpose of distributing the proceeds among two or more persons entitled thereto—out of the entire proceeds of sale, and so long as the costs incurred in respect of each share are roughly of about the same amount the rule works fairly to all concerned, and each party entitled gets, in the ultimate result, a sum calculated on the basis of his paying a share of the entire costs exactly proportioned to his share in the property sold. The fairness of the rule would be somewhat disturbed by the costs incurred in respect of any one share largely exceeding those incurred in respect of the other shares; but it is not usually necessary or right to inquire into such matters, the broad view being, that all the costs properly incurred in order to realization and division are incurred on behalf of all the proprietors.

If any one proprietor has incumbered his share, and the incumbrancer, who is, of course, a necessary party, appears separately, he is entitled to his costs out of either the entirety or the particular share affected by his charge, and the question is, which ought to bear those costs. It may affect the incumbrancer—that is, it will do so if the incumbered share is insufficient to pay his principal, interest, and costs—but if that share be sufficient for this purpose the point is immaterial to him, and becomes material to his mortgagor. And that is how it arises in this particular case. The property is divisible into three shares—one being unincumbered, one having a single incumbrance on it, and the other two incumbrances. If the incumbrancers' costs are to be paid out of the entire fund there will be six sets of costs, but on the other footing there would be three only. According to Belcher v. Williams the first result would prevail, but I am asked by the owner of the unincumbered share, and also by the owner of the share on which there is one incumbrance only, to adopt the second.

Let me in the outset express my entire concurrence with North, J.'s opinion that this is a matter of discretion. It is desirable to have guiding rules, and it is desirable that those rules should be followed generally and by all judges, but it is impossible to say that they shall be without exception, or that any judge shall not be at liberty in any particular case to act according to his discretion under the circumstances before him. That would, I conceive, be directly contrary to the Judicature Acts and the practice of the court.

Also, I completely agree with North, J., in thinking that the point is not settled by the recognised rule in administration actions, that only one set of costs shall be given in respect of each share. The practice in administration actions affords a useful analogy, which should, I think, be applied unless there is some cogent reason to the contrary, but I do not think it can be regarded as having established a rule for this class of cases In selling land and distributing the proceeds among the parties entitled the court is certainly engaged in administrative business, and in some particulars the proceedings approach nearly to those of an action for the execution of the trusts of a settlement or will, or the administration of an estate. Yet I think it would be unsatisfactory to treat the proceedings as more than analogous, and it is proverbially unsafe to press an analogy to the extreme limit. Partnership actions are also of an administrative character, and it is now settled that in an ordinary case the costs of all parties are paid out of the entire estate, but they frequently disclose reasons for the exercise of discretion in departing from this rule, and the question respecting the costs of an incumbered share is not likely to arise. I am not aware of any case in which it has ever arisen. And there is no other branch of equitable jurisdiction which affords me assistance by analogy or otherwise.

North, J., places in the forefront of his judgment the question—What is a share? and he concludes that the shares ought to be taken to be as they are ascertained at the time when the chief clerk's certificate is made, finding who are the persons interested in the property. With this I am unable to agree. I concur with him in seeing no reason why, simply because fifty years ago the property happened to go in moieties, all the costs in connection with the shares afterwards coming into existence should be measured by the original devolution; but it does not seem to me to follow that the chief clerk's certificate is a necessary or proper guide. When first I took the matter into consideration it seemed necessary to determine the question thus put by North, J., and also seemed to be one of considerable difficulty. On reflection, I think that it need not be determined now, and possibly it may never be necessary to lay down any definite rule, or to say to what extent an assignment will operate to create a new share, so as to give the owner thereof a separate set of costs out of the entire fund. This, however, is to my mind safe and sound: a mortgage merely creates a new interest in the share comprised in it, and does not create a new share. Property held by several in common is not held in more shares after the execution of a mortgage by one of the tenants in common than it was before. If there were an actual partition of the property the mortgagor and the mortgagee would get only one severed portion, and they take only one share of the proceeds of sale. A man advancing money on the security of an undivided share of real estate must be taken to be aware that the entirety is liable to be sold at the suit of one or more of his co-proprietors, because a sale is recognized as a proper and convenient method of division among the parties entitled; and that, therefore, the mortgaged share may be compelled to bear its proportion of the costs occasioned by a sale of the whole. But what justice is there in allowing him to insist that his co-proprietors shall be burdened with extra costs only because the share in which he is interested has been mortgaged? It is right for him to take into account, in calculating the money which he is prepared to advance, the probability of the gross value of his share being reduced by its proportion of the general costs, and he can also take into account the costs which the share itself will have to bear, just as much as if he were contemplating a sale of that share alone.

On principle, therefore, and by analogy to the practice in administration actions, so far as that analogy is applicable, I am of opinion that, as a general rule, and without pretending to limit judicial discretion, only one set of costs should be allowed out of the entire proceeds of sale in respect of each share of the property which those proceeds represent. There certainly is no authority except Belcher v. Williams to prevent the adoption of that rule, and, notwithstanding North, J.'s judgment, which I have studied with deep attention and respect, I venture to think that that rule ought to be adopted. I therefore hold that in this case there must be three sets of costs only. The practice in administration actions has been to give a mortgagee, and, where there is more than one, the first mortgagee, the full benefit of the one set of costs allowed in respect of a mortgaged share, and that practice ought, I conceive, to be followed in partition actions. That was the course pursued in Cleverton v. Cleverton and in Riddell v. Evans, and it will be pursued here.

Solicitors, Chamberlayne & Short, for Hyde & Hobbs, Portsmouth; H. Hope Shakespear; Wedlake, Letts, & Wedlake; Hamlin, Grammer, & Hamlin, for Dowling, Urry, & Hamer, Bolton; C. E. Bird; E. Huelin.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bruce, J.) — Jan. 31; Feb. 17.

REG. v. HOPKINS (METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE). (a.)

Metropolis—Police Acts—Magistrate—Jurisdiction—Penalty—Imprisonment in default of payment of—Street musician—2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 77—27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, s. 1.

By 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 57, a street musician who played on a musical instrument in a thoroughfare near any house, after being required by the householder for reasonable cause to depart, was made liable to a penalty of forty shillings. By section 77 of the same Act a magistrate is empowered, in case of the non-payment of a pecuniary penalty under the Act, to commit the offender to prison for not more than one month.

By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, s. 1: "Section 57 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provision shall take effect"; the section then proceeds to re-enact the offence under the repealed section, and provides that "the offender shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings, or, in the discretion of the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted, may be imprisoned for any time not more than three days."

A. was charged with an offence under the last-mentioned section before a metropolitan police magistrate. He was convicted and fined forty shillings, and, in default of payment of the fine, was committed to prison for one month. Upon a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the conviction,

Held, discharging the rule, that section 77 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 was not, by the provisions of section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, rendered inapplicable to the enforcement by imprisonment of a penalty under that section, and that the conviction was good.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to quash a conviction by Mr. Hopkins, a metropolitan police magistrate.

The defendant, a member of the Salvation Army, was convicted of an offence under section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, and was fined forty shillings. The fine was not paid, and he was committed to prison for one month under the provisions of section 77 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47.

A rule nisi was then obtained to quash the conviction, on the ground that that section was impliedly repealed by section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55.

Section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55 enacts that "section 57 of the said Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provision shall take effect as part of the said Act—namely," in effect, that any householder (personally or by his servant), &c., or police constable may require any street musician or street singer to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of such householder on account of illness or other sufficient cause, and "every person who shall sound or play upon any musical instrument, or shall sing in any thoroughfare or public place near any such house after being so required to depart, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 40s., or, in the discretion of the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted, may be imprisoned for any time not more than three days," &c.

Section 57 of the Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), provided that it should be lawful for any householder within the Metropolitan District, personally or by his servant or any police constable, to require any street musician to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of any such householder on account of the illness of any inmate of such house, or for other reasonable cause, and that every person who should sound or play upon any musical instrument in any thoroughfare near such house after being so required to depart should be liable to a penalty of 40s.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 77 provides "that in every case of the adjudication of a pecuniary penalty or amends under this Act, and non-payment thereof, it shall be lawful for the magistrate to commit the offender to any gaol or house of correction within his jurisdiction for a term not more than one calendar month when the sum to be paid shall not exceed £5, this imprisonment to cease on payment of the sum due," &c.

Bankes, for the magistrate, showed cause.—The words of section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55 in repealing section 57 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 are "and in lieu thereof the following provision shall take effect." It is clear, therefore, that section 1 of the later statute is to be read into the earlier one as part of it. Then section 77, unless expressly or impliedly repealed, applies, and gives a magistrate jurisdiction to commit a defendant to prison for a month for non-payment of a pecuniary penalty under section 1, notwithstanding that the alternative initial penalty under that section is imprisonment for three days only. Section 77 is nowhere expressly repealed, and there is no sufficient ground for holding that it is repealed by implication by section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55. That Act, as appears from the preamble, was intended to be more severe than the earlier one, which it declares was insufficient for the protection of householders. It therefore, without in any way interfering with the existing power of imprisoning for non-payment of a fine where the magistrate thought a fine was the proper initial penalty, enabled him to deal with those cases where a fine was found to be an insufficient punishment, but while taking away the defendant's option, limited the initial imprisonment to three days. And there is no real inconsistency in the procedure if section 77 is put in force, for any less term than a month can be imposed, a defendant can determine the imprisonment by paying the fine, and under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the magistrate can give time for payment or allow it to be paid by instalments. If, therefore, section 77 is impliedly repealed by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, that Act, instead of being more severe than 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, would in reality be much less so.

Witt, Q.C., and Bodilly, in support of the rule.—The meaning of section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55 is that the defendant may be fined 40s., to be recovered according to the forms of law, or imprisonment for three days. In any event there is no power of imprisonment for non-payment of the fine unless there is no distress; if the return is nulla bona then the defendant may be imprisoned for the period appointed by the statute upon which the conviction is founded. To construe the section according to the contention of the magistrate is to enable him, when he knows he has a defendant who is unable to pay a fine, by imposing one, to condemn him to imprisonment for a month, when the Act says if imprisonment is imposed as the alternative, it shall be limited to three days.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—BRUCE, J.—In this case the defendant has been fined 40s., and in default has been committed to prison for one month. The question before us is whether the order of the magistrate is good on the face of it. The answer to that question depends upon whether the magistrate has power to commit the defendant to prison for a month in default of payment of the fine of 40s. [The learned judge read the section of the Acts above set out, and continued:—]

It has been contended before us with great force that it is an unreasonable thing that the non-payment of a fine should be treated as an offence punishable by imprisonment for so long a period as a month when the offence for which the fine was imposed could not be punished by imprisonment for a longer period than three days. I think that we should be astute to endeavour to find, if possible, some reasonable meaning of the words of the Legislature which will enable us to escape from such a construction; but that, if the Legislature has clearly expressed its intention, we have no alternative but to give effect to its enactments. But the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55 expressly enacts that the words of the new enactment are to be read into the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 in lieu of the repealed section. According to the ordinary canons of construction the new clause inflicting the penalty of 40s. should be read as part of the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, and in that case the penalty would, of course, be capable of being enforced by imprisonment as provided by section 77 of the last-mentioned Act.

But it is said that it would be too unreasonable to adopt this construction, that we ought to treat the 77th section as inapplicable to the altered state of things; in other words, we must arrive at the conclusion that the Legislature never could have intended that a man should be liable to be sent to prison for non-payment of a penalty for a longer term than that for which he was liable, he could have been sent to prison by way of punishment for the offence for which the penalty was imposed.

But it seems to me that the Legislature has expressed, and in words which admit of no doubt, exactly the opposite intention. For reasons best known to those who framed the statute of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, the Legislature has considered it right in cases other than that now under consideration that the payment of a penalty should be enforced by a longer term of imprisonment than could have been awarded in respect of the offence for which the penalty is imposed. Section 58 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 seems to me to place this beyond doubt. A person who is found drunk and disorderly in the public streets is rendered by the section liable to a penalty of not more than 40s., or he may be committed, if the magistrate shall think fit instead of inflicting on him any pecuniary penalty, to the house of correction for any time not more than seven days. It seems to me to be clear that the penalty imposed by section 58 may be enforced by imprisonment for a month under section 77, although the imprisonment awarded in respect of the offence in respect of which the penalty is enforced could not exceed seven days. That being so, I do not think we ought to set aside the ordinary rules of construction upon the assumption that the Legislature never could have intended to adopt a principle which it has, as it seems to me, expressly adopted in the very Act which is now under consideration. If section 77 applies to the enforcement of the penalty imposed by section 58 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, why should it not apply to the pecuniary penalty imposed by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 55, s. 1, which is to be read as part of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 and in lieu of section 57.

But it seems to me that there is very little substance in the objection that is made. Even if section 77 of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 is to be regarded as inapplicable, then as there is no express provision for the enforcement of the penalty it can be enforced only under section 19 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 19.

But even in this case imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month is the ultimate remedy for enforcing the penalty. It is quite true that under the section last mentioned imprisonment only can be resorted to where there is no sufficient distress, but the anomaly remains that a defendant who has neither money nor goods may be sent to prison for one month for the non-payment of a fine of 40s. So that the objection to the conviction is of a technical character, and it is an objection to the form of the conviction only. Had the commitment been in the form of a commitment for want of distress it would have been undoubtedly legal. It may be said that there are cases in which it may be of great importance to a defendant to have a distress levied rather than be sent to prison, but no hardship in that respect arises in the present case.

Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 the magistrate has very extensive powers as to giving time for payment, and he may extend the time or allow the penalty to be paid by instalments. It is clear from the affidavit of the magistrate in the present case that he was willing to extend every reasonable indulgence. He asked the defendant if he wished for time to pay, and the defendant said: "I shall not pay. It is my conscience. I had rather go to prison than pay." So I do not see any hardship in the matter. If, according to the statute, it is necessary to issue a distress before committing the party to prison, then the commitment might be wrong; but I do not think that there would be any hardship in the result.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I agree with great reluctance, but yet yielding completely to the reasoning in the judgment of my learned brother. At the end of the argument my own opinion was strongly the other way, from the difficulty I felt that a man might have to go to prison for a longer time for non-payment of a fine than for the offence itself; and I am not free of the feeling that there is an anomaly in the present state of things. But the analogy pointed out by my brother Bruce as to the person drunk and disorderly appears to me perfectly complete and unanswerable. We can only construe Acts of Parliament according to their true meaning, and if there be an anomaly we must not strain the words of the Act to avoid it, but we must leave it to the Legislature to remove it.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the applicant, Ranger & Burton.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ.) — April 20, 24.

WILLIS v. EARL HOWE. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 26—Concealed fraud — Continuous adverse possession — Practice — Pleadings — Striking out—Frivolous and vexatious action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim in an action of ejectment brought in 1892, alleged that he was the heir-at-law of W. J., who died intestate in 1798, and that, on the death of W. J., his real estate was wrongfully taken possession of by the mother of G. C., in the name of G. C., as the heir-at-law—as the mother falsely alleged—of W. J.; that G. C. died an infant in 1805, whereupon G. C.'s mother continued to hold possession in the name of a supposititious child, R. C., on the false pretence that such child was a brother of G. C., and as such was heir-at-law of W. J.; that both R. C., and afterwards the defendant, who claimed as a volunteer under R. C., remained in possession knowing the above facts, and fraudulently concealed the same from the true heir of W. J.; that the plaintiff and his predecessors had been deprived of the estate by the said concealed fraud, which had not, and could not with reasonable diligence have, been discovered until 1879; and that the plaintiff, at the time of such discovery, was an infant, and only attained twenty-one in 1887. The defendant moved to have the statement of claim struck out and the action dismissed as frivolous or vexatious; and, in support of his application, adduced evidence to show that the allegation that R. C. was a supposititious child had been publicly made in 1853, and had been the foundation of other actions of ejectment against the defendant and his predecessors by other claimants, and that such actions had all been dismissed.

Held (affirming Kekewich, J.), (1) that the allegations in the statement of claim as to the entry in 1798 on behalf of G. C. did not show a case of concealed fraud within section 26 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, but only a wrongful entry under a false claim as heir-at-law; (2) that the statute began to run as against the plaintiff and his predecessors in 1798, and that, as possession adverse to the plaintiff and his predecessors had been held ever since, the operation of the statute was not suspended by what was alleged to have been done in 1805; (3) that the plaintiff or his predecessors knew, or might with reasonable diligence have known, the alleged concealed fraud more than twelve years before action brought; and, accordingly, that the action should be dismissed as frivolous or vexatious.

Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, 38 W. R. 753, 15 App. Cas. 210, followed.

Trustees, Executors, and Agency Co. v. Short, 37 W. R. 433, 13 App. Cas. 793, distinguished.

The action was an ejectment action, and the plaintiff, Benjamin Willis, claimed to be entitled to certain real estates as the present heir-at-law of William Jennens, who died in 1798. The plaintiff attained the age of twenty-one years in 1887, and the writ in this action was issued in August, 1892. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged (paragraph 5) that on the death of William Jennens in 1798 Lady Curzon (Baroness Howe) "wrongfully took possession" of the real estates of William Jennens "in the name and on behalf of her infant son, George Curzon, as the heir-at-law (as she falsely alleged) of William Jennens, and, upon the death of the said George Curzon during infancy in 1805, continued to hold possession of the real estates in the name and on behalf of a supposititious child called Richard W. P. Curzon, then an infant, on the false pretence and representation that he was a younger brother of the said George Curzon, and as such was heir-at-law of said William Jennens, whereas in truth and in fact the so-called Richard Curzon was the illegitimate child of one Anne Oakes, a spinster." It was alleged in other paragraphs of the claim that the said Richard Curzon remained in possession of the estates during his life, although well aware of the above-stated facts, and fraudulently concealed such facts from the then true heir-at-law of William Jennens; that this Richard Curzon was created Earl Howe in 1821, and on his death devised the estates to his son, George Augustus Curzon, the second Earl Howe; that the second Earl Howe devised the estates to his brother, the present defendant, who succeeded as third Earl Howe. The claim further alleged that both the second Earl Howe and the defendant also, knew and fraudulently concealed from the lawful descendants of the first true heir-at-law of William Jennens the facts stated in paragraph 5 of the claim. It was further alleged (paragraph 11) that the facts stated in paragraph 5 "were concealed and kept secret fraudulently by the contrivance of the defendant and his said brother and father respectively, with the intention of depriving the plaintiff and his predecessors in right of the estates, and to further effect the intention aforesaid the defendant and his said brother and father respectively, at various times prior to the year 1859, and subsequently from the last-mentioned date down to the year 1879, did alter the inscription on the family monument in Acton Church, Acton, in the county of Suffolk, by additions to such inscription and erasures therefrom so as to conceal the said fraud." The claim further alleged that the plaintiff had been deprived of the estates by the said concealed fraud, which was not discovered, and could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered, by the plaintiff or his predecessors in right prior to 1879; that the plaintiff at the time of such discovery was an infant, and that since he attained twenty-one he had caused inquiries to be made with the object of obtaining further proof of the said concealed fraud, and that he had only recently been able to obtain such further proof.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant, without delivering any statement of defence, moved to have the statement of claim struck out and the action dismissed as frivolous and vexatious; and in support of the defendant's application, an affidavit was filed by the solicitor of the Howe family which showed in effect that the allegation in the plaintiff's statement of claim that Richard Curzon, first Earl Howe, was not the brother of George Curzon, but an illegitimate child of Anne Oakes, had been often publicly made in newspapers and books many years ago, and had been the foundation of more than one action against the Howe family by other claimants of the estates in question, but that such actions had always been dismissed (see Willis v. Earl Howe, 29 W. R. 70).

Kekewich, J., on the hearing of the defendant's application, made an order that the statement of claim be struck out and the action dismissed as frivolous or vexatious.

The plaintiff appealed.

Winch, Q.C., J. Stuart Colquhoun, and J. C. Calvert, for the appellant.—The operation of the Statute of Limitations is excluded in cases of a concealed fraud: 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 26. The plaintiff here alleges concealed fraud on the part of the defendant and his predecessors, and gives in his pleading particulars of such fraud—viz., that Richard Curzon, knowing that he was the illegitimate child of Anne Oakes, fraudulently took the name of Curzon to conceal his identity, and took possession of the estates under colour of a false title. Acts of concealed fraud are also alleged against the second Earl Howe and the present defendant. This is only an interlocutory application, and if the statement of claim is defective in some respects the plaintiff should have an opportunity of amending; but the judge below has dismissed the action. Vane v. Vane, 21 W. R. 252, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 383, is an authority in favour of the plaintiff's claim.

Warmington, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendant.—From the facts, as stated by the plaintiff himself, the right of entry of the plaintiff's ancestor first accrued in 1798, when a wrongful entry was made on behalf of George Curzon. There is no allegation of any concealed fraud in respect of George Curzon's entry. The statute began to run as against the plaintiff and his ancestors in 1798, and its operation could not be suspended by any concealed fraud—if any such there were—afterwards. Therefore, even if Richard were not the brother of George, and had committed the alleged concealed fraud, still the plaintiff's claim would be demurrable. The evidence filed on behalf of the defendant shows that the allegations of concealed fraud on which the plaintiff relies were made and discussed in public prints years ago, and were actually the foundation of similar ejectment actions against the defendant's predecessor by other claimants, but such actions always failed.

They cited Petre v. Petre, 1 W. R. 139, 1 Drew., at p. 397, and Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, 38 W. R. 753, 15 App. Cas. 210.

Colquhoun, in reply.—If, as the claim alleges, Richard was not really the brother of George, the entry of Richard forms a new departure; and the fact that the statute had begun to run as against the plaintiff's ancestor on the entry of George is immaterial; the operation of the statute would be suspended by reason of the concealed fraud of Richard, through whom the defendant claims. George was only in possession for eight years, and had not acquired a statutory title as against the plaintiff's ancestor.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24.—LINDLEY, L.J.—The action is one of ejectment, and it is brought nearly 100 years after the title of the plaintiff's ancestor accrued, the plaintiff's case being that there had been a "concealed fraud" within the meaning of section 26 of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27). It must be borne in mind that the property has been held adversely to the plaintiff and his predecessors in title ever since 1798. The meaning of section 26 has been very much discussed in various cases, such as Petre v. Petre; Rains v. Buxton, 28 W. R. 954, 14 Ch. D. 537; Lawrance v. Lord Norreys; and Vane v. Vane. These cases show that, in order to obtain the benefit of section 26, the plaintiff in such an action must make out three things:—(1) That there had been a concealed fraud, (2) that he or his predecessor in title had been deprived of the estate by that fraud; and (3) that the fraud had not and could not with reasonable diligence have been known or discovered but within the statutory period (now twelve years) before the action was brought. Lord Herschell, in Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, said (15 App. Cas., at p. 213): "Where an action is thus brought, on a title which accrued more than seventy years ago, to dispossess those who, or whose predecessors, have been in possession during that length of time, it is obvious that the allegations by which it is sought to prevent the statute being a bar need to be closely scrutinized. I will first call attention to what a plaintiff must prove in order to oust the ordinary operation of the statute. . . . It is not enough to prove a concealed fraud; the person bringing the suit must show that he, or some person through whom he claims, has been by such fraud deprived of the land which he seeks to recover, and that the fraud could not with reasonable diligence have been known or discovered more than the statutory period before the action was brought." And Lord Watson said (at p. 220): "It is not any and every fraud that will elide the provisions of the statute and keep alive a right of action for recovery of lands. In the first place, it must be a fraud which has deprived the plaintiff of his land; and, in the second place, it must be a concealed fraud in this sense: that it was not only unknown to the plaintiff and to those through whom he derives right, but could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered by him or them before the commencement of the twelve years immediately preceding the institution of the suit."

Applying those principles of law to the present case, it seems to me that the plaintiff has not brought himself within section 26. What was it that, according to his statement of claim, had deprived the plaintiff's predecessor of the estates? It was what was done in 1798, when he was wrongfully turned out—when the Baroness Howe wrongfully took possession on behalf of her son George. There was no fraud in that, and no concealment. It may have been a wrongful act in respect of which an action could have been brought. From that time the statutory period of limitation began to run, and there has been continuous adverse possession ever since. The case is not like the Trustees, Executors, and Agency Co. v. Short, 37 W. R. 433, 13 App. Cas. 793, where the lands had been left vacant. The act which deprived the plaintiff's predecessor of possession was not a fraud at all, and still less a concealed fraud. The only thing alleged here, with reference to what occurred in 1798, was a wrongful trespass. This is a short answer to the plaintiff's case. But, looking out of the plaintiff's pleading to the affidavit which had been filed by the defendant's solicitor, it is obvious that the action is a most hopeless one. The story about the substitution of the child had been going about ever since 1853, and the plaintiff's predecessors in title might have discovered the alleged fraud (if it existed) long ago without any difficulty. It is a most frivolous and vexatious action, had recourse to for the purpose of extortion, and it ought to be dismissed with costs. Bowen, L.J., concurs in this judgment.

KAY, L.J.—The plaintiff claims a large estate of which he alleges his predecessors in title were deprived in the latter end of last century. He attempts to avoid the effect of the long adverse possession of more than ninety years by alleging that the case comes under section 26 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. He tries to make out that he was so deprived by a concealed fraud. To bring a case within that section these circumstances must concur: (1) There must have been a fraud; (2) That fraud must have deprived the plaintiff or his predecessors in title of the estate; (3) Such fraud must have been concealed. The concealment, further, must have been such that it could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered sooner than it was in fact discovered, and of course must have been within twelve years before the commencement of the action.

Everyone must see the reasonableness of what is stated by the Lord Chancellor in Lawrance v. Norreys, to the effect that in case of a claim after a very long adverse possession the statement in the claimant's pleading must be closely scrutinized.

In this case the first wrongful act which deprived the plaintiff's predecessors in title of the estate is alleged to be the entry upon that estate by Lady Sophia Curzon (afterwards Baroness Howe) on behalf of her infant son George, whom "she falsely alleged" to be the heir of the deceased owner, Wm. Simmens. It is not stated that she knew the allegation to be untrue. But assuming such knowledge to be implied by the use of the word "falsely," the allegation would not amount to more than this, that a person took possession as heir knowing that he was not heir. Is a false assumption of title by a person in taking possession a concealed fraud within the meaning of the section? If so, it must follow that every entry upon land under a claim of title which the person entering knows he could not support would be a concealed fraud within section 26. I do not think this is the meaning of the section. No case has gone so far. Kindersley, V.C., in Petre v. Petre, 1 W. R. 139, 362, 1 Drewry, at p. 397, says: "What is meant by concealed fraud? It does not mean the case of a person entering wrongfully into possession; it means a case of designed fraud by which a party, knowing to whom the right belongs, conceals the circumstances giving that right, and by means of such concealment enables himself to enter and hold." That is not an exhaustive definition, and perhaps none could easily be given of the meaning of "concealed fraud." It is not merely an "unknown fraud," but the word "concealed" seems to indicate that there are facts known to the person who enters, and designedly concealed by him from the real owner, which facts, if known, would enable the real owner to recover. The deprivation of which the section speaks in such a case is by the fraudulent entry; but that which makes a wrongful entry fraudulent is not only the knowledge, but the concealment of those facts. If they had been disclosed, and the person who disclosed them had nevertheless entered, the entry would have been wrongful, but would it have been fraudulent? The section seems to point to some contrivances by which the real owner has not merely been deprived, but defrauded, in the sense of being induced to believe that he was not owner, and that the person who so entered was owner and entitled to enter.

The case on which the pleader really relies is not the first entry on behalf of the son George, but the continuance of possession by Lady Sophia Curzon after the death of George while an infant, on behalf of her alleged second son, Richard. It is stated that Richard was not really the son of Lady Sophia Curzon, being the illegitimate child of one Anne Oakes, but that she passed him off as such, and continued the possession on his behalf, and that when he came twenty-one, he, knowing all the facts, took possession, and that such possession has since been continued by persons claiming as volunteers under him. This is much more like a case of concealed fraud. The personation by Richard of the position of brother of George, and the concealment of the fact that he was not such brother, and the taking possession by him in that character, might bring the case within the section: see Vane v. Vane. But this, according to the allegation, was not the fraud that deprived the plaintiff's ancestor of possession. He had been deprived some years before by the entry of George, and his right first accrued under section 2 of the statute when an entry was made in the name and on behalf of George. Unless that entry brought the case within section 26, the subsequent fraud by which the possession was continued by the supposititious brother of George would not suspend the operation of the statute, which began to run when entry was made on behalf of George. It was suggested in reply that as the alleged brother was not really the brother of George his taking possession formed a new departure, and that the statute would begin to run from that entry, and that the previous possession of George was not material. The effect of that would be that, if a series of occupiers not claiming under one another kept out the real owner for 100 years, time would only run against him from the moment when the last of such occupiers entered into possession. I am of opinion that this is not the law. A continuous adverse possession for the statutory period, though by a succession of persons not claiming under one another, does, in my opinion, bar the true owner. I desired to consider the case (which I had in my mind during this part of the argument, but which was not referred to by counsel)—viz., The Trustees, Executors, and Agency Co. v. Short. In that case there had been an adverse possession of land for some time short of the statutory period, which was then abandoned and the land left vacant, and after the statutory period had elapsed, but within twenty years before the plaintiff's action, the defendant or his successor in title took possession. The law is thus stated in the language of Lord Macnaghten in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council (13 App. Cas., at p. 798): "If a person enters upon the land of another and holds possession for a time, and then, without having acquired title under the statute, abandons possession, the rightful owner on the abandonment is in the same position in all respects as he was before the intrusion took place. There is no one against whom he can bring an action. He cannot make an entry upon himself, nor is there any principle of law which requires him to do any act, to issue any notice, or to perform any ceremony in order to rehabilitate himself. No new departure is necessary. The possession of the intruder, ineffectual for the purpose of transferring title, ceases upon its abandonment to be effectual for any purpose. It does not leave behind it any cloud on the title of the rightful owner, or any secret process at work for the possible benefit in time to come of some casual interloper or lucky vagrant."

These observations were made in a case in which—as I have already noticed—the defendant or his predecessor had not been in possession for the statutory period. If his defence could prevail, it would be enough for a man who entered the day before the action brought to say that the true owner had left the possession vacant for more than twelve years. But it was not meant that if the possession had not been vacant, but some one or other had been in adverse possession during the twelve years, such possession would not bar the true owner unless all such occupants could show a title derived from one another.

An affidavit has been filed on behalf of the defendant, as the practice allows, to show that this action is frivolous and vexatious. According to that affidavit the foundation of the plaintiff's case—viz., that Richard was not the brother of George, but was the illegitimate son of Anne Oakes—has been publicly alleged again and again for many years. It has been the ground of more than one action by claimants of this estate which have failed: it has been published in newspapers and in a book which has been produced. Therefore, there has been no new discovery of this fact. The plaintiff and his predecessors in title knew, or with reasonable diligence might have known, all that he now alleges.

I am of opinion that, on the plaintiff's statement in his pleadings, time began to run against his predecessor in title on the entry of Lady Sophia Curzon on behalf of her son George, and that nothing which is alleged alters the fact that the right of the plaintiff's predecessor first accrued at that time. Even if that were not so, I think it is plain that the plaintiff or his predecessors knew, or might with reasonable diligence have known, all that is here alleged as to the concealed fraud that is put forward as the ground of his claim; and I think that this action is frivolous and vexatious; and therefore the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, N. Moody.

Solicitors for the respondent, Trower, Freeling, & Parker.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) — Feb. 28.

MACALPINE & CO. v. CALDER & CO. (a.)

Practice—Arbitration—Reference of action for trial—Order for inspection of premises—Jurisdiction of referee—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 50—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 14, 15.

A referee or arbitrator to whom an action has been referred for trial under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, has jurisdiction under ord. 36, r. 50, to make an order for inspection of premises the subject-matter of the action.

Hayward v. Mutual Reserve Association, 39 W. R. 624. [1891] 2 Q. B. 236, approved.

The court or a judge has also jurisdiction to make an order for inspection, but, as a general rule, the most convenient course is to apply to the referee or arbitrator in the first instance.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Day and Collins, JJ.) reversing an order of the judge at chambers.

In an action to recover the price of work and labour done and materials supplied to the defendants' premises, after the statement of defence had been delivered, upon a summons for directions, an order was made by consent that the action should be tried before an official referee unless the parties agreed upon a special referee. The parties subsequently agreed upon Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., as special referee, and an order was drawn up on the 3rd of January, 1893, in the form No. 24 in appendix K. to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, referring "all matters in dispute in the action to the award of" Mr. Bucknill.

On the next day the plaintiffs took out a summons for an order for leave to inspect the defendants' premises. The judge made the order, but the Divisional Court discharged it on the ground that, as the order of reference was not made under the Arbitration Act, 1889, the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. The plaintiffs appealed.

W. O. Hodges, for the plaintiffs.—This is a reference under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and not a reference at common law. The matters in the action alone were referred for trial, and not "all matters in difference," as in Darlington Wagon Co. v. Harding, 39 W. R. 167, [1891] 1 Q. B. 245. There was, therefore, jurisdiction in the judge to make the order. The powers conferred upon arbitrators by the first schedule to the Arbitration Act, 1889, only apply to references by consent out of court: section 2. Even if the referee had power under ord. 36, r. 50,* to order inspection, still the judge had concurrent jurisdiction, and as he has exercised his discretion in the matter, the court ought not to have interfered with it.

He also referred to Dauvillier v. Myers, 29 W. R. 535, 17 Ch. D. 346; Rowcliffe v. Leigh, 25 W. R. 56, 4 Ch. D. 661; Edwards v. Edwards, 7 W. R. 92.

Hammond Chambers, for the defendants.—This is not a reference under the Arbitration Act, 1889. It is not a reference "for trial" under section 14; forms 33 and 33*a* are applicable to that section. It is a common law reference to arbitration. There is, therefore, no cause or matter in the court, and the judge had no jurisdiction to make this order: Pearce v. Williams, 31 W. R. 496, 23 Ch. D. 353. But if it is a reference under section 14, the arbitrator has jurisdiction under ord. 36, r. 50, to make an order for inspection: Hayward v. Mutual Reserve Association, 39 W. R. 624, [1891] 2 Q. B. 236; Barnett v. Aldridge Colliery Co., 4 Times L. R. 16.

* See ord. 36, r. 55c.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hodges replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It seems to me that this appeal ought not to be allowed. In my opinion this order of reference was intended to be made and drawn up under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Assuming that that is so, the question arises what jurisdiction the court or a judge has over any question arising in the course of the reference. To ascertain that, we must see what is the position of a referee or arbitrator under such an order of reference. His position is defined by section 15. Putting the two sections together, the position of the referee under this order is that he is an officer of the court, and the court or a judge has jurisdiction over him. Unless, therefore, some language is to be found in the Act depriving the court of that jurisdiction, it is going too far to say that the court has no jurisdiction over its own officer. I cannot find any such language in the Act. Therefore the learned judge at chambers had jurisdiction to make the order. But upon looking at ord. 36, r. 50, it is clear that the referee has ample power to make the order for inspection asked for here. There is, therefore, what I may call concurrent jurisdiction. That being so, the most convenient course to adopt as a general rule is to make the application in the first instance to the referee or arbitrator. That course was stated to be the convenient course in Barnett v. Aldridge Colliery Co. I cannot understand why the plaintiff was in such a hurry to go to chambers and get an order to inspect the premises. He took out the summons the day after the order of reference. If he had waited and applied to the referee, the latter would have decided whether it was necessary. There was no urgency in the matter, and the plaintiff ought not to have adopted the course he did. Still, inasmuch as the matter was within the jurisdiction of the judge at chambers, if the judge had in his discretion considered it a proper case in which to make the order we should not interfere. But the judge was not considering anything of the sort. His mind was directed solely to the question of jurisdiction, and he made the order upon that footing alone. I cannot say that the judge had no jurisdiction, but for the reasons I have given I think that the order of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I entirely agree. I only desire to add that I agree with the view taken by Wills, J., in Hayward v. Mutual Reserve Association, which is in entire conformity with the judgment just delivered by Lindley, L.J. If it ever becomes necessary to deal with the decision in Danvillier v. Myers, I should require time to consider whether it was right, because the late Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that a judge at the trial had no power to make an order for production of documents, a course which has been frequently adopted by judges at trials, at any rate in the common law division.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Irvine, Hodges, & Borrowman.

Solicitor for the defendants, P. Thornton.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Nov. 30.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN KEIGHLEY, MAXSTED, & CO. AND BRYAN, DURANT, & CO. (a.)

Arbitration — Remitting award — Discovery of new evidence—Jurisdiction to remit—Absence of request by arbitrator to remit—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 10.

The court has power, under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to remit an award to an arbitrator upon the ground that new evidence has been discovered since the award was made, though the arbitrator does not join in asking the court to remit the award.

Burnard v. Wainwright, 1 L. M. & P. 455, approved.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division remitting an award.

By a contract for the purchase and sale of a cargo of wheat it was stipulated that all disputes arising out of the contract should be referred to two arbitrators, who had power to call in a third, the award of any two to be final; but in case either party should be dissatisfied with the award, an appeal was given to the committee of appeal of the London Corn Trade Association, subject to the rules of the association. According to these rules the committee of appeal consisted of twenty-five members of the association, five of these being elected by ballot in each case to hear the appeal, and they must confirm the award unless four of them decided to vary or reverse it; and the award of the appeal committee, whether varying or confirming the original award, was to be signed by the chairman, and was to be final and conclusive of the matter in dispute. The rules also provided that in case of the death, illness, refusal to act, or incapacity of any of the five members, the appeal committee should elect by ballot a new member in his or their place or places.

Disputes having arisen under the contract, they were referred to arbitration, and an award having been made in favour of Messrs. Keighley, Maxsted, & Co., the appeal committee confirmed this award. Messrs. Bryan, Durant, & Co., moved to have the award remitted to the appeal committee under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, upon the ground that subsequent to the making of the award new evidence, namely, certain letters, had been discovered material to the question at issue. It appeared from an affidavit made by the appellants that one of the committee stated that if these letters had been before them their decision would have been materially affected. The Divisional Court (Mathew and Bruce, JJ.), reversing the decision of the judge at chambers, remitted the award. Messrs. Keighley, Maxsted, & Co. appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and T. G. Carver, for the appellants.—There is no jurisdiction to remit this award. Section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, is similar to section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the court has only power to remit an award where it could formerly have set it aside. An award cannot be remitted on the ground of a mistake of law or fact: Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 6 W. R. 181, 3 C. B. N. S. 189; unless the arbitrator himself admits the mistake and asks the court to remit the award to him: Mills v. Bowyer's Society 3 K. & J. 66; Dinn v. Blake, L. R. 10 C. P. 388, 23 W. R. Dig. 10. So also in the case of the discovery of new evidence the court will not remit the award unless the arbitrator states in an affidavit that the evidence would have affected his decision. In Burnard v. Wainwright, 1 L. M. & P. 455, the arbitrator asked to have the award remitted; or if that is not so, it is the only case against the appellant's contention and ought not to be followed. [In re Huntley, 1 W. R. 305, 1 E. & B. 787, and Morris v. Morris, 4 W. R. 549, 6 E. & B. 383, were also referred to.] Secondly, there were no arbitrators or umpire here within the meaning of section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. An arbitrator or umpire is a person who has to determine the matter finally. There was an appeal in this case from the arbitrators to the appeal committee, who are not arbitrators or umpires, and the award cannot be remitted to them. Further, one of the five members of the committee has died since the award, and it is impossible to remit it to the same tribunal that heard the matter. Lastly, these letters are not evidence admissible in a court of law, and on that ground the court will in its discretion refuse to remit the award.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Finlay, Q.C., and Pollard, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The parties to this arbitration entered into a contract for the purchase and sale of a cargo of wheat. Disputes arose in relation to that contract, and by one of its terms those disputes were referred to certain arbitrators, subject to the right of either party, if dissatisfied with the award, to have the matters in dispute tried by the committee of appeal of the London Corn Trade Association, which was, in reality, a hearing by an umpire. The arbitrators made an award, and one of the parties being dissatisfied with it, desired the decision of the umpire. The appeal committee act according to their well-known rules, and appoint five members of their body to hear the matter. According to the rules, if one of the five dies, the committee appoint another in his place. The matters in dispute accordingly went before the committee, who gave their decision. That was the decision of the umpire. One of the members has since died, and I presume that another will be appointed in his place if this award is sent back. The decision is final, and not subject to appeal to a court of law. One of the parties, however, has asked the court to remit the award under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. In the first place I cannot doubt that this was an arbitration, and that the arbitrators and appeal committee were in reality arbitrators and an umpire. The case therefore comes within the Act. Now the Arbitration Act, 1889, has in great measure followed the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. If any part is enacted in the same terms as the earlier Act, then, according to well-known rules of construction, decisions placing a construction upon the words of the earlier Act will be followed when construing similar words in the later Act.

The history of the power to refer back an award is this. Formerly, submissions to arbitration sometimes contained a power to refer back the award, and sometimes they did not. In the former case the court could have referred back the award; in the latter case it could not. But the court could only refer back the award upon certain grounds. The effect of section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, according to the decisions, was that all submissions, whether by consent or not, must be treated as if they contained a clause giving the court power to refer back the award. That is still the law under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, which is similar in terms to section 8 of the earlier Act. Therefore we must treat this case in the same way as if it was a submission in the old days containing a clause giving the court power to refer back the award to the arbitrator. The decisions upon the Common Law Procedure Act showed that the Act did not alter the old law that the award of the arbitrators was final and conclusive, both as to law and fact, and that the court could not upon the application of the parties send back the award merely upon the ground of a mistake of law or fact. But where one of the parties applied to the court to send the award back, and the arbitrator himself admitted the mistake and asked the assistance of the court in sending it back, the court had power to send it back. That was the law under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and Dinn v. Blake adopts that law. That rule only applies where there has been a mistake of law or fact, and Dinn v. Blake is no authority beyond that. In the present case it is not alleged that the arbitrators made any mistake upon the case as it was before them. It is, however, said that they had not the whole case before them, new evidence having been discovered since the award was made. We have only to decide the question to-day upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence. We are not required to say whether an award might not be sent back upon other grounds, as, for instance, where one of the parties kept back certain material evidence. We are only called upon to determine whether, upon the discovery of new evidence since the award, the court can send the award back where the arbitrator has not asked the court to send it back to him. That question seems to me to have been determined in Burnard v. Wainwright. In the submission in that case (decided in 1850) there was a power to remit the award for reconsideration, and the law, as I have said, now is that all submissions are to be taken as containing such a power. Wightman, J., there decided that the court might remit the award upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence, though the arbitrator had not asked that it should be remitted. We must adopt that law now. It is then said that the evidence must be such as would be admissible in a court of law. But the parties have agreed to submit their disputes to arbitrators who are not bound by the legal rules of evidence. The court must say whether something has been discovered since the award which an arbitrator might think material and which might affect his decision. We cannot say whether or not it will alter his decision. That is a matter for him. If something is discovered which relates to the matter in dispute, even though it is not strictly evidence in a court of law, the court may, though it is not bound to, remit the award. Here something has been discovered since the award which relates to the matter in dispute, and which may alter the decision of the appeal committee, and the award will accordingly be remitted to them.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises under section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. The words are very general and comprehensive, but I am not prepared to say that they are more so than section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. Now the first case that we must consider is Burnard v. Wainwright, decided in 1850. In that case there was a clause in the submission empowering the court to refer the award back, and there seems to have been a statement by the arbitrator that his decision would have been affected by the new evidence, though Wightman, J., placed no reliance upon that fact in his judgment. In the present case also it is stated that one of the committee said that the decision would have been affected by the new evidence. In the former case, as in this, there was no affidavit by the arbitrator asking the assistance of the court; and so that case bears very strongly upon the decision in this case. Then came the case of Mills v. Bowyer's Society, where Wood, V.C., said: "It does not appear that there is anything in that statute (the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854) that would authorize the court to send back an award for the reconsideration of the arbitrators upon any other grounds than those which have hitherto prevailed to invalidate an award. . . . This 8th section is nothing more or less, as it appears to me, looking back to the history of what took place before the passing of the Act, than the introduction of a statutory enactment enabling the court to do that which experience has shown it was convenient it should have the power of doing, and which had frequently before been specially provided in orders of reference by the court and in submissions by consent between the parties—namely, that there should be a special power in the court to remit the matters in question, or any of them, to the consideration of arbitrators rather than set the whole award aside." The learned Vice-Chancellor makes it clear that a submission since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, without a clause giving the court power to refer back the award, has the same effect as a submission with that clause formerly had.

Then we come to Dinn v. Blake, where it was decided that an award will not be sent back to an arbitrator on the ground that he has made a mistake except where the arbitrator himself admits the mistake. Archibald, J., states the law clearly: "The general principle is that an award is final; and, assuming that it is good on the face of it, there can be no appeal from it. The only exceptions are where there is corruption on the part of the arbitrator, or excess of jurisdiction, or where the arbitrator himself admits that there is a mistake, and, as it were, craves the assistance of the court in setting it right." If the present case was one of mistake of law or fact made by the arbitrators, as the arbitrators do not ask that the award should be sent back, that decision shows that the court would not send it back. But the present case is governed by the decision in Burnard v. Wainwright, which shows that the court can remit the award upon the ground of the discovery of fresh evidence without being asked to do so by the arbitrator. Therefore it seems to me that the court has power to remit this award.

It is said that this new matter is not such evidence as would be admissible in a court of law, and that therefore the court ought not to remit the award. I cannot agree. A lay arbitrator is not governed by the strict rules of evidence, and it is sufficient if he might be influenced by it, though it is not strict legal evidence. I am not prepared to say that this evidence is not legal evidence; I express no opinion upon that.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the court has jurisdiction to remit this award, and that the new evidence is such as will justify the court in the exercise of its discretion in remitting it.

KAY, L.J.—This case raises a question of great importance as to the finality of awards. I am clearly of opinion that neither section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, nor section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, intended to give an appeal from the decision of an arbitrator upon the ground that he came to a wrong decision. What, then, is the effect of the sections? I find it very difficult to lay down the precise limits of the applicability of those sections, and accordingly we cannot do better than be guided by previous decisions. The court has always been very reluctant to remit an award. The decisions have laid down rules upon which the court acts in determining whether an award is to be remitted, and enable us to say that this case comes within those rules. I say so upon this ground: in Dinn v. Blake Archibald, J., laid down the rules upon which the court will remit an award, and those rules are strictly limited. But Burnard v. Wainwright added yet one more exception to the rule against remitting awards, namely, where new evidence is discovered since the award which might, and probably would influence the arbitrator's decision, the discovery of that evidence would be a ground upon which the court might remit the award, more especially where the arbitrator himself said that it would have influenced his decision if it had been before him. In Burnard v. Wainwright a statement appears in the report that the arbitrator said that he would have been influenced by the evidence, and in the present case we have something like it, one of the arbitrators stating that he would have been influenced by it. Therefore the present case is very like Burnard v. Wainwright. In that case, decided in 1850, the submission contained a clause giving the court power to remit the award. The court did not say that that clause gave it an absolute discretion to remit; it only said that the court might remit if fresh evidence were discovered since the making of the award. The present case comes within the decision in Burnard v. Wainwright, and we do not in any way extend the power of the court to remit an award. I am not prepared to go one step beyond those cases. The limit to be placed upon section 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, must be looked for in those decisions. The case of Mills v. Bowyer's Society shows that one object of section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was to do away with the necessity of inserting in submissions a clause giving the court power to remit an award. We cannot hold that the court ought now to remit an award when it would not have done so before the Act when the submission contained a clause giving power to remit.

It was then said that the new evidence here is of such a character that it would not be admissible in a court of justice, and that therefore the court would be going too far if it said that it would remit the award upon the discovery of such evidence. To my mind no hard-and-fast rule can be laid down. If the admission of the evidence would cause grave injustice, the court would, in all probability, not remit the award. But I am not satisfied that this evidence would not be admissible in a court of justice. I do not mean to say that if the court thought that the evidence was not such as would be admissible in a court of justice, but was such as an arbitrator might well receive, the court might not remit the award. The court would, perhaps, in such a case, be slow or cautious in remitting it. It was then said that, as one of the five arbitrators has died since the award, the court cannot remit the award to the five arbitrators. But part of the agreement of reference is that, if one of the arbitrators dies before the award is made, the vacancy so caused may be filled up. If this award is remitted, then there has been no final award, and so the vacancy may be filled up. Therefore no difficulty can arise. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Simpson & Cullingford.

Solicitors for the respondents, Freshfields & Williams.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. March 15.

In re J. BROWN'S ESTATE.
BROWN v. BROWN. (a.)

Mortgage — Principal and surety — Joint and several covenant by mortgagor and surety — Payment on demand—Present debt—Collateral sum — Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 3.

Where there is a present debt and a promise to pay on demand, the demand is not considered to be a condition precedent to the bringing of an action.

Secus, where there is a promise to pay a collateral sum on request.

Where a mortgage contained joint and several covenants by J. B. and the mortgagor to pay the mortgage debt and interest "on demand," and that they would, "in the meantime from the date" of the deed pay interest half-yearly until payment of the principal, and a proviso for redemption if the mortgagor should "on demand" pay the debt and interest,

Held, on the construction of the covenants, that there was intended to be a demand precedent to the bringing of any action thereon, and that no right of action accrued against J. B. until demand made.

Summons.

These were two summonses which were heard together, the application in each case being that the applicants might, notwithstanding that the time limited for their making claims as creditors upon the estate of John Brown in the above action had expired, make and establish their claims as such creditors.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated in September, 1867, and made between Alfred Brown, now deceased, the mortgagor, of the first part, John Brown, his father, of the second part, and the mortgagees of the third part, after reciting that Alfred Brown had requested the mortgagees to lend him £3,000, which they had agreed to do upon having the same, with interest, secured in manner thereinafter expressed, it was witnessed that in consideration of the loan Alfred Brown mortgaged to them certain hereditaments and premises, subject to a proviso for redemption thereof if Alfred Brown should on demand pay to the mortgagees £3,000, with interest for the same from the date thereof, and Alfred Brown and John Brown did thereby jointly covenant for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, and each of them did thereby separately for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant with the mortgagees that they or one of them, their or one of their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, would on demand pay unto the mortgagees £3,000, and also would in the meantime, from the date thereof, pay interest on the same by equal half-yearly payments in each year, and a proportionate part of such interest from the date of the last half-yearly payment up to the payment of the principal money thereby secured.

By another indenture of mortgage made in October, 1867, the parties to which were Joseph Granger Brown, the mortgagor, of the first part, the above-named John Brown of the second part, and mortgagees of the third part, the sum of £6,000 lent by them to the mortgagor, with interest, was secured in similar manner.

John Brown died in November, 1872. In April, 1880, this action was begun for administration of his estate, and in May, 1880, the usual judgment was given. In pursuance thereof advertisements were issued for creditors to come in and prove their debts, and the time fixed for bringing in claims expired in 1880 without any claims having been sent in.

The last payment of interest by Alfred Brown on account of the £3,000 was on the 1st of January, 1886, but the proceeds of a distraint for interest under a power in the mortgage were in January, 1887, and some rent due from a tenant of part of the property was in December, 1887, paid to the mortgagees.

The interest on the £6,000 was paid in full by Joseph Granger Brown down to December, 1884. His last payment on account of interest thereof was in March, 1888.

In July, 1889, the property mortgaged in October, 1867, was sold under the power of sale, but the amount realized was considerably short of the sum then due on the mortgage.

No claim was made against the estate of John Brown in respect of the liability under the covenant contained in the £3,000 mortgage until July, 1889, or in respect of the liability under the covenant contained in the £6,000 mortgage until October, 1889.

The mortgagees now claimed to be let in as creditors of the estate in respect of the amounts due on their respective mortgages which the mortgagors were unable to pay.

Farwell, Q.C., and G. N. Marcy, for the applicants on the first summons.—The Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 3, did not commence to run till demand was made, there being no debt until demand made, which was a condition precedent under the mortgage covenants. The moneys secured did not therefore become payable until 1889, when demand was first made. The case is analogous to that of a bond payable on demand, where there is no breach until demand made of the condition in the bond: Carter v. Ring, 3 Camp. 459; Sicklemore v. Thistleton, 6 M. & S. 9; Brighty v. Norton, 11 W. R. 167, 32 L. J. Q. B. 38, 3 B. & S. 305; Toms v. Wilson, 11 W. R. 117, 4 B. & S. 442; Nicholl v. Bromley, 2 B. & Bing. 464; and unlike that of a negotiable instrument, which depends upon the law merchant, and is different: Brighty v. Norton, 32 L. J. (Q. B.), at p. 40, per Blackburn, J.

Vernon R. Smith, for the applicants on the second summons.

G. Henderson, for the respondents.—The statute commenced to run from the respective dates of execution of the mortgages. No demand was necessary. Words used in the defeasance of a bond are distinguishable, and the analogy of the law of negotiable instruments shows that the moneys were payable as soon as the mortgages were executed: Norton v. Ellam, 2 M. & W. 461; Jackson v. Ogg, 7 W. R. 730, Johns. 397; In re George, 38 W. R. 617, 44 Ch. D. 627.

Farwell, in reply, cited Saunders' argument in Birks v. Trippet, 1 Williams' Saunders, 42. [CHITTY, J., referred to Collins v. Benning, 12 Mod. 444, and Rumball v. Ball, 10 Mod. 38.]

CHITTY, J.—The claims of the two applicants are founded upon covenants. The covenants are the same, and my judgment in the one case will apply to the other.

The covenant is by the testator John Brown; it is a separate covenant; and the question for decision is one on the construction of the covenant. It is a covenant (I am speaking of one covenant only now) in a mortgage deed, the testator's son being the borrower and mortgagor. The recital is that Alfred Brown has requested the mortgagee to lend and advance to him the sum of £3,000, which he has agreed to do upon having the same, with interest, secured. Then the operative part shows payment to Alfred, the son, and then the proviso for redemption is if Alfred, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall, on demand, pay to the mortgagee the £3,000, with interest on the same from the date hereof at the rate of five per cent. per annum, then these presents shall be void. The covenent is joint and several. Alfred and John jointly and severally covenant with the mortgagee that they, or one of them, will on demand pay to the mortgagee the sum of £3,000, and also will in the meantime, from the date hereof, pay interest on the same or such part thereof as shall from time to time remain unpaid at the rate of five per cent. per annum, by half-yearly payments at the dates hereinafter specified.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

Now for those interested in the testator's estate it is said that the meaning of the words "on demand" is the same as that which has been attributed to them in promissory notes and the like. The law is quite settled that, with regard to a promissory note payable on demand, no demand is necessary before bringing an action; and indeed the Statute of Limitations begins to run from the making of the note.

It was suggested by Mr. Farwell in his argument that the class of cases to which I am now alluding were all referable to the law merchant, and a passage from Blackburn, J.'s judgment, as reported in 32 L. J. in the case of Brighty v. Norton, was relied on for that purpose. But in the report of the same case in 3 B. & S. the passage is omitted. I am not satisfied that the distinction attempted to be made between the law merchant and the general law with regard to the meaning of the words "pay on demand" can be supported. Lord Wensleydale, in the well-known case of Norton v. Ellam, does not draw that distinction. He says, "I entertain no doubt at all on this point"—that is, about the Statute of Limitations running from the date of the note—"it is the same as in the case of money lent, payable on request with interest, where no request is necessary before bringing the action." That is a general proposition, and not one based upon the law merchant; and without going through the whole of the cases to which I have referred in the course of the argument, it is plain that a distinction has been taken and maintained in law, the result of which is that where there is a present debt and a promise to pay on demand, the demand is not considered to be a condition precedent to the bringing of the action.

But it is otherwise on a promise to pay a collateral sum on request, for then the request ought to be made before action brought. I think the distinction which I have mentioned is sufficiently pointed out in Saunders' argument in Birks v. Trippet, which was accepted by the whole of the court, the judges having been apparently somewhat impatient at the learned counsel labouring his argument to the extent he did.

It is a question, then, of the construction of the instrument; and it is not immaterial to observe that the testator here was a surety. Nor is it immaterial to observe that the proviso conferring the right of redemption on the son is framed in a similar manner to the covenant, and there is in the proviso for redemption as well as in the covenant a distinction with regard to interest which would be no distinction if the argument for the respondent could be maintained, the distinction being a distinction between "on demand" as to principal and interest "from the date hereof." In other words, the proviso for redemption would have to be read, according to the respondent's argument, in this way:—This being a mortgage transaction and the sum of £3,000 lent on the security of the land, the words "pay on demand" must be transmuted to "shall pay on the date hereof." The interest is to run "from the date hereof" according to the express words of the proviso. I can see no grounds for putting a different construction in this respect on the proviso and on the covenant, and I therefore come to the conclusion that the meaning of the covenant is, and the meaning of the parties sufficiently manifested by the language they have used is, that there shall be a demand precedent to the bringing of any action on the covenant. The father as surety was to have some time, that is a reasonable time, which it is not necessary for me to attempt to define. But he was to have a reasonable time after demand to find the money which he has to pay. The covenant itself as to interest is a separate covenant, the words being "will in the meantime." What force can be attributed to the words "in the meantime," if the words "on demand" mean at the date of this deed?

That being my opinion upon the construction of the instrument, and it being admittedly a question of construction, it is hardly necessary to refer to the authorities. I may, however, mention Carter v. Ring, where the action was brought on the bond, the defeasance of the bond being to pay one-half of the amount of the penal sum on demand, with lawful interest; and Lord Ellenborough held (at Nisi Prius) that the plaintiff in such case as that was bound to prove a demand before he could succeed. I am unable to follow the distinction that was attempted to be made with regard to this case, founded on the suggestion that the words "on demand" come in the defeasance of the bond. I can see no difference between the words occurring in the defeasance of a bond or in a covenant in which there is no defeasance.

With regard to the other cases, there is Sicklemore v. Thistleton; but upon that it appears to me there could have been little doubt as to the meaning of the parties that the demand did mean a demand, as was there held, the only difference in the case being that there were two covenants. It is not necessary to cite any further authority, and I am of opinion that the right of action did not accrue against the testator till demand made, and it is admitted that the demand was made for the first time in 1889. That being so, I think both the applicants are entitled to be admitted now to come in and prove. The estate under administration has not been fully administered. Of course they could not, and do not, disturb anything that has been already done in the way of payment to other creditors and the like. There is no laches. There is no such conduct on their part as would justify the court, according to the ordinary rule, in precluding them, although they come late.

Applications allowed.

Solicitors for the applicants, Prior, Church, & Adams; Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for F. T. Veley, Chelmsford.

Solicitor for the respondents, J. Plaskitt, for F. Smoothy, Braintree.

Chan. Div.
Stirling, J. } Jan. 13.

COLLINS v. BARKER. (a.)

Partnership — Articles — Bankruptcy of some of the partners—Provision for retention of bankrupt partner's share — Validity—Receiver and manager — Right of trustee in bankruptcy to appointment of.

It was provided by articles of partnership entered into in August, 1891, that if any partner should become bankrupt, he should be deemed to have ceased to be a partner at the date of such bankruptcy; and that, upon any partner ceasing to be a partner from any cause, before the expiration of the partnership term (which was for fourteen years), the partnership should thereupon determine as to such partner, and his share in the capital of the partnership should remain as a loan, bearing interest, to the continuing partners for the residue of the term of fourteen years, or so long as the business should be carried on, and the repayment of the loan and interest should be secured by the joint and several bond, or the bond or covenant, of the continuing partners.

The partnership consisted of four persons, one of whom had provided the whole of the capital. This partner and two of the other three, became bankrupt in June, 1892, and their trustees in bankruptcy brought an action against the defendant, the remaining solvent partner, for a declaration that the above provisions of the partnership articles were void as against the plaintiffs and the creditors of the bankrupts. On an application by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the partnership business, the defendant claimed the right, as solvent partner, to be appointed receiver and manager.

Held, that, in the absence of any explanation as to the reason for the insertion of the above provisions in the partnership articles, the inference was that they were inserted in contemplation of bankruptcy, and that under the circumstances the plaintiffs were entitled to the protection of a receiver and manager, but that the defendant was entitled to be appointed receiver and manager; that he must give security, pass his accounts, furnish the plaintiffs with proper accounts, and give them reasonable access to the books; and that he must pay the balances in his hands when they reached an agreed amount, either into court, or to a joint banking account of himself and the plaintiffs.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, who were the trustees in bankruptcy of George Barker, Hilton Cassanet Barker, and William Barker, asking for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the business of distillers and wine and spirit merchants, lately carried on by the defendant G. E. Barker in partnership with the bankrupts. The articles of partnership were dated the 14th of August, 1891, and provided for a term of fourteen years from the 1st of January, 1891.

Clause 21 of the articles provided that if any partner or partners should retire or become bankrupt, he or they should be deemed to have ceased to be a partner or partners at the date of such retirement or bankruptcy.

Clause 22 provided as follows:—Upon the death of any partner, or upon any partner or partners ceasing to be a partner or partners from any cause whatsoever before the expiration of the partnership, such partnership shall thereupon determine as to such partner or partners and the share of such deceased or outgoing partner or partners shall, as from his or their death, or ceasing to be a partner or partners as aforesaid, vest in, and belong to, and be purchased by, the remaining partners or partner, and if more than one in shares proportionate to their then shares in the profits of the business, and the deceased or outgoing partner or partners or his or their representatives (as the case may be) shall be entitled to interest on his or their share or shares in the capital of the partnership up to the time of the death or ceasing of the partnership of such partner or partners, and to any profits which shall have become payable but shall not have been actually paid to him or them, and also if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners on the day for taking the annual general account to his or their share or shares of profits as ascertained on taking such account, and if he or they die or cease to be a partner or partners on any other day to an allowance in lieu of profits at a rate equal to the net profits during the year preceding the last day for taking the annual general account on his or their shares in the said capital up to the day of his or their death or ceasing to be a partner or partners to be calculated if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners before the 31st day of December, 1891, from the commencement of the partnership, but if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners after that day then from the last day for taking the annual general account (but subject to the deduction of any drawings on account of current profits which shall have been made by him or them respectively) and the representatives of such deceased or outgoing partner or partners shall be bound by such last annual account and shall be excluded from examining the partnership books, and his or their share or respective shares in the capital of the partnership shall remain as a loan to the surviving or continuing partners or partner during the residue of the said term of fourteen years or during such shorter period as such surviving or continuing partners or partner shall carry on the said business either alone or in partnership with any other persons or person in accordance with the provisions of these presents, bearing interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum payable on the usual quarter days, and the repayment of the said loan at the end of the said period, together with the interest thereon as aforesaid, shall be secured to the outgoing partner or partners or his or their representatives as the case may be at the expense and by the joint and several bond or the bond or covenant of the surviving or continuing partners or partner."

The whole of the capital in the business had been provided by Geo. Barker, the father of the other three partners. The defendant, the youngest of the three sons, had for some years previously to the present term of partnership been manager of the business under the former partnership articles, and continued to act as such during the present partnership, having become a partner in 1891. Geo. Barker and his two elder sons, at the time of their bankruptcy, June, 1892, were engaged in a very large business as bankers and financial agents, and in other businesses. The plaintiffs in the action claimed a declaration that the articles of partnership under which the defendant claimed to retain as a loan the share of the bankrupts in the capital of the partnership for the residue of the term of fourteen years from the 1st of January, 1891, were void as against the plaintiffs, and the creditors of the bankrupts. They also asked for an account, and that the partnership business might be wound up and the assets realized under the direction of the court.

Hastings, Q.C., and Eve, for the motion, contended that the articles of partnership amounted to a fraud on the bankruptcy laws: Higinbotham v. Holme, 19

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ves. 88; Ex parte Mackay, 21 W. R. 664, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 643; Whitmore v. Mason, 10 W. R. 168, 2 J. & H. 204; and Wilson v. Greenwood, 1 Swans. 471. [STIRLING, J., referred to Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., pp. 433, 647.] If the clause in question were held to be valid, the continuing partner would be able to keep the creditors of the bankrupts out of their property for a number of years.

Buckley, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the defendant, did not object to the appointment of a receiver, and accepted the principle as laid down by James, L.J., in Ex parte Jay, In re Harrison, 28 W. R. 449, 14 Ch. D. 19; but that was not the present case. Wilson v. Greenwood was the nearest to the present one, and was not an authority, because the point was not necessary for decision. If there was a bonâ fide contract, and the bankruptcy of any partner resulted, the trustee in bankruptcy was bound to regard the rest as debtors, and must take his debt by instalments with interest. It was not taking away the bankrupt's property, but selling it on particular terms: Lindley on Partnership, p. 670. In the event of the bankruptcy of a partner no right passed to the trustee in bankruptcy to continue in partnership with the solvent partners: Ex parte Stoveld, 1 Gl. & J. 303; Freeland v. Stansfeld, 2 W. R. 575, 2 Sm. & Giff. 479. No case was made out or suggested against the defendant personally, so as to say that he was not entitled to be appointed receiver.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—[STIRLING, J.—I am satisfied on the point of law that it is a proper case for a receiver; I only want to hear you as to the terms on which a receiver should be appointed.] I ask for the appointment of one of my clients as receiver, and the defendant may continue as manager.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—If the clause in question (22) is valid, the creditors of the bankrupts will be kept out of their share of the partnership property for about thirteen years, and will have no security for it except the bond or covenant of the defendant, who did not bring one shilling into the business. It appears to me that the case of Wilson v. Greenwood does apply to this case. In that case articles of partnership provided that on dissolution by death, notice, or misconduct of a partner the remaining partners should have the option of taking his share at a valuation, payable by yearly instalments in the course of seven years, and that on the bankruptcy or insolvency of a partner the partnership should be immediately void as to him. By a deed four years subsequent the partners declared (after a recital that such was their intention in the articles) that in the event of bankruptcy or insolvency the same arrangement should be practised as on dissolution by death, notice, or misconduct. One of the partners having become bankrupt a few months after the execution of the latter deed his assignees were not bound by it. Lord Eldon's opinion seems to have been that, even if the provision had been in the original deed, it would not have been good. He came to the conclusion that the deed was not made bonâ fide, but with a view of protecting the remaining partners in the event of bankruptcy.

How, in the present case, the clause got in the articles is not quite clear. Mr. George Barker and the defendant both say in their evidence that they knew nothing about it. The defendant says he thought it was a provision for the death of his father, so that he should not have to pay out his capital in that event. In the absence of any explanation I draw the inference of fact that the clause was inserted in contemplation of bankruptcy. In my opinion it has been sufficiently made out that there is a case to be tried, and having regard to the large interests of the plaintiffs, they must be protected. I must treat the case for the present purpose as if the clause had been struck out by the bankruptcy, and no express provision for winding up the affairs of the partnership had been made. In an ordinary case a solvent partner would be entitled to wind up the affairs of the partnership, and the usual course where disputes as to the management of the partnership affairs arise between the trustee of a bankrupt partner and the solvent partners, and there is no reason for distrusting the latter, is, as stated in Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 670, that the court will appoint one of them receiver of the partnership property, directing him to give security, to pass his accounts, and to furnish the trustee with proper accounts, and to allow him at all reasonable times to inspect the partnership books.

The defendant claims the benefit of his primâ facie right to be appointed receiver, in accordance with the practice of the court. The plaintiffs do not object to his being manager, but wish that someone should be appointed receiver jointly with him, and that is the question which I have to determine. I feel strongly that the plaintiffs' risk is so great that they ought to be protected; but the defendant is a partner, and a solvent one, in the sense that he has not been adjudicated bankrupt, though it may be doubtful whether his pecuniary resources are great; and no reason has been shown why he should not be appointed receiver and manager, in accordance with the practice of the court. He must give security and pass his accounts; he must furnish the plaintiffs with proper accounts, and allow them all reasonable access to the books; and, further, when the balances in his hands reach a certain amount, to be agreed upon by the parties, he must pay the amount into court or to a joint account at a bank of the plaintiffs and himself. His remuneration must be settled by the chief clerk at chambers. I do not think it desirable to appoint the defendant manager and someone else receiver, as that course sometimes leads to difficulties.

Solicitors for the motion, A. J. Benjamin.

Solicitors for the defendant, Whittington, Son, & Barker.

Chan. Div. } Romer, J. } Nov. 18.

In re GURNEY.
MASON v. MERCER. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59)—Conversion—Statute of Limitations.

M. was trustee under a will of certain funds which he was empowered to invest in real securities in England or Wales. He and his co-trustee, in March, 1878, advanced £10,000, part of the funds, upon mortgage of hop and fruit gardens in Kent, and the money was paid to the credit of the account of the mortgagor, which was overdrawn to more than that amount, at a bank in which M. was a partner. The investment turned out valueless, and this action was brought on the 20th of August, 1890, by a beneficiary under the will, alleging that M. had been guilty of fraudulent breach of trust.

Held, that section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applied and barred the action, which could not be treated as an action to recover the proceeds of trust property "received by the trustee and converted to his use" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 8 of the Act, and so be excepted from the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } Jan. 13.

COLLINS v. BARKER. (a.)

Partnership — Articles — Bankruptcy of some of the partners—Provision for retention of bankrupt partner's share — Validity—Receiver and manager — Right of trustee in bankruptcy to appointment of.

It was provided by articles of partnership entered into in August, 1891, that if any partner should become bankrupt, he should be deemed to have ceased to be a partner at the date of such bankruptcy; and that, upon any partner ceasing to be a partner from any cause, before the expiration of the partnership term (which was for fourteen years), the partnership should thereupon determine as to such partner, and his share in the capital of the partnership should remain as a loan, bearing interest, to the continuing partners for the residue of the term of fourteen years, or so long as the business should be carried on, and the repayment of the loan and interest should be secured by the joint and several bond, or the bond or covenant, of the continuing partners.

The partnership consisted of four persons, one of whom had provided the whole of the capital. This partner and two of the other three, became bankrupt in June, 1892, and their trustees in bankruptcy brought an action against the defendant, the remaining solvent partner, for a declaration that the above provisions of the partnership articles were void as against the plaintiffs and the creditors of the bankrupts. On an application by the plaintiffs for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the partnership business, the defendant claimed the right, as solvent partner, to be appointed receiver and manager.

Held, that, in the absence of any explanation as to the reason for the insertion of the above provisions in the partnership articles, the inference was that they were inserted in contemplation of bankruptcy, and that under the circumstances the plaintiffs were entitled to the protection of a receiver and manager, but that the defendant was entitled to be appointed receiver and manager; that he must give security, pass his accounts, furnish the plaintiffs with proper accounts, and give them reasonable access to the books; and that he must pay the balances in his hands when they reached an agreed amount, either into court, or to a joint banking account of himself and the plaintiffs.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, who were the trustees in bankruptcy of George Barker, Hilton Cassanet Barker, and William Barker, asking for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the business of distillers and wine and spirit merchants, lately carried on by the defendant G. E. Barker in partnership with the bankrupts. The articles of partnership were dated the 14th of August, 1891, and provided for a term of fourteen years from the 1st of January, 1891.

Clause 21 of the articles provided that if any partner or partners should retire or become bankrupt, he or they should be deemed to have ceased to be a partner or partners at the date of such retirement or bankruptcy.

Clause 22 provided as follows:—Upon the death of any partner, or upon any partner or partners ceasing to be a partner or partners from any cause whatsoever before the expiration of the partnership, such partnership shall thereupon determine as to such partner or partners and the share of such deceased or outgoing partner or partners shall, as from his or their death, or ceasing to be a partner or partners as aforesaid, vest in, and belong to, and be purchased by, the remaining partners or partner, and if more than one in shares proportionate to their then shares in the profits of the business, and the deceased or outgoing partner or partners or his or their representatives (as the case may be) shall be entitled to interest on his or their share or shares in the capital of the partnership up to the time of the death or ceasing of the partnership of such partner or partners, and to any profits which shall have become payable but shall not have been actually paid to him or them, and also if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners on the day for taking the annual general account to his or their share or shares of profits as ascertained on taking such account, and if he or they die or cease to be a partner or partners on any other day to an allowance in lieu of profits at a rate equal to the net profits during the year preceding the last day for taking the annual general account on his or their shares in the said capital up to the day of his or their death or ceasing to be a partner or partners to be calculated if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners before the 31st day of December, 1891, from the commencement of the partnership, but if he or they shall die or cease to be a partner or partners after that day then from the last day for taking the annual general account (but subject to the deduction of any drawings on account of current profits which shall have been made by him or them respectively) and the representatives of such deceased or outgoing partner or partners shall be bound by such last annual account and shall be excluded from examining the partnership books, and his or their share or respective shares in the capital of the partnership shall remain as a loan to the surviving or continuing partners or partner during the residue of the said term of fourteen years or during such shorter period as such surviving or continuing partners or partner shall carry on the said business either alone or in partnership with any other persons or person in accordance with the provisions of these presents, bearing interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum payable on the usual quarter days, and the repayment of the said loan at the end of the said period, together with the interest thereon as aforesaid, shall be secured to the outgoing partner or partners or his or their representatives as the case may be at the expense and by the joint and several bond or the bond or covenant of the surviving or continuing partners or partner."

The whole of the capital in the business had been provided by Geo. Barker, the father of the other three partners. The defendant, the youngest of the three sons, had for some years previously to the present term of partnership been manager of the business under the former partnership articles, and continued to act as such during the present partnership, having become a partner in 1891. Geo. Barker and his two elder sons, at the time of their bankruptcy, June, 1892, were engaged in a very large business as bankers and financial agents, and in other businesses. The plaintiffs in the action claimed a declaration that the articles of partnership under which the defendant claimed to retain as a loan the share of the bankrupts in the capital of the partnership for the residue of the term of fourteen years from the 1st of January, 1891, were void as against the plaintiffs, and the creditors of the bankrupts. They also asked for an account, and that the partnership business might be wound up and the assets realized under the direction of the court.

Hastings, Q.C., and Eve, for the motion, contended that the articles of partnership amounted to a fraud on the bankruptcy laws: Higinbotham v. Holme, 19

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ves. 88; Ex parte Mackay, 21 W. R. 664, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 643; Whitmore v. Mason, 10 W. R. 168, 2 J. & H. 204; and Wilson v. Greenwood, 1 Swans. 471. [STIRLING, J., referred to Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., pp. 433, 647.] If the clause in question were held to be valid, the continuing partner would be able to keep the creditors of the bankrupts out of their property for a number of years.

Buckley, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the defendant, did not object to the appointment of a receiver, and accepted the principle as laid down by James, L.J., in Ex parte Jay, In re Harrison, 28 W. R. 449, 14 Ch. D. 19; but that was not the present case. Wilson v. Greenwood was the nearest to the present one, and was not an authority, because the point was not necessary for decision. If there was a bonâ fide contract, and the bankruptcy of any partner resulted, the trustee in bankruptcy was bound to regard the rest as debtors, and must take his debt by instalments with interest. It was not taking away the bankrupt's property, but selling it on particular terms: Lindley on Partnership, p. 670. In the event of the bankruptcy of a partner no right passed to the trustee in bankruptcy to continue in partnership with the solvent partners: Ex parte Stoveld, 1 Gl. & J. 303; Freeland v. Stansfeld, 2 W. R. 575, 2 Sm. & Giff. 479. No case was made out or suggested against the defendant personally, so as to say that he was not entitled to be appointed receiver.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—[STIRLING, J.—I am satisfied on the point of law that it is a proper case for a receiver; I only want to hear you as to the terms on which a receiver should be appointed.] I ask for the appointment of one of my clients as receiver, and the defendant may continue as manager.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—If the clause in question (22) is valid, the creditors of the bankrupts will be kept out of their share of the partnership property for about thirteen years, and will have no security for it except the bond or covenant of the defendant, who did not bring one shilling into the business. It appears to me that the case of Wilson v. Greenwood does apply to this case. In that case articles of partnership provided that on dissolution by death, notice, or misconduct of a partner the remaining partners should have the option of taking his share at a valuation, payable by yearly instalments in the course of seven years, and that on the bankruptcy or insolvency of a partner the partnership should be immediately void as to him. By a deed four years subsequent the partners declared (after a recital that such was their intention in the articles) that in the event of bankruptcy or insolvency the same arrangement should be practised as on dissolution by death, notice, or misconduct. One of the partners having become bankrupt a few months after the execution of the latter deed his assignees were not bound by it. Lord Eldon's opinion seems to have been that, even if the provision had been in the original deed, it would not have been good. He came to the conclusion that the deed was not made bonâ fide, but with a view of protecting the remaining partners in the event of bankruptcy.

How, in the present case, the clause got in the articles is not quite clear. Mr. George Barker and the defendant both say in their evidence that they knew nothing about it. The defendant says he thought it was a provision for the death of his father, so that he should not have to pay out his capital in that event. In the absence of any explanation I draw the inference of fact that the clause was inserted in contemplation of bankruptcy. In my opinion it has been sufficiently made out that there is a case to be tried, and having regard to the large interests of the plaintiffs, they must be protected. I must treat the case for the present purpose as if the clause had been struck out by the bankruptcy, and no express provision for winding up the affairs of the partnership had been made. In an ordinary case a solvent partner would be entitled to wind up the affairs of the partnership, and the usual course where disputes as to the management of the partnership affairs arise between the trustee of a bankrupt partner and the solvent partners, and there is no reason for distrusting the latter, is, as stated in Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 670, that the court will appoint one of them receiver of the partnership property, directing him to give security, to pass his accounts, and to furnish the trustee with proper accounts, and to allow him at all reasonable times to inspect the partnership books.

The defendant claims the benefit of his primâ facie right to be appointed receiver, in accordance with the practice of the court. The plaintiffs do not object to his being manager, but wish that someone should be appointed receiver jointly with him, and that is the question which I have to determine. I feel strongly that the plaintiffs' risk is so great that they ought to be protected; but the defendant is a partner, and a solvent one, in the sense that he has not been adjudicated bankrupt, though it may be doubtful whether his pecuniary resources are great; and no reason has been shown why he should not be appointed receiver and manager, in accordance with the practice of the court. He must give security and pass his accounts; he must furnish the plaintiffs with proper accounts, and allow them all reasonable access to the books; and, further, when the balances in his hands reach a certain amount, to be agreed upon by the parties, he must pay the amount into court or to a joint account at a bank of the plaintiffs and himself. His remuneration must be settled by the chief clerk at chambers. I do not think it desirable to appoint the defendant manager and someone else receiver, as that course sometimes leads to difficulties.

Solicitors for the motion, A. J. Benjamin.

Solicitors for the defendant, Whittington, Son, & Barker.

Chan. Div. } Romer, J. } Nov. 18.

In re GURNEY.
MASON v. MERCER. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59)—Conversion—Statute of Limitations.

M. was trustee under a will of certain funds which he was empowered to invest in real securities in England or Wales. He and his co-trustee, in March, 1878, advanced £10,000, part of the funds, upon mortgage of hop and fruit gardens in Kent, and the money was paid to the credit of the account of the mortgagor, which was overdrawn to more than that amount, at a bank in which M. was a partner. The investment turned out valueless, and this action was brought on the 20*th of August*, 1890, by a beneficiary under the will, alleging that M. had been guilty of fraudulent breach of trust.

Held, that section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, applied and barred the action, which could not be treated as an action to recover the proceeds of trust property "received by the trustee and converted to his use" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 8 of the Act, and so be excepted from the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Trial of action.

John Gurney by his will, dated May 27, 1864, appointed the defendants, Henry Mason and Richard Mercer, executors, and gave them all his residuary personal estate upon trust for sale and conversion, and directed them to invest the clear surplus thereof (after payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies) in the parliamentary stocks and public funds of Great Britain or on Government or real securities in England or Wales. The testator also directed the sale of his residuary real estate, and that out of the proceeds of sale of the residue of his real and personal estate two sums of £3,750 should be set apart, and that two-elevenths of his ultimate residue should be held in trust to pay the income to Mary Ann Mason and Ellen Roberts for their respective lives.

The testator died on the 4th of December, 1865, and the executors, having proved the will, appropriated certain investments comprising New £3 per Cent. Annuities Victorian Government Bonds and Great India Peninsular Railway Stock as representing the two sums of £3,750 and the two-elevenths ultimate residue. In 1878 the executors sold the bonds and railway stock and part of the annuities, and invested the proceeds, amounting to £10,000, on mortgage of certain freehold lands and buildings, including farm buildings, and hop and fruit gardens in Kent belonging to one E. J. Goodwin. No independent valuer was employed by the trustees, but a valuation was made, as it was alleged, on behalf of the mortgagor, who valued the property at £12,750. The mortgage deed was dated the 7th of March, 1878. The defendant Mercer was, at the date of the advance, a partner in a firm known as the Kentish Bank, and Goodwin, the mortgagor, was a customer of the bank, and indebted to them in a sum exceeding £14,000 secured by an equitable charge by deposit of deeds relating to the property mortgaged to the defendants, and the sum of £10,000 so advanced by them was credited to Goodwin in his banking account, and to that extent reduced his debit balance to the bank.

This action was brought on the 20th of August, 1890, by Mary Ann Mason against the executors and trustees claiming a declaration that the investment of the £10,000 on this mortgage was an improper investment and a breach of trust, and that such breach of trust was fraudulent on the defendant Mercer's part, and claiming a declaration also that the defendants were liable to make good to the trust estate the loss occasioned thereby, on the footing of the defendant Mercer being primarily liable. The defendants by their statements of defence claimed the benefit of the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1888, and of all such statutory enactments for the limitations of actions and suits as might be applicable to the case. The defendant Mason died before the case came on for hearing, and the action was revived against his legal personal representative.

Chadwyck-Healey, Q.C., and Lemon, for the plaintiff.—The mortgage of the £10,000 was on property of a speculative character, and the money actually went into the pocket of the defendant Mercer, as a partner in the Kentish Bank, in payment of E. J. Goodwin's overdrawn account, and section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, is not applicable, and the remedy is not now barred, for this property was received by the trustee and converted to his use. [ROMER, J.—If the money had been handed to the mortgagor and then paid to the bank the plaintiff would have been out of court.] Mercer had the deeds of the property, he wanted to reduce the account and he shut his eyes to the fact that he was advancing money in contravention of his duty, and it is money for which he cannot show a discharge—all he shows is a mortgage of less value. There is, of course, no fraud in the popular sense, but there was practically a conversion within the section: for Mercer's bank actually received the trust money, and thus the case is saved from the operation of the Statutes of Limitation. The transaction resolves itself into this: trust property in trustee's hands, he then sells, invests in an improper security and has never discharged himself, the money never got home.

Neville, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendant Mercer.—The contention on the other side is baseless, as the words "converted to his use" must mean money which the trustee could be called on to refund; if the beneficiaries in this case have a mortgage for £10,000, and a right against the trustee of having the whole sum repaid to them, this would be absurd.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the defendant Mason's legal personal representatives.—Mason never received any part of the trust money, and is clearly protected by the section in question.

The section, so far as material, is as follows:—8. (1) "In any action or other proceeding against a trustee or any person claiming through him, except where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy, or is to recover trust property or the proceeds thereof still retained by the trustee or previously received by the trustee, and converted to his use, the following provisions shall apply:—(a) All rights and privileges conferred by any statute of limitations shall be enjoyed in the like manner and to the like extent as they would have been enjoyed in such action or other proceeding if the trustee or person claiming through him had not been a trustee or person claiming through him. (b) If the action or other proceeding is brought to recover money or other property, and is one to which no existing statutes of limitations apply, the trustee or person claiming through him shall be entitled to the benefit of, and be entitled to plead the lapse of, time as a bar to such action or other proceeding in the like manner and to the like extent as if the claim had been against him in an action of debt for money had and received, but so, nevertheless, that the statute shall run against a married woman entitled in possession for her separate use, whether with or without a restraint upon anticipation, but shall not begin to run against any beneficiary unless and until the interest of such beneficiary shall be an interest in possession."

ROMER, J.—The short question I have to decide is this. The trustees having trust money in their possession invest it on mortgage. It appears that the mortgagor had previously mortgaged that property to a bank, or, at any rate, that the bank had a charge upon the property for a debt due by the mortgagor to them. One of the trustees is a partner in that bank. The money advanced on mortgage by the trustees is by the direction of the mortgagor paid to the bank in discharge of the balance due by the mortgagor to the bank. The case made by the beneficiary against the trustees is that an insufficient security was taken for the trust money. The security taken was within the authority of the trustees. The only complaint is that the property was not of sufficiently high value. It is admitted that the trustee, who was also a partner in the bank, in this matter was not guilty of fraud or fraudulent conduct. The only act complained of is that of negligence on the part of the trustees in not seeing that the security was ample. Under those circumstances, the transaction having taken place in 1878, to this claim by the beneficiary, section 8 of the Trustee Act of 1888 is pleaded, and I have to determine whether that section applies.

Now it applies to every action or other proceeding against a trustee or any person claiming through him except in certain specified exceptions. The section, therefore, does apply to this section, unless the plaintiff shows that her claim is one of the excepted claims. I turn to the exceptions to see whether this particular claim by the plaintiff is or is not excepted. It appears to me it is not excepted. It is not a claim founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust. It is not to recover trust property or the proceeds of trust property still retained by the trustee, nor is it in my judgment to recover trust property or the proceeds of property previously received by the trustee and converted to his use. In my judgment it would be a perversion of the language used in that section if I were to hold that such a transaction as this, being an honest transaction, was to be treated as a conversion by the trustee, who happened to be a partner in the bank, of the money lent on mortgage to his own use. In my judgment it is not a conversion to his use. The argument of the plaintiff in this case would amount to this, that if trustees advance money on a transfer of a mortgage, and it happened that one of the transferors was also one of the trustees, the transaction being a simple transfer of mortgage, in that case you ought to treat the trustee who happened to be one of the transferors as having received the trust money and converted it to his own use. In my judgment that is not what is meant by this section. I think, within the meaning of this section, it is not possible to say that such a transaction as I have to deal with in this case was a case of conversion by a trustee to his own use. I, therefore, hold that the section applies; and it follows that in the defendant Mason's case also the action must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Campbell, Reeves, & Hooper.

Solicitors for the defendant Mercer, Hollams, Son, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitor for the defendant Mason, H. W. Davie.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) — Feb. 9.

SUMMERS v. HOLBORN DISTRICT BOARD OF WORKS. (a.)

Metropolis—Street traffic—Exposure of goods for sale in street—Costermongers—Inconsistent enactments—Implied repeal—57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., s. 65—Metropolitan Streets Acts, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 134), s. 6, and 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 5), s. 1—Metropolis Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 74.

The provisions contained in the Metropolitan Streets Acts, 1867 (section 6) and 1868 (section 1), as to the deposit of goods in streets and for the regulation of the business of costermongers and itinerant traders, are inconsistent with the powers given to metropolitan local authorities by section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix. (Michael Angelo Taylor's Act) to order the removal of goods, barrows, &c., from carriageways and footways; that section is therefore impliedly repealed so far as it affects costermongers, and a conviction of a costermonger for an offence under it cannot be sustained.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The facts were shortly as follows:—The appellant was one of a number of costermongers who had for many years carried on their business in a street within the district of the respondents. He was required by the respondents' officers to remove his barrow and goods from the street, and upon his refusal to do so he was summoned before the magistrate under section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxxix., and convicted. The magistrate imposed a nominal fine, and stated this case for the opinion of the court. The question to be decided was whether the section under which the appellant was convicted was still in force, or whether it had been impliedly repealed by later legislation dealing with the same subject. The following are the enactments referred to in the arguments and judgments.

57 Geo. 3, c. xxix. (commonly known as Michael Angelo Taylor's Act), s. 65, which provides (inter alia) that if any person shall place, or cause to be placed, in or upon any of the carriage or footways, in any streets or public places, in any district within the jurisdiction of the Act, any stall, board, wares, merchandize, or goods of any kind, or any coach, wheelbarrow, handbarrow, &c., (except licensed hackney coaches and except for the necessary time of loading or unloading, taking up or setting down fares, &c.) and shall not immediately remove all or any of such matters or things being thereunto required by any person appointed by the commissioners, trustees or other persons having control of the pavements in the district, then the person offending and the owner of such matters or things, and the employer of the person so offending, may be summoned before justices and convicted in a penalty; and power is given to the persons appointed by the commissioners, &c., without any warrant or other authority than the Act to seize any such stall, board, goods, barrows, &c., and deal therewith in the manner specified in the section.

The Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, which deals with substantially the same district as that dealt with by Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and provides, section 6, "No goods or other articles shall be allowed to rest on any footway or other part of a street within the general limits of this Act, or be otherwise allowed to cause obstruction or inconvenience to the passage of the public, for a longer time than may be absolutely necessary for loading or unloading such goods or other articles. Any person doing any act in contravention of this section shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.

"For the purposes of this Act, the surface of any space over which the public have the right of way that intervenes in any street within the general limits of this Act between the footway and the carriageway shall, notwithstanding any claim of any person by prescription or otherwise to the deposit or exposure for sale of any goods or other articles on such surface, be deemed to be part of the footway."

Section 27: "All powers conferred by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers conferred by any other Act of Parliament, and any such other powers may be exercised as if this Act had not passed."

Section 28: "This Act, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, shall be construed as one with the Acts relating to the Metropolitan police and to the City police."

The Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, Amendment Act, 1868, which provides—

Section 1: "The sixth section of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, prohibiting the deposit of goods in the streets, shall not apply to costermongers, street hawkers, or itinerant traders, so long as they carry on their business in accordance with the regulations from time to time made by the commissioner of police, with the approval of the Secretary of State; and so much of the said sixth section as refers to the surface of any space that intervenes in any street between the footway and the carriageway is hereby repealed."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Metropolis Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 74: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any person from being indicted for any indictable offence made punishable on summary conviction by this Act, or to prevent any person from being liable under any other Act or Acts to any other or higher penalty or punishment than is provided for such offence by this Act, so nevertheless that no person be punished twice for the same offence."

Frederick Low, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. The provisions of section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act are inconsistent with later legislation and are no longer in force. When that Act was passed (1817) the Metropolitan police were not in existence, and the duty of regulating street traffic was cast upon the local boards. Afterwards that duty was given to the police, and the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, s. 6, gives ample powers to deal with obstructions to traffic by itinerant vendors. It cannot have been intended that these powers should exist side by side with the powers given to the local authorities by Michael Angelo Taylor's Act; that Act, therefore, so far as it deals with the same subject matter as the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, must be taken to have been repealed. This is made clearer still by the Act of the following year (Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, Amendment Act, 1868) section 1 of which relieves costermongers, &c., from the penalties of section 6 of the Act of 1867, provided that they comply with the police regulations. If the penalties imposed by Michael Angelo Taylor's Act for the same offences had still been in force, relief would have been given against them also by section 1 of the Act of 1868. That section was meant to prevent interference with the trade of costermongers so long as they conform to the police regulations. The police regulations exist (see Archibald, Police Guide, p. 86) and have been conformed to by the appellant. In Fortescue v. The Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, [1891] 2 Q. B. 170, 39 W. R. Dig. 125, the Court of Appeal, overruling The Vestry of St. Mary, Islington v. Goodman, 23 Q. B. D. 154, held that section 72 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act which deals with the removal of projections from the fronts of houses had been impliedly repealed by section 119 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, which deals with the same subject matter. Brackley v. The Vestry of St. Mary, Battersea, 38 W. R. 28, 23 Q. B. D. 486, a decision on section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, is no authority against my contention, as the later legislation upon the subject was not brought to the notice of the court.

Peile (Courthorpe Munroe with him), for the respondents.—The conviction was right. There is no inconsistency between section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act and the later Acts which have been referred to. There is no reason why the police and the vestry or other local authority should not have concurrent powers for the regulation of street traffic and the removal of obstructions. Moreover, powers existing under other Acts are expressly saved by section 27 of the Act of 1867, and there is a similar saving of offences and penalties under other Acts contained in section 74 of the Metropolis Police Act, 1839, an Act with which the Act of 1867 (see section 28) is to be construed as one. That section shows that the Legislature contemplated the possibility (in the absence of enactment to the contrary) of a person being punished under the Police Acts and also under some previous Act for the same offence. Brackley v. The Vestry of St. Mary, Battersea, is an express decision that the power of seizure contained in section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act can still be put in force.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the magistrate was wrong, and that the appellant ought not to have been convicted under this section. The question is whether the provisions of the Metropolitan Streets Acts, 1867 and 1868, are or are not substantially inconsistent with the provisions of section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. I am of opinion that they are substantially inconsistent with, and that therefore, according to well-established rules, they amount to a repeal of, the earlier enactment. Section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act provided very stringent regulations respecting the trade of costermongers and others within limits which are nearly coextensive with the district to which the Metropolitan Police Acts apply. At the date of that Act the Metropolitan police did not exist, and the authority having control over the pavements in the district was the body entrusted with the exercise of these powers which are of a very strong character. Barrows and goods may be seized, and summary proceedings may be taken, both against the costermongers and against other persons. We are not concerned to say whether the liability of other persons to these proceedings remains; we are dealing only with the liability of the costermongers. Then, many years after the beginning of the present reign, the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, was passed, with the provisions contained in section 6 for the restraint, if not for the total abolition of the business of costermongers. Under that section proceedings may be taken against some of the same persons as may be proceeded against under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and it might be a question whether the two enactments could co-exist; but section 6 of the Act of 1867, was itself altered by the Act of the following year. [His lordship read section 1 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, Amendment Act, 1868.] These sections seem to me to be plain, and if they stood alone I think there could be no question that they impliedly repeal these provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act; they deal with the same subject-matter, and create a different offence and a different procedure with respect to it, and therefore upon the clearest principles they must be held to have repealed the earlier enactment. If they did not, nothing could be more unfair or entrapping than this later section; it directs the costermongers to carry on their business in accordance with the requirements of the police. It is not suggested that these costermongers have not done so, but it is said that, in spite of their having done so, the local authority may interfere and confiscate their goods. Therefore, if these two sections stood alone, I should say that the matter was too plain for argument. But it is said that they do not stand alone, but that in the Act of 1867 there is a section which keeps alive the provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. [His lordship read section 27 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867.] To that contention I think there are two answers. The first is that the word "powers" in that section must mean powers conferred by another Act upon the same persons as had powers conferred upon them by that Act—that is, the police; and if that be not a sufficient answer, then I say, secondly, that section 6 of the Act of 1867, as qualified by the Act of the following year, is a distinct provision that a costermonger may carry on his business according to certain regulations, and I cannot persuade myself that that express enactment is not to prevail against the general enactment contained in section 27. Again, it was argued that section 74 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, preserves these provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. That is an Act which deals with the police and their powers and duties from beginning to end. [His lordship read section 74.] My answer to that argument must be the same as my answer with respect to section 27 of the Act of 1867. The section must in reasonable fairness be taken to refer to penalties for offences in which the police are the prosecutors; and if that view is not correct, then I think that the governing statute is the latest one, and that so far as any provisions of earlier Acts are inconsistent with the clear provisions contained in the later Acts they must be taken to be impliedly repealed. Therefore I think that the conviction was wrong, and must be quashed.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The general rule is that, if there are two Acts of Parliament which contain inconsistent enactments, the former enactment is impliedly repealed by the later one. The repeal is of course implied and not express from the necessity of the case. We have to see, therefore, whether these later enactments are inconsistent with Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. It is not, so far as I am aware, expressly referred to in them.

The appellant in this case has committed an offence against section 65 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and proceedings have been taken against him under that section. What he has done would also be an offence under section 6 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867. Now these two enactments, so far as they apply to the same offence, provide different punishments and different procedure: they therefore could not, according to general rules, stand together: see Fortescue v. Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green. But we must look at the whole of the legislation, and see whether the earlier enactment was intended to stand together with the later. Section 74 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, is intended to be read into the Act of 1867, and I think that that shows the intention of the Legislature to have been that these provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act should stand side by side with the Act of 1867.

I do not feel pressed in the same way by section 27 of the Act of 1867, because I am clearly of opinion that the word "power" in that section does not apply to the duty cast upon the authorities who are intrusted with the care of streets to take proceedings against offenders against the provisions upon that subject. Instances occur in the Act of powers exercisable by the police to which section 27 can refer; there are powers for the regulation of stage carriages and advertisements and other matters, and I think that these are the powers intended to be referred to in the section, and not powers to proceed against offenders. If I wanted any corroboration of that view I find it in section 74 of the Act of 1839, and I think that it is not necessary to construe section 27 out of its proper meaning, because section 74 of the earlier Act was in existence and provided for the saving of penalties and proceedings under other Acts.

If the legislation stood there I could not have got over the provisions of section 74 of the Act of 1839; but then there is section 1 of the Act of 1868. Now if the Legislature had intended that costermongers who complied with the regulations issued by the police should not be liable to the comparatively mild penalties of the Act of 1867, but should still be liable to the severer penalties of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, we should have been obliged to give effect to that extraordinary provision. But the Act does not say that. [His lordship read section 1 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, Amendment Act, 1868.] I think that that provision is so inconsistent with the provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act that it is impossible that they should stand together. It would be monstrous, to my mind, that they should, and I cannot bring myself to think that the Legislature gave the costermongers this boon with one hand and took it away with the other. It would be most misleading to them that the Legislature should, by the enactment contained in section 1 of the Act of 1868, tempt them to invest their money in barrows and goods in order to avail themselves of the permission given to them by that section to carry on their business in accordance with the police regulations if they are at any moment liable to have their property swept away by the local authority. This result would be so monstrous that I have no hesitation in saying that the later legislation is inconsistent with Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and that this conviction under that Act was wrong.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Arthur Newton.

Solicitor for the respondents, Matthew H. Hale.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Collins, JJ.) Feb. 8, 10.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY v. PIPER & CO. (a.)

Pharmacy Acts—Sale of poison—Compound or medicine containing "poison"—"Patent medicine"—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), ss. 1, 2, 15, 16.

By the Pharmacy Act, 1868, section 2, certain articles specified in Part 2 of Schedule A to the Act, which include opium and all preparations of opium and chloroform, are deemed to be poisons within the meaning of the Act; and by sections 1 and 15 it is made unlawful for persons to keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons unless they are chemists or druggists, and duly registered under the Act, under a penalty of £5 for each offence. By section 16 nothing in the Act is to interfere with the dealing in "patent medicine."

The appellants, who were not qualified persons within the meaning of the Act, sold over the counter a half-ounce bottle of chlorodyne, a proprietary medicine, which contained, amongst other ingredients, one grain of morphine, the active principle of opium, the evidence being that less than that quantity had been known to be fatal to an adult, but that, if taken according to the directions, the dose would not be so to an adult, but might be to an infant.

In an action against the appellants to recover a penalty under section 15 for a breach of the provisions of the Act,

Held, that, inasmuch as the article sold by them contained one of the scheduled poisons, it was a poison within the meaning of the Act, and it was immaterial that it did not consist, or was not compounded, of the scheduled poisons alone.

Held, also, that it was not a "patent" medicine within the exemption in section 16, which applied exclusively to medicines protected by the letters patent, and, therefore, that the appellants were liable to the penalty.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Francis Bacon at the Bloomsbury County Court.

The plaintiff sued the defendants, who were grocers carrying on business in Warwick-street, Pimlico, as follows:—"To penalty incurred on the 16th of October, 1892, in keeping open shop for retailing chlorodyne which contained poisons, to wit, opium, or a preparation of opium and chloroform, or one of the said poisons, contrary to the provisions of the Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121)," and the amount of the penalty claimed was £5.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following are the material provisions of the Pharmacy Act:—

By section 1 it is enacted that it shall be "unlawful for any person to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons," &c., "unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act," and conform to the regulations as provided by the Act.

By section 2 it is provided that the several articles named or described in Schedule A should be deemed to be poisons within the meaning of the Act.

Schedule A is divided into two parts, and in Part II. are included "opium, and all preparations of opium or of poppies" and "chloroform."

Section 15 provides, inter alia, that "any person who shall sell or keep an open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons," &c., "not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist," &c., shall for every such offence be liable to pay a penalty or sum of five pounds, and the same may be sued for, recovered, and dealt with in the manner provided by the Pharmacy Act for the recovery of penalties under that Act," &c.

Section 16 enacts, inter alia, that "nothing hereinbefore contained shall extend to or interfere with . . . the making or dealing in patent medicines, nor with the business of wholesale dealers supplying poisons in the ordinary course of wholesale dealing," &c.

Section 17 contains regulations to be observed on the sale of poisons, and provides that it shall be unlawful to sell any poison, by wholesale or retail, unless the box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover in which such poison is contained be distinctly labelled with the name of the article and the word poison and with the name and address of the seller of the poison; "and it shall be unlawful to sell any poison of those which are in the first part of the Schedule A to this Act, or may hereafter be added thereto under section 2 of this Act, to any person unknown to the seller, unless introduced by some person known to the seller; and on every sale of any such article the seller shall, before delivery, make or cause to be made an entry in a book to be kept for that purpose stating, in the form set forth in Schedule F to this Act, the date of the sale, the name and address of the purchaser, the name and quantity of the article sold and the purpose for which it is stated by the purchaser to be required, to which entry the signature of the purchaser and of the person (if any) who introduced him shall be affixed." The section provides for a penalty for breach of the section, but further provides that "the provisions of this section, which are solely applicable to poisons in the first part of the Schedule A to this Act, or which require that the label shall contain the name and address of the seller," shall not apply to certain articles or sales as therein mentioned, "provided such medicines be labelled in the manner aforesaid, with the name and address of the seller, and the ingredients thereof be entered," &c.

It was proved in evidence at the trial that the defendants had sold a bottle of Dr. Collis Browne's preparation of chlorodyne, a proprietary medicine, over the counter on the date above mentioned. It was proved to contain ½ fluid oz. of chlorodyne, which gave, upon analysis, one grain of morphine, the active principle of opium, but the dose to be taken by an adult person in accordance with the directions would contain only from one-fortieth to three-fortieths of a grain. It was stated in evidence by medical experts that one-hundredth part of a grain of morphine had been known to be fatal to an infant, and eight-tenths of one grain to an adult. The chlorodyne was also found to contain a small amount of prussic acid, with treacle, peppermint and capsicum, with other unascertained ingredients. The medical evidence was further to the effect that no chemical in the mixture would correct the effect of the poison. The bottle in question was stated to have been labelled "poison." Evidence was also given on behalf of the defendants by a number of witnesses, to the effect that stamp or proprietary medicines had for a number of years been sold as "patent" medicines, that in fourteen years preceding the Act of 1868 only fifty medicines had been patented, and of these only thirty were complete patents, of which only four contained poison, and further that none of them had any sale. On the other hand, there were upwards of 1,000 stamp or proprietary medicines, sold by some 30,000 licensed persons, of whom 10,000 only were chemists.

The learned county court judge held that the article sold by the defendants was a poison, and that it was not a patent medicine within the exemption in section 16, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the penalty. The defendants appealed.

H. D. Bonsey, for the appellant.—The county court judge was wrong upon both the grounds of his decision. First, the article in question is not a poison within the meaning of the Act. It is a useful medicine which has had a large sale for forty years, and although the Pharmacy Act was passed in 1868 the plaintiffs have never before attacked the sale of these medicines by unqualified persons. The object of that Act was to prevent the sale of poisons unmixed or in such mixture as to be simply an evasion of the Act. But if it had been intended to include all mixtures containing some poison, the language of the Act, instead of simply naming the articles, would naturally have been framed to forbid the sale of articles, "one of the ingredients of which is" one of the poisons named. If the decision of the county court is right an immense number of articles now commonly sold by tradesmen will become the monopoly of chemists: such, for instance, as contain a slight proportion of arsenic or cantharides. Could it be said, moreover, that a combination of two poisons producing an innocent entirety would be a poison? The contention of the appellants, therefore, is that an article, to be a "poison" within the meaning of the Act, must be substantially the same poison as one of those named in the schedule. Secondly, the article sold by the defendant is a patent medicine within the exemption in section 16. The earlier Acts dealing with the subject, from 1783 to 1812, spoke of patent medicines as then sold under the authority of letters patent royal or the Great Seal. They also spoke of "nostrums or proprietary medicines." But the evidence shows that by degrees the number of those sold under letters patent almost disappeared and were supplanted almost entirely by the proprietary medicines, which increased to such an extent that by the time the Pharmacy Act was passed the term "patent" had acquired a wider significance and popular meaning, and was universally understood to include proprietary or stamp medicines. For this reason it was not considered necessary to expressly name the latter in the section exempting "patent medicines." Further, the disproportion in point of number being so great, the Act would, if there had been an intention to limit the term, have exempted only medicines "sold under letters patent." Again, there was no reason for confining the sale of proprietary medicines to chemists; as a protection it would be wholly illusory. Chemists would know no more about the composition of such articles than other persons, or whether they contained poison, and would be unable to comply with the requirements of section 17 as to the entry of the necessary particulars in a book of the "article" sold, which in that case means "poison," or take the other precautions prescribed by that section.

Poland, Q.C., and T. R. Grey, for the respondents.—The decision below was right on both points. On the first point, the restriction in section 16 confining the sale of medicines containing poisons by unqualified persons to "patent" medicines clearly shows that it was intended to restrain the sale of all other such medicines. But according to the argument on the other side this proviso would be unnecessary. Further, when the Legislature intends to exempt proprietary medicines from the operation of an Act it does so in express terms, as in the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63). It is not contended that one drop of poison in 1,000 gallons of water would be a poison. [LAWRANCE, J., referred to Berry v. Henderson, L. R. 5 Q. B. 296, 18 W. R. Dig. 74.]

Bonsey, in reply.—With reference to the last part of the argument on the other side the evidence here does not show that the article was a "poison," but only that it was a compound of poison.

LAWRANCE, J.—Speaking for myself, I have entertained considerable doubt during the course of the argument; but those doubts are now removed, and I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

On the first question, which is whether a person who is not a chemist can sell medicines containing poison, I have come to the conclusion that he cannot. It is important to notice that in the preamble to the statute in question it is declared that it is "expedient for the safety of the public that persons keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, and compounding of poisons, and persons known as chemists and druggists, should possess a competent practical knowledge of their business"; and the sections of the statute proceed to make provisions to that end, and the provisions of the 15th section have been called to our attention as being most material in this case. [The learned judge read the section, and continued:—]

The question here is whether the appellant was such a person retailing a poison, not being a chemist, and therefore liable to the penalties sued for and recovered in the county court. That depends upon whether the chlorodyne, which forms the basis of the action, is a poison, and, if so, whether it is or is not within the exemption in section 16 applicable to patent medicines; for it is argued by the appellant that, whether it is or is not a poison, he is nevertheless entitled to sell it as being a "patent medicine" within section 16. Now, as to that contention it is material to note that in the schedule to the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150 there are several hundred patent medicines, and the Act apparently contemplated three different sets of persons as being entitled to sell them: First, there were those claiming the right to make secret prescriptions; secondly, those who sold medicines protected by letters patent; and, thirdly, those who sold proprietary medicines. Those three are entirely distinct, but Mr. Bonsey says that the term "patent medicines" includes all these different things. I was at first much impressed with the force of his argument, but on looking at the Act of 1868 I think there is a distinction clearly taken between them, and that the term "patent medicine" is applicable only to such as are protected by letters patent or under the Great Seal, and, therefore, that all not so protected are not within the exemption in section 16.

Now with respect to the question as to whether this chlorodyne sold by the appellant is a poison, we are referred to the provisions of section 17 and to the regulations therein contained for the sale of poisons.

Mr. Bonsey says that "article" there means "poison," and that it applies simply to poisons mentioned in the schedule, and not to such as merely contain them as ingredients. I was impressed with the way in which he put this contention also, but on the whole I am of opinion that the application of the Act is not so restricted. I think that it is conclusive that if an article contains poison it must be labelled "poison," and the regulations applying to the sale of poisons must be complied with. That may, I think, be done, as regards the form given in Schedule F, by filling in the number of bottles sold.

It might seem absurd, no doubt, that an article containing an infinitesimal quantity of poison should be obliged to be labelled "poison," but, at any rate, no harm would be done, and the public would be protected against mischiefs arising from the ignorance or incompetence of unskilled compounders.

With regard to patent medicines, the public and those selling them have this protection, that they can always refer to the specifications and ascertain the ingredients. The conclusion, therefore, which I have come to upon the whole case is that if an article which is not a medicine protected by letters patent contains poison it cannot be sold by an unqualified person without rendering him liable to the penalties provided by the Act, and I am of opinion, therefore, that the learned county court judge was right in his judgment, which must be affirmed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary for me to go through the sections of the Act, but there are two points for our consideration. The first, whether this preparation of chlorodyne is a "poison" within the Act, and secondly, if so, is it within the exemption in section 16? We have been greatly assisted by the able argument of Mr. Bonsey, and I am not at all sure that I am right in the conclusions at which I have arrived. Now I think the article in question does come within the designation "poison." It is found to contain more than one poison—viz., opium and chloroform, both of which are contained in Schedule 2. It is also found that there was in the bottle sufficient to kill an adult person if the whole quantity were taken at once. Therefore I think we may take it that it was in fact a poison. Whether I am right or not, I am also of opinion that it was a compound into which poison enters, and that it therefore comes within the Act. But while I am of that opinion in regard to this specific thing, I do not think it necessary to lay down any general rule as to such as contain infinitesimal quantities; that case can be dealt with when it arises.

Now is this a "poison" within the meaning of the Act? The schedule includes in Part 2 both opium with its compounds and chloroform absolutely. It is said that the Act does not apply to articles into which these enter, but which are incapable of being described as "poison" or as preparations of "poison. I do not think that is correct. I think it applies to something more, or in other words that there may be a "poison" within it, which does not consist exclusively of poison or of a preparation of poison. I think section 17 shows us what was intended, because after mentioning special preparations by chemists, it goes on to say in the proviso that the provisions shall not apply to "any medicine supplied by a legally qualified apothecary to his patient, nor apply to any article when forming part of the ingredients of any medicine dispensed by a person registered under this Act." Now that provision seems to me to show that but for the exemption, a medicine containing one of the poisons named would come within the Act, and which did not intend to exclude all other ingredients but poison in the article sold. My brother Lawrance referred to a case of Berry v. Henderson, which I think is in point. The thing sold in that case was prussic acid, and the court came to the conclusion that the fact that the article contained only two things, prussic acid and water, did not prevent prussic acid from being an "ingredient," and further that, having regard to its uses, it was within the exception, and it was necessary then to find first, whether it was properly described as a "poison" before the court could decide whether it was within the exemption. Now it seems to me that from the judgment of Lush, J., that he held that the Act did hit a compound; and, therefore, that the case is a distinct authority. When you have arrived at that, the question of more or less seems to me not to apply until you have a state of things to which would be applied the maxim de minimis non curat lex. Before I pass to the next point I wish to refer to one formidable argument advanced by Mr. Bonsey. He says, quite properly, that the word "article" in the latter part of section 17 applies to poison only, and to poison in the schedule. Then he says if he is wrong in his main argument it is impossible to apply that provision, because it would be impossible for the seller to put down the quantity of the "article" sold by a chemist, and to conform to the regulations in section 17. But I feel no difficulty in saying that a chemist may satisfy the section by putting down the number of bottles sold.

Then I come to the second point, is this a patent medicine within the exemption in section 16? Mr. Bonsey contends that on the evidence here all medicine which are dealt with as stamp medicines or as proprietary medicines are understood to be patent medicines and within the exemption, and broadly that was what the term in the section intended. Now, having regard to the object of this Act and of the Act of George III., we ought not to put upon the term "patent" in this Act an interpretation which would extend it beyond what is covered by "letters patent." What is the Act? It deals with the sale of poisons and amends the Pharmacy Act of 1862. Broadly, therefore, it deals with poisonous drugs which might be called harmful. It says in the preamble that it is dealing with the safety of the public by regulating the dispensing of drugs, by providing that this shall only be done by qualified persons, but there is an exception in favour of patent medicines. Now I do not think that the case for sweeping all proprietary medicines into that exception is made out. Can anything be more dangerous, that a proprietary, but not patent, medicine, and which may be compounded of poison, may be sold to any extent by unskilled persons? The very mischief aimed at by the Act would thus be allowed free scope. In the case of medicines sold under letters patent, any one who wants to know the composition of the medicine is able to do so. But when we look at the definitions in the Stamp Act, 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, we see how that would be in the case of proprietary medicines. That Act deals not only with patent medicines, but gives very strong grounds for knowing what comes within the proper description of "proprietary" medicines. In the schedule to that Act which specifies the articles upon which stamp duties are imposed, the following things are included, viz., all medicines, &c., "made, prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale by any person or persons whatsoever, wherein the person making, preparing, uttering, vending, or exposing to sale the same hath or claims to have any occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same, or hath or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale under the authority of any letters patent under the Great Seal," or which are "held out or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof as nostrums or proprietary medicines, or as specifics," &c.

Practically, therefore, it seems to me that anyone with very slight claims to possess a secret prescription or preparation, and who chooses to send out a notice with it calling it a nostrum, may at once deal with and dispense as much poison as he likes, and if the appellant is right here, be exempted from the operation of the Pharmacy Act, leaving behind no trace whatever of the way in which it is sold. I do not think, therefore, that Mr. Bousey has either principle or wording in his favour. He says it will destroy the sale of proprietary medicines. Now I am not so much pressed with that, for if it is worth while for chemists to ascertain by analysis what are the ingredients of proprietary medicines, then it is not difficult for them to comply with section 17, thereby securing all the ends aimed at. At any rate, whatever inconvenience is involved is not so great as would be the danger to the public if the contention of the appellant were allowed to prevail. We think, however, having in view the importance of the case, that they should have leave to appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Neve & Beck.

Solicitors for the respondents, Flux, Sons, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — March 10.

MURRAY v. FREER. (a.)

Licensing law—Lapsed licence—Discretion of justices to refuse transfer—Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 14—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 8, 19—Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), s. 7.

At the general annual licensing meeting in August, 1891, the justices refused to renew the licence of the tenant of a beerhouse on account of his having been convicted for permitting drunkenness on the premises. The beerhouse had been continuously licensed for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises from a date prior to the 1st of May, 1869. In consequence of the refusal to renew, the licence expired on the 10th of October, 1891. On the 5th of October, 1891, the tenant gave up possession of the house to the respondent, who applied, on the 17th of November, 1891, to the justices in special sessions for a transfer of the licence.

Held (reversing the decision of Pollock, B., and Vaughan Williams, J.), that at the date of the application by the respondent the licence was not in force within the meaning of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, 1869, and that the justices' power of refusing the transfer was, therefore, not limited to the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of that Act.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Vaughan Williams, J.) on a case stated by quarter sessions.

The Pheasant Inn, No. 155, Chester-street, Manchester, was continuously licensed for the sale of beer to be consumed on and off the premises from a date prior to the 1st of May, 1869, until the 10th of October, 1891, when the certificate of justices granted in respect of the said house pursuant to sections 5 and 6 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, which had been in force from the 10th of October, 1890, expired. The said certificate and the excise licence were granted to one Faulkner, who was a tenant of the said house and had been previously licensed in respect thereof. On the 30th of December, 1890, Faulkner was convicted of permitting drunkenness in the house. At the general annual licensing sessions for the city of Manchester held on the 27th of August, 1891, objection was made to the renewal of the licence by the district superintendent of police. The justices adjourned the consideration of the case to the 10th of September, on which day Faulkner applied to the justices for a renewal of the licence. This application was refused.

Faulkner did not appeal from this refusal, but on the 5th of October, 1891, he gave up possession of the house to the respondent Freer. On the 9th of October, 1891, the respondent gave notice under section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828, of his intention to apply to the special sessions for a transfer of the licence, and on the 17th of November, 1891, he applied for the transfer. It was contended on his behalf that the justices could only refuse the transfer upon one of the four grounds set forth in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and it was admitted by the justices that if their discretion was so limited the respondent was entitled to the transfer. The justices, however, were of opinion that there was then no licence in force in respect of the house, inasmuch as it had expired on the 10th of October, 1891, and that, the renewal of the licence having been refused, and there having been no appeal against the renewal, the licence had not been granted by way of renewal from time to time so as to entitle the respondent to the benefit of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act, 1870, and that they were therefore not limited in dealing with the application to the said four grounds of refusal, but were at liberty to exercise their discretion and take into consideration the nature of the neighbourhood and its requirements and the history of the house.

The justices accordingly refused the application.

The respondent appealed to the quarter sessions, who granted the transfer of the licence, subject to a case for the opinion of the court. The case was argued before the Divisional Court on the 27th and 28th of April, 1892, and judgment was given on the 19th of January, 1893. The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the quarter sessions, and allowed the transfer of the licence to the respondent, being of opinion that at the date of the respondent's application for the transfer on the 17th of November, 1891, the licence was in force within the meaning of section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and that the justices' power of refusing the transfer was limited to the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of that Act.

The justices appealed.

Section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, is as follows:—Where, on the 1st of May, 1869, a licence under any of the said recited Acts is in force with regard to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises, may be refused in accordance with this Act.

By section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act, 1870, the 19th section of the principal Act shall extend to licences granted by way of renewal from time to time of licences in force on the 1st of May, 1869, whether such licences continue to be held by the same person or have been or may be transferred to any other person or persons.

By section 3 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 88 (repealed by the Licensing Act, 1872), it was declared that, if the licence which had been in existence on the 1st of May, 1869, or any certificate since granted in respect of the house, had, by forfeiture, lapse of time, or otherwise, ceased to be in force, then, in the case of an application for a certificate for such a house, the justices might refuse the application on any ground upon which they might refuse an application if made for a certificate with respect to a house with respect to which a licence was not in force on the 1st of May, 1869.

Sir C. Russell, A.G., and Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Avory with them), for the appellants.—The decision of the Divisional Court was wrong. This case does not come within section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. That section only applies where the licence is in force and has been granted by way of renewal from time to time. This licence expired on the 10th of October, and cannot be said to have been in force on the 17th of November, when the respondent made his application. The fallacy underlying the judgments of the Divisional Court is the attempt to draw a distinction between a licence which has been forfeited and one which has lapsed for want of renewal. No such distinction can be made: see section 3 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 88, which is declaratory of the meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1869.

They cited Hargreaves v. Dawson, 24 L. T. N. S. 428, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 11; Reg. v. Curzon, 21 W. R. 887, L. R. 8 Q. B. 400; Reg. v. Justices of the West Riding, 36 W. R. 855, 21 Q. B. D. 258.

Finlay, Q.C., Poland, Q.C., and J. M. Yates, for the respondent.—At the time the respondent applied for a transfer of this licence it was still "in force" within the meaning of section 19, the application having been made before the next ensuing general annual licensing meeting, and therefore the justices, in exercising their discretion, were limited to the four grounds of refusal set out in section 8. In Hargreaves v. Dawson the licence had lapsed for more than a year, and in Reg. v. Curzon for more than three years, before the application. The applicant in these cases was really asking for a new licence, not for a transfer.

Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, 19 W. R. 960, L. R. 6 Q. B. 781; Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham, 20 W. R. 702, L. R. 7 Q. B. 482; and Reg. v. Rowell, L. R. 7 Q. B. 490, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 3, were also referred to.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the court has to construe two sections of two different Acts of Parliament. The first is section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. That section applies to this case so far as to allow the respondent to be a proper applicant for the transfer of the licence. But section 14 does not do more than say who may be a proper applicant; it does not in any way deal with the application, and all that was decided in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, which was cited by Mr. Finlay in the course of the argument, was that a person in the position of this respondent was a proper person to apply under section 14. An application having been made to the justices the question then arises, how is it to be dealt with? Now in certain cases a very large discretion is given to the justices in dealing with these applications, but there is one section which limits their jurisdiction, and that section is section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, which is the second section we have to deal with in this case. If a case comes within section 19 of that Act the justices are limited in the exercise of their discretion to the four grounds of refusal mentioned in section 8 of the same Act. It is necessary therefore to ascertain what is the proper construction of section 19, and whether this case comes within it. [His lordship read the section.] The grammar of that section is not very accurate unless the words "is in force" are construed to mean "was in force, and is at the time of the application." And even if the section stood alone I should be inclined to construe it in that way, but there is section 7 of the Amendment Act, 1870, which reads it in the same way as I have done, and the meaning of the section was also considered in the cases of Hargreaves v. Dawson and Reg. v. Curzon, and we find that the words "is in force" are to be taken to mean "was in force on May 1, 1869, and has continued to be and is in force on the day when the application is made." If that is the true reading of the section, it is not disputed that this licence had ceased to exist at the date of the application by the respondent. In my opinion those two cases to which I have referred govern this case, and the court will not overrule them The case does not come within section 19, and therefore the discretion of the justices is not limited, and the appeal must be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question which we have to determine turns on the construction to be put upon the words, "Where on May 1, 1869, a licence is in force," in section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. As that Act came into force at a later date than May 1, 1869, the construction to be put upon the words is at first sight a little doubtful, but the explanatory Act of 1870, and also the case of Reg. v. Curzon, makes it clear that the words are to be construed to mean, where a licence was in force on May 1, 1869, has been kept alive since that date, and is in force at the time when the application is made. Having arrived at that conclusion there is an end to this case, for this licence was not in force at the date when the application was made. The cases which were referred to in support of the respondent's contention are a different class of case from the present, and relate to applications under section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. They do not apply to this case. The respondent had, no doubt, a locus standi under that section to make an application, but that section does not determine what discretion the justices are to exercise when adjudicating upon the application.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree, and have very little to add. This case does not come within section 19, because that section only applies when the licence is in force when the application is made. With regard to section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, that section only deals with the persons by whom applications for a renewal of a licence may be made, and does not affect the question of what discretion the justices may exercise when dealing with the application.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the respondent, Crowders & Vizard, for Hockin, Raby, & Beckton, Manchester.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) — Oct. 28; Dec. 3.

In re BINSTEAD.
Ex parte DALE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—"Final judgment"—Decree for dissolution of marriage—Order for payment of costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (e) (g).

A decree nisi in a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery contained an order that the co-respondent should pay the petitioner's costs. The decree was made absolute and the costs taxed, and an order was made that the co-respondent should pay the amount within a specified time. He did not comply with the order, upon which the petitioner issued a bankruptcy notice against him, with which he again did not comply. A bankruptcy petition was then presented against him.

Held (affirming an order dismissing the petition), that the order of the Divorce Court for payment of the costs was not a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that a bankruptcy notice could not, therefore, be issued in respect of it against the co-respondent; and that there was, therefore, no act of bankruptcy.

Appeal by a creditor, E. J. Dale, from the dismissal by Mr. Registrar Hope of a bankruptcy petition, dated the 29th of August, 1892, presented by the appellant against A. M. Binstead.

The creditor's claim was for the sum of £204 19s. 8d., the taxed costs in a divorce suit, under the following circumstances:—

The appellant Dale instituted a suit for divorce against his wife, in which Binstead was co-respondent. The trial on the 26th of April, 1888, resulted in a verdict for the petitioner, and a decree nisi was pronounced for the dissolution of the marriage, on the ground of the wife's adultery with Binstead, unless sufficient cause should be shown to the court why the decree should not be made absolute within six months from the making thereof.

The petitioner's costs incurred, and to be incurred, in the suit were ordered to be paid by the co-respondent Binstead, and the decree having been made absolute on the 13th of November, 1888, the costs were eventually taxed at £204 19s. 8d., and an order made on the 30th of June for payment of the amount by Binstead within a specified time.

The costs were not paid, and Dale issued a bankruptcy notice on the 26th of July, 1892, against Binstead, who did not comply with the notice within the time limited. His non-compliance was alleged by the creditor to be an act of bankruptcy, upon which the petition was presented. The registrar, however, held that the order to pay costs was not a "final judgment" in an action, and, consequently, that there had been no act of bankruptcy, and dismissed the petition.

Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), provides as follows:—

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases:—

"(e) If execution issued against him has been levied by seizure and sale of his goods under process in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court.

"(g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or to compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditors or the court, and he does not within seven days after the service of the notice in case the service is effected in England, and in case the service is effected elsewhere then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the court that he has a counter-claim, set-off, or cross demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which his judgment was obtained."

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for the appellant.—The registrar was mistaken in his view that there was not here a final judgment within the meaning of the section. In Ex parte Moore, 33 W. R. 438, 14 Q. B. D. 627, Lord Selborne says, at p. 632: "To constitute an order a final judgment nothing more is necessary than a proper litis contestatio and a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits." And the Master of the Rolls held in that case that there was a "final judgment" when everything which had to be done by the court itself was finished. This point is really concluded by that case. There was an order for the payment of costs and for the payment of the taxed amount, and nothing more remained to be done by the court: In re Riddell, Ex parte Earl of Strathmore, 36 W. R. 532, 20 Q. B. D. 512. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Salaman v. Warner, 39 W. R. 547, [1891] 1 Q. B. 734.] Further, it is not necessary that there should have been final judgment in an "action" in the strict sense. [KAY, L.J.—In the Judicature Act, 1873, by section 100 "action" is defined to be a "civil proceeding commenced by writ or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court."] That includes a proceeding in the Divorce Court, and by that section "judgment" includes "decree." [KAY, L.J., referred to In re Alexander, 40 W. R. 202, [1892] 1 Q. B. 216. LOPES, L.J., referred to In re Fawsitt, 34 W. R. 26, 30 Ch. D. 231.]

E. Clayton, for the respondent Binstead.—I rely on the definition by the Master of the Rolls in In re Riddell, Ex parte Earl of Strathmore, at p. 516, by which he says final judgment under sub-section 1 (g) means "a judgment obtained in an action by which the question whether there was a pre-existing right of the plaintiff against the defendant is finally determined." Here there was (1) no pre-existing right, and (2) the proceeding was not an action. It is a case of damage, not in satisfaction of some pre-existing right before proceedings either by contract or tort, but under a special statutory provision, and is not a "final judgment," but a "final order": Ex parte Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342. Moreover, section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, only makes a decree a judgment for the purposes of that Act. In section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the legislature differentiates between an action and a civil proceeding. The right to enforce an order by execution does not constitute it a "judgment"; garnishee proceedings are not actions for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act (Ex parte Chinery), but they would come within the definition in the Judicature Act. It was held in Ex parte Schmitz that an order for the payment of costs was not a final judgment within sub-section 1 (g). Section 4 is in the nature of a penal enactment, and must be construed strictly.

He referred also to Ex parte Whinney, 13 Q. B. D. 476, 32 W. R. Dig. 11; Ex parte Moore; In re Henderson, 36 W. R. 567, 20 Q. B. D. 509; In re Crump, 8 Morrell, 174.

Bankes, in reply.—The definition of "action" in the Judicature Act, 1873, is not the conclusive test, and in section 4, sub-section 1 (g), the term is used in a wider sense. There is nothing in Ex parte Chinery to show that it must be a judgment within the definition in the Judicature Act, 1873.

Cur. adv. vult.

December 3.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—By a decree nisi in a suit in the Divorce Division it was decreed that the marriage of Dale and his wife should be dissolved, on the ground of her adultery with Binstead, the co-respondent, unless cause should be shown within six months why that decree should not be made absolute. The co-respondent, Binstead, was also condemned to pay the costs of the petitioner in the suit. Those costs, when the decree was afterwards made absolute, were taxed at £204 19s. 8d. The petitioner served a bankruptcy notice on the correspondent, treating the order for payment of the costs as a final judgment within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The costs not being paid, the petitioner presented a bankruptcy petition against the co-respondent, alleging that the failure to comply with the bankruptcy notice was an act of bankruptcy. The registrar held that the order for payment of the costs was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the bankruptcy notice was therefore invalid, and that consequently no act of bankruptcy had been committed. He dismissed the bankruptcy petition, and we are asked to say that he was wrong.

The case depends upon the construction of the sub-section. Under it a man may be compelled to commit an act of bankruptcy in respect of which he may be made bankrupt, and he may thereby be forced to pay the particular debt, and all the other creditors will also be brought into the bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is therefore not merely an execution of a particular decree, but it has the great effect, as a general rule, of compelling all the bankrupt's creditors to accept payment of a part only instead of the whole of their debts. Sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 operates, therefore, not only against the debtor himself, but also against other persons. The question for us is whether an order for the payment of costs, forming part of a decree of the Divorce Court, is a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g). It has been held that that sub-section must be construed strictly. In Ex parte Chinery, in this court, Cotton, L.J., said, 12 Q. B. D., at p. 345, "Now, in legal language, and in Acts of Parliament, as well as with regard to the rights of the parties, there is a well-known distinction between a 'judgment' and an 'order.' No doubt the orders under the Judicature Act provide that every order may be enforced in the same manner as a judgment, but still judgments and orders are kept entirely distinct. It is not said that the word 'judgment' shall in other Acts of Parliament include an 'order.' I think we ought to give to the words 'final judgment' in this sub-section their strict and proper meaning, i.e., a judgment obtained in an action by which a previously existing liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is ascertained or established." Now that shows that the words "final judgment" must be construed strictly. So construing them, can they apply to an order of the Divorce Court in the decree in a divorce suit for the payment of costs? The words of the sub-section are as follows:—[The Master of the Rolls read the sub-section, and continued:—] These words seem, therefore, to me to show that, construing them strictly, as we must do, they can only mean a judgment in an action in which the defendant might have a counter-claim, set-off, or cross demand which could be set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. Is it possible to say that a suit in the Divorce Court is such a proceeding? I think not, and that goes a long way to show that the order of the Divorce Court is not a final judgment within sub-section 1 (g), which view is confirmed by a reference to Form No. 6, of a bankruptcy notice given in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules of 1886. It was suggested that sub-section 1 (e) of section 4 shows that such an order cannot be within sub-section 1 (g). I question whether you can support sub-section 1 (g) by reference to sub-section 1 (e). I think it is probable that the Divorce Court must enforce its own order by its own procedure, and not by execution. But it is not necessary to decide that now. It follows from what I have said, therefore, that the registrar's decision was right, and must be affirmed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am also clearly of opinion that the decree of the Divorce Court was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g). That view was most appropriately and clearly expressed by Cotton, L.J., in Ex parte Chinery, the words which have been already quoted by the Master of the Rolls, and by other portions of his judgment on page 345. The other members of the court (Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.) also gave judgment to the same effect, and I think their judgments go a very long way to establish that a decree of the Divorce Court is not a final judgment within the sub-section. Sub-section 1 (e) is, in my opinion, important. It contains the words "process in an action in any court or in any civil proceeding in the High Court."

Now these words are comprehensive, and seem to show that the narrower words in the sub-section 1 (g) were used by the Legislature advisedly. I am inclined to the opinion that sub-section 1 (e) might have been made use of in this case for the purpose of obtaining an act of bankruptcy; but I do not wish to express any definite opinion on that point.

KAY, L.J., delivered the following written judgment:—The appellant seeks to make Binstead a bankrupt. The alleged act of bankruptcy is the non-compliance within the prescribed time with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. [The Lord Justice read sub-section 1 (g), and continued:—] It has been decided that this sub-section does not mean that the person serving the notice must have been a creditor before the judgment. Obviously such construction would exclude judgments in actions of tort. It includes all cases in which the applicant becomes a creditor by the judgment. The meaning is that he must be a judgment creditor when he gives the notice: Ex parte Moore. It is also settled that a judgment against a defendant for costs may be final, though other parts of the judgment direct accounts or inquiries, the result of which may be to find money due to him: Ex parte Moore; In re Alexander.

In the present case, if the decree had been a judgment in an action in the Chancery Division or in the Queen's Bench Division, it cannot be denied that it would be a good foundation for a bankruptcy notice. But it is a decree against a co-respondent in a proceeding for divorce ordering him to pay costs. This order was contained in the decree nisi, which has since been made absolute. The costs have been taxed, and an order to pay them within a time fixed has since been made, like the four-day order which is familiar in Chancery practice.

The real objection is, that this is not a judgment in an action, to which alone, it is said, section 4, sub-section 1 (g), refers.

Now, first of all, the word "action" only occurs in the latter part of the sub-section, which provides that the debtor may show that he has not committed an act of bankruptcy by not complying with the notice when he can satisfy the court that the debt may be expunged by "a counter-claim, set-off, or cross demand," of equal or greater amount, "which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained." That includes the case of an action in which, for any reason, a counter-claim could not be made, as, for example, where the provisions as to counter-claim do not apply to the particular court in which the judgment was obtained. If there is no such proceeding in the Divorce Court that circumstance does not seem to me to prevent the sub-section from applying.

The objection appears to me to be highly technical. The final decision of a divorce proceeding is termed a "decree." The proceeding itself is usually styled a "cause" or "suit." It is commenced, not by writ, but by a petition and citation, which are served together upon the respondent. But a co-respondent may be decreed to pay damages as well as costs; and, if the decree orders him to pay both, or either, he is to all intents and purposes in the same position as a judgment debtor in an action in the Chancery or Queen's Bench Division, and the same remedies by fi. fa. and elegit or a receiver may be had in order to render the decree effectual. Before the Divorce Act, 1857, the course of proceedings for an injured husband was to bring an action at common law for criminal conversation against the alleged adulterer, and, if that action succeeded, to apply for an Act of Parliament to dissolve the marriage. This costly proceeding was superseded by that statute, which established a new court, in which husband and wife might by petition apply for dissolution of the marriage (section 27); and if the husband applies, he may join the alleged adulterer as co-respondent (section 28); and may claim damages against him, either by that or by a separate petition (section 33); and the court may (section 34) order the co-respondent to pay all or any part of the costs of the proceedings. By section 31 the dissolution of the marriage is to be by the "decree" of the court. In sections 33 and 34, relating to the damages and costs which the co-respondent may be ordered to pay, the word "decree" is not used. But section 33 provides that all the enactments contained in the Act with reference to the hearing and decision of petitions shall apply to the hearing of a petition for damages, and by section 34 the order for costs may be made when the alleged adulterer is a co-respondent to a petition for dissolution. In practice, I presume, the order usually is made, as it was here, as part of the decree.

Now it seems to me that no difference can for this purpose be made between a decree giving damages and costs against a co-respondent, and a decree giving costs only. If the later Act, the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, has excepted such a person from its description of a judgment debtor who commits an act of bankruptcy by failing to comply with a bankruptcy notice, this does not appear to be any sufficient reason for such an exception. But, pursuing this investigation, the Judicature Act of 1873 united the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Common Law, of Probate, Admiralty, the Divorce Court, and the London Court of Bankruptcy, into one Supreme Court of Judicature in England (section 3), and by sections 4 and 5 made them the High Court, and by section 16 vested in that High Court the jurisdiction of each and every of them, and also of the courts created by commissioners of assize. Section 100 provides that in the construction of the statute "cause" "shall include any action, suit, or other original proceeding between a plaintiff and a defendant, and any criminal proceeding by the Crown"; "suit" shall include "action"; "action" shall mean a civil proceeding commenced by writ, or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rule of court, and shall not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown"; and "judgment" shall include "decree." Therefore, a "suit or cause" includes an "action," and a "judgment" includes a "decree."

The Bankruptcy Act of 1883 was passed ten years later, and when it speaks of a "judgment creditor" why should not the word "judgment" include a "decree"? In the Court of Chancery proceedings were formerly called suits, and the decision of a suit was by decree. The suit was commenced by bill, and the appearance of the defendants was obtained by writ of subpœna, or in certain cases by service of a copy of the bill. By order 1 of the Rules of Court suits in Chancery are to be called actions, and by order 2 are to be commenced by writ, and by order 40 the judgment of the courts is to be obtained by motion for judgment. Order 68 provides that nothing in the rules shall, save as expressly provided, affect the procedure or practice in proceedings for divorce. Accordingly the Divorce Court is governed by its own rules in these respects, and its causes and suits are not called actions, and its decisions are not called judgments, but decrees. This, and as I think this only, creates the difficulty. In strict language a decree of the Divorce Court is not called a "judgment" nor is a suit for divorce called an "action." Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, contains eight sub-sections, every one of which applies to this debtor unless sub-section 1 (g) is an exception. Sub-section 1 (e) provides that "execution levied by seizure and sale" of a debtor's goods "under process in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court," shall be an act of bankruptcy.

Therefore if there had been such execution by seizure and sale under this decree, as, I understand, according to the ordinary practice of the Divorce Court, there might be if the co-respondent had goods which could be seized, he might be made a bankrupt. But in sub-section 1 (e) there are the words "in any civil proceeding in the High Court," which, it is said, would include this decree in the Divorce Court. However, I cannot see any reason for ascribing to the Legislature an intention to allow the debtor to be made bankrupt under sub-section 1 (e) and not under sub-section 1 (g). Cotton, L.J., in Ex parte Chinery and again in Ex parte Moore said that as under sub-section 1 (g) there is a new act of bankruptcy created for the first time by the Act of 1883, "we ought to give the words their strict meaning." This language was adopted by the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Riddell, In re Earl of Strathmore. Following that rule of construction, I must reluctantly come to the conclusion that "judgment in an action" does not strictly describe or include a decree in a suit for divorce. Therefore, the decision of the court below was right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, J. G. Dalzell; Ward, Perks, & McKay.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley & Bowen, L.JJ.) March 2.

DONOVAN v. LAING, WHARTON, & DOWN CONSTRUCTION SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Negligence—Master's liability—Employment of servant by third party—Negligence of servant while so employed.

The defendants entered into an agreement with a wharfinger, who was engaged in loading and unloading barges at a wharf, to let him have the use of a steam crane and a man who was engaged and paid by the defendants to work it whenever he required the same, for £50 a year. While the wharfinger was engaged in loading a barge at the wharf, one of his men was injured by the negligent act of the man working the crane in the course of the loading.

Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B.), that, though the man who was working the crane was the general servant of the defendants, the defendants were not liable, for, at the time of the accident, the man working the crane was employed under the orders and control of the wharfinger, and for that particular employment he must be regarded as the servant of the wharfinger, and not as the servant of the defendants.

Appeal from the judgment of Pollock, B., in favour of the defendants at the trial, with a jury, of an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was in the employment of Messrs. Jones & Co., and the defendants, under an agreement with Jones & Co., supplied them with a steam crane and a man to work it for the purpose of assisting them in loading and unloading vessels at a certain wharf.

The following were the terms of the agreement as set out in the answer of the secretary of the defendant company to the 5th interrogatory:—"My company, in or about the month of August, 1891, verbally agreed with Messrs. Jones & Co. that they should have the use of the steam crane when they required the same, and that my company should supply the fuel and necessary power and also a man to drive such crane, Messrs. Jones & Co. paying to my company therefor the sum of £50 per annum, and also a sum equal to the average sum for the three last years paid to the Hydraulic Co. for power supplied to the hydraulic crane which was formerly used in the place of the steam crane."

On the 3rd of March, 1892, Messrs. Jones & Co. were engaged in loading a barge at the wharf, and the crane was being worked by a man named Wand, who was engaged and paid by the defendants. The plaintiff's duty was to stand upon the edge of the wharf and give the signal to Wand to set the crane in motion. Wand, without waiting for the signal, started the crane, and the arm of the crane struck the plaintiff and injured him.

At the trial the jury found that Wand was negligent, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £500. The learned judge, upon the authority of Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 25 W. R. 263, 2 C. P. D. 205, held that Wand was, at the time of the accident, acting as the servant of Jones & Co., and not as the servant of the defendants, and entered judgment for the defendants.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

Lynden Bell (Cock, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The man Wand remained the servant of the defendants though employed upon this particular work. The defendants supplied the crane and the man, and so far as the management of the crane was concerned the man remained the servant of the defendants. Jones & Co. could not give Wand any orders they pleased; they could only tell him when to begin hoisting and lowering the goods. The fact that a person has to obey certain orders given by another does not make him the servant of that other. It is not enough that the servant should be under the limited control of that other person. The complete control of him must be handed over so as to make him the servant of the other. The decision in Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499, is in point, and the decision in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. was based upon the fact stated in the answers to interrogatories, that the engine was at the time of the accident under the control of the contractor. Wand being the general servant of the defendant, the circumstances must, as Lord Watson said in Johnson v. Lindsay, 40 W. R. 405, at p. 408, [1891] A. C. 371, at p. 382, "be such as to show conclusively that the servant submitted himself to the control of another person than his proper master." That was not proved in this case. Wand therefore remained the servant of the defendants, and they are liable.

He also referred to Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547; Jones v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, 33 W. R. 551, 14 Q. B. D. 890.

J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and J. P. Rawlinson, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff brought an action for personal injuries sustained by him owing to the negligence of a servant of the defendants, for whose negligence at that time the plaintiff alleged that the defendants were responsible. It appears that Jones & Co. were engaged in loading a barge at their wharf. The defendants hired out to Jones & Co. a crane and a man in charge of it for the purpose of assisting in loading the barge. What is the ordinary way of using a crane on a quay for the purpose of loading a barge? It is well known that the goods which have to be loaded are placed in the crane, and the arm of the crane is then swung round so as to bring the goods over the barge, and those who are engaged in the loading have to give orders as to what part of the barge the goods are to be lowered on to. They direct the man working the crane where the goods are to go. How far the arm of the crane is to be swung depends upon the part of the vessel where the goods are to go. Every motion of the crane must be under the control of those who are loading the ship. Accordingly, when a crane is lent to persons who are loading a ship to be used for that purpose, every motion of the crane—the moment of raising the goods from the quay, the moment of lowering them on to the barge, the part of the barge on to which the goods are to be lowered, the moment when the act of lowering them is to be stopped—must be in accordance with the orders of those who are loading the barge. These are undisputed facts. In the present case the defendants hired out the crane and a man to work it to Jones & Co. to be used in the way I have described. The man was no doubt the servant of the defendants for some purposes. I should think that if he had by his neglect allowed the crane to get out of order for doing its work, and injury was thereby caused to someone, the defendants would be liable. But this accident did not happen from anything of the sort. It happened through the crane being negligently worked. The man was bound to work the crane under the control and orders of Jones & Co. That being so, whose servant was he as regards the working of the crane. It is true that the defendants selected him, and that they paid him his wages. Those are circumstances which, if nothing else intervened, would be strong to show that the man was the servant of the defendants. But as regards the working of the crane, at this particular time he was no longer the servant of the defendants. The operation of loading was conducted solely by Jones & Co., and I have no doubt that if they saw him disobeying their orders or otherwise misconducting himself they could have discharged him from that employment. Was he, then, Jones & Co.'s servant for the purpose of that employment?

If any authority were required for an answer to that question it is to be found in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. The question there was, in whose service was Lawrence? He was the general servant of the defendants; but it was held that in respect of the particular employment in which he was negligent he was not the servant of the defendants. Cockburn, C.J., said: "It appears to me that the defendants put the engine and this man Lawrence at Whittle's disposal just as much as if they had lent both to him. But when one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he is lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him." Can anything be clearer than that? The man there was the general servant of the defendants, but he was lent by them to Whittle, and it was held that he was the servant of Whittle for that employment, and not the servant of his general masters, because Whittle had control of the operations in which he was employed, and his general masters had not.

The passage which has been read from the opinion of Lord Watson in Johnson v. Lindsay seems to me to be exactly to the same effect. He says: "I do not think it necessary to discuss the question under what circumstances the servant of one man ought to be considered the servant of another; I can well conceive that the general servant of A. might, by working towards a common end along with the servants of B., and submitting himself to the control and orders of B., become pro hac vice B.'s servant in such sense as not only to disable him from recovering from B. for injuries sustained through the fault of B.'s proper servants, but to exclude the liability of A. for injury occasioned by his fault to B.'s own workmen." That doctrine is applicable here.

I will only mention the case of Jones v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool for the purpose of noticing that the court there thought that there was a distinction between the general master lending his servant gratuitously and lending him for a consideration. I cannot agree with that distinction. It has nothing to do with the question whose servant the man is at the time.

It was also contended that he was the servant of both. He may be the servant of both at the same time, but not with regard to the same acts of service. With regard to the act of service here—namely, the working of the crane—the man was the servant of Jones & Co. alone, and not as regards that, the servant of the defendants. He might, no doubt, have been the servant of the defendants in respect of other things, but not as regards the working of the crane.

The judgment of the learned judge is therefore right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Primâ facie the plaintiff had a colour of right in bringing this action. But upon looking at the facts it appears that the crane was used in loading a ship, that the man Wand was working the crane, and that this was done under an arrangement between the defendants and Jones & Co. The answer to the fifth interrogatory shows what that arrangement was. The key to the whole case lies in this, that the defendants were not loading the barge, and that Jones & Co. were. The crane was being used for Jones & Co.'s purposes, and not for the defendants' purposes. Jones & Co. must be regarded for that job as Wand's masters. That carries the case against the plaintiff and brings it within the decision in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., a case which was decided upon sound principles in the Court of Appeal. As to the case of Jones v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, that decision was right, as the only orders the defendants could give to the driver of the watering cart was as to what streets he was to water. With reference to the point which was suggested, that the defendants as well as Jones & Co. might be separately liable as the masters of the man Wand, that suggestion is answered by Littledale, J., in Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C., at p. 558, where he says that the man "is the servant of one or the other, but not the servant of one and the other; the law does not recognize a several liability in two principals who are unconnected."

BOWEN, L.J.—The law seems to me to be clear. The liability of a master is based, not upon the ground that he ordered the act complained of, but upon the ground of his liability for what his servant does in the course of his employment. We have here only to consider whether, when the accident happened to the plaintiff, the defendants were Wand's masters, not in the sense of being his general masters, but in the sense of having the right at the time to control the act. That has been the test laid down for a great number of years, and nowhere better than by Crompton, J., in Sadler v. Henlock, 3 W. R., at p. 182, 4 E. & B., at p. 578, where he said: "The test here is whether the defendant retained the power of controlling the work." There are two ways in which a person may contract as regards the carrying out of works. The contractor may contract to do the work, the mode of controlling the means and the end being left to him. In that case the men are, without doubt, his servants. But a contractor may contract in a different manner. He may lend his servants for the purpose of carrying out the end to be accomplished. For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls it seems clear to me that the defendants, who were called in to assist, placed their crane and man under the control of Jones & Co., and did not, in Crompton, J.'s language, retain the power of controlling the work.

The judgment in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. seems to me to be perfectly right, and the language which has been read to us from the opinion of Lord Watson in Johnson v. Lindsay follows the same line. The carriage cases do not seem to me to touch the present case. If a person hires a carriage, the end to be attained is prescribed by the person who hires it. The livery-stable keeper undertakes to carry out that end, but he in no way places his carriage and servant under the control of the hirer, except that the servant is bound to drive where ordered. The control as to the mode of driving to the place indicated is left to the livery-stable keeper's servant. If the coachman acts in a wrong manner the hirer can complain to the coachman's master. If, however, the hirer were to interfere with the driving, and an injury was caused to someone thereby, he would be liable, not as master, but because he interfered and authorized the act. In the present case the defendants were the general masters of Wand, but under an agreement with Jones & Co. they parted with the control over him for that particular work, and the relation of master and servant lasted only as long as they retained the power of controlling him, and when they parted with that control over him the relation ceased for the time. I agree also with what has been said as to there being no difference between lending a servant for reward and lending him gratuitously.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, R. H. Ward.

Solicitor for the defendants, H. F. Kite.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Nov. 12, 14.

In re NEW ZEALAND TRUST AND LOAN CO. (a.)

Trustee—Vesting order—Stock—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), ss. 2, 35—Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), s. 6.

In an order made under section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850, and section 6 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852, vesting the "right to call for a transfer of and to transfer" stock, in new trustees, it is not obligatory to insert the name of any transferee in the order, nor is there any general rule that the words "to any purchaser or purchasers" should be added; the insertion or omission of these words is a matter of discretion for the judge who makes the order.

In re Peacock, 14 Ch. D. 212, explained.

The word "stock," as defined in section 2 of the Trustee Act, 1850, comprises shares not fully paid up in any company or society.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

By a vesting order dated the 8th of March, 1892, made by Chitty, J., in the administration suit of In re Alcock, it was ordered, "(1) That Charles Alcock be appointed a new trustee of the estate of Elizabeth Alcock (deceased) in substitution for Arthur Alcock, and jointly with the defendant John F. Alcock. (2) That the right to call for a transfer of, and to transfer, the sums of stock and shares specified in the schedule hereto" (to which the testatrix was beneficially entitled at the time of her decease) "to any purchaser or purchasers, and to receive the dividends accrued and to accrue thereon, do vest in John F. Alcock and Charles Alcock as trustees of the will of Elizabeth Alcock." This vesting order had been served on the New Zealand Trust, &c., Co. Among the stocks and shares specified in the schedule to this order were 491 shares in the New Zealand Trust and Loan Co. These shares, which were of £25 each (on which £5 each only had been paid up), had, in July, 1891, been transferred by Arthur Alcock and John F. Alcock, the two executors and trustees of the testatrix Elizabeth Alcock, into the sole name of Arthur Alcock, who was accordingly, in August, 1891, registered as holder of the shares, and a new certificate for the whole of the shares was issued to Arthur Alcock by the company. In November, 1891, Arthur Alcock absconded, and in January, 1892, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against him. On the 28th of May, 1892, John F. Alcock and Charles Alcock, the then trustees of the will, sold one of the above-mentioned 491 shares to

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

S. R. Earle, and sent the deed of transfer to the company for registration. The company refused to register it, on the ground that the transferors, John F. Alcock and Charles Alcock, were not the registered holders of any of the 491 shares, which were still standing in the sole name of Arthur Alcock, the absconding trustee; and the company insisted that the transferors should first have the shares transferred into their own names before they could require the company to register the transfer to Earle.

The trustees and Earle thereupon applied by way of motion, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register, by removing the name of Arthur Alcock as the holder of the one share sold, and inserting therein the name of Earle.

On the 2nd of July, 1892, Chitty, J., made an order for rectification of the register in the terms of the applicants' motion.

The company appealed.

Latham, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the appellants.—The vesting order of the 8th of March is not in the usual or proper form. Section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), enacts that it shall be lawful for the court, upon making any order for appointing a new trustee, "to vest the right to call for a transfer of any stock" in the persons who upon the appointment shall be the trustees. This gives the trustees so appointed power to call for a transfer of the stock to themselves only: In re Smyth, 4 De G. & Sm. 499. Section 6 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), was not intended to enlarge the jurisdiction; it only gives trustees having the legal right to call for a transfer, the legal right to transfer, i.e., to themselves. The common form of vesting order under these sections contains the words "and let" [the new trustee or trustees] "transfer the said [stock] into his or their own name or names": Seton, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 1073. This vesting order, however, not only does not contain those usual words, but does contain the words "transfer to any purchaser or purchasers," which ought not to be inserted. [BOWEN, L.J.—How did those words get into the order?] On the supposed authority of In re Peacock, 14 Ch. D. 212, but the order there was an exceptional order. [Farwell, Q.C.—I do not object to the words "to any purchaser or purchasers" being struck out.] That would not be sufficient for the company. The vesting order at most ought only to give the trustees the right to transfer to themselves, or to name the transferees in the order, as was done in King of Hanover v. Bank of England, L. R. 8 Eq. 350. The practice of the Bank of England is to have a direction for a transfer "into the names" of the trustees: In re Glanville's Trusts, W. N., 1878, p. 21. Further, although it was held in In re Angelo, 5 De G. & Sm. 278, that the word "stock" in section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850, included "shares," it has never been decided that it applies to shares not fully paid up, and in respect of which, therefore, a liability still attaches.

Farwell, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the respondents.—The company really want to make the trustees go on the register. The trustees object to do that, as there is a large liability attaching to these shares. The direction as to whom the transfers were to be made was really inserted for the protection of the cestui que trusts. It would be dangerous to omit those words in all cases and allow the trustees to transfer to anyone at large. All the common forms of vesting orders do not contain the words used in Seton's Forms, "transfer into his or their own name or names"; in Tripp's Chancery Forms, at p. 223, those words are not used. This is not an appeal from the vesting order made by Chitty, J., on the 8th of March, but only an appeal from the order to rectify the company's register.

Latham, Q.C., in reply.—The company were not before the court when the vesting order was made. The vesting order gives the trustees the right to receive the dividends, and yet they are not liable for calls. Article 16 of the articles of association of the company provides that "the company may decline to register any transfer of shares made by a member who is indebted to them, and may, without assigning any reason therefor, decline to register any transfer of shares not being fully paid up." The vesting order should, therefore, with respect to the right to transfer, contain the words "subject to the articles of the company."

LINDLEY, L.J. [after stating the facts, and reading the order of Chitty, J., of the 8th of March, 1892, proceeded:—].—Having got that order, John F. Alcock and Charles Alcock transferred one of the shares to Earle, whose name is the only one now before us; and the transferors have called on the company to register Earle as the holder of this share. The company, however, decline to do so, on the ground that the order is embarrassing; and if accepted in this form it would, they say, be embarrassing to them hereafter; and they rely upon article 16 of their articles of association as justifying them in refusing to register any transfer of shares not fully paid up.

That gives rise to the question whether there is any reasonable ground of objection, in the company's point of view, to this order.

Mr. Latham has raised several objections. He said, first, that section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850, does not apply to shares not fully paid up. I was somewhat startled by that. I have known orders made under the Act with regard to shares not fully paid up for the last thirty years. I cannot help thinking, however, looking at section 2, that the language is ample enough to comprise shares not fully paid up. In In re Angelo it was held that the definition of the word "stock" in section 2 applied to "shares" in a joint-stock company; but I do not know that the point now taken by the appellants has arisen before for decision with regard to shares not fully paid up. I should say that the practice of making orders under the Act extending to shares not fully paid up is well founded; and in my opinion that objection is untenable.

Another objection was that the name of the proposed transferee ought to appear in the order, and that an order vesting in certain persons the right to call for a transfer ought not to leave out the name of the proposed transferee. The company say they would like the name of the transferee or transferees submitted to them in every case before the order is drawn up. The Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, have been in operation for years; orders have been constantly drawn up under them, and there is nothing in them that I know of requiring that the name of a transferee should be inserted in any order. I cannot hold judicially that this order is imperfect or wrong by reason of the omission of the names of the transferees.

Then Mr. Latham says that the insertion of the words "to any purchaser or purchasers" is not warranted by the Acts, and that the words ought to come out. If that is a reasonable objection we must order, in effect, the words to be struck out. Technically we could not alter the terms of the order, because it is not under review, but we could decline to order the company to register the name of a particular transferee. With regard to the power of the court to put those words in, it appears to me that section 31 of the Act of 1850, although it certainly does not require the court to put them in, yet authorizes them to be put in. Mr. Farwell has given a reason for that, viz., the protection of the cestui que trusts. Chitty, J., it seems, put the words in because he felt himself bound by the form of order made in In re Peacock, but I cannot myself hold that case to be an authority for the proposition that these words must be put into the order whenever it is desired to transfer the shares to persons other than the trustees themselves, the trustees being the persons in whom the right to call for a transfer is vested. I should have thought it would be better to leave them out in the absence of any special reason for putting them in. But I do not think that the insertion of these words in the order was beyond the discretion of the judge. The company, however, suggest this: "We may be embarrassed, the name of the wrong person may be put into the transfer or there may be some fraud of that kind; the transferors may make a transfer first to A. and then to B., and we may be put upon inquiry who is the purchaser." That is purely a speculative suggestion, and I doubt whether the company would be embarrassed even if that happened; but this is an application by Earle, the transferee, himself. Although the words "to any purchaser or purchasers" may possibly be in common form, it might be better as a general rule to leave them out; but the court has, in my opinion, power to put in the words, and in a reasonable case may put them in.

Mr. Latham says that the transferors should be put under some undertaking to find a transferee acceptable to the directors, and that such undertaking should be put into the order. Of course we cannot put that in. Then Mr. Latham says that we should put into the order an expression that the right to transfer should be "subject to the articles of the company." I do not see why the court should put that in or alter the form of words which has been in use for so many years. Mr. Latham is right in saying that the order does not affect the rights of the company under the memorandum and articles; but it is not necessary to express that in the order. I do not see why we should put in words that are not wanted.

The result is that all the objections fail, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have nothing to add.

Solicitors, Freshfields & Williams; Wilson & Son.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Chitty, J. } Feb. 17, 18, 24; March 2.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CORPORATION OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Injunction—Nuisance—Smallpox hospital—Quia timet action.

An injunction will not be granted in a quia timet action unless the plaintiff makes out a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will in fact arise.

The site of a proposed smallpox hospital was 200, 240, and 450 yards respectively from the three adjacent public roads, ninety yards from a much-frequented cemetery, and 256 yards from the nearest house, there being only fifteen houses within a half-mile radius. The medical evidence being conflicting,

Held, that, in the absence of strong medical evidence that the proposed hospital would be a nuisance, no injunction could be granted.

Quære, whether, in the case of a hospital, the health of the public at large may not be considered, to some extent, as against the merely local inconvenience.

Motion.

Motion by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Withington Local Board and others for an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting a smallpox hospital on a piece of land, portion of the cemetery belonging to them at Withington, on the ground that such hospital would be a public nuisance.

A previous action against the same defendants, based on the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 112, 131, 285, has already been reported: Withington Local Board v. Corporation of Manchester, ante, p. 306; and an action on the ground of private nuisance: Crofton v. Corporation of Manchester, 37 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 211.

The evidence showed that the epidemic was raging at Manchester, that there was no available site within the city, and that the defendants had no means of acquiring any other site within or without the city within any reasonable time sufficient to enable them to cope with the urgency of the case. In the conduct of the hospital when opened the defendants intended to employ the best methods and appliances known to modern science for preventing the spread of the disease and for the safety of the public health. The hospital would be 200, 240, and 450 yards respectively from the three roads bounding the site selected, and ninety yards from the remaining boundary—viz., the Dissenters' burial-ground, which was much used. The whole cemetery was also much frequented by visitors from the surrounding districts.

The registrar's office was 413 yards off, and the nearest mortuary chapel 180 yards. The district round was sparsely inhabited. There were only fifteen houses within a half-mile radius, the nearest, a cottage, being 256 yards away.

The medical evidence as to the danger of infection was conflicting, but there was no cross-examination on the affidavits. The reports to the Local Government Board in the Fulham Smallpox Case (1885-1886) and on the Epidemic of Smallpox at Sheffield (1887-1888), with the spot maps and curves which may be called "isolemal lines" or "lines of equal infection," were referred to to show how the infection spreads from a given source.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and Clare, for the Attorney-General.—It is primâ facie an indictable nuisance to bring smallpox patients along a highway: Rex v. Vantandillo, 4 M. & S. 73; Rex v. Burnett, ib., 272. A smallpox hospital is primâ facie a nuisance: Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193. Defendant's evidence shows that in the absence of proper precautions the hospital is a source of danger for some undefined distance somewhere about 200 yards round it. It lies on them, and not on us, to show what this distance is, and also to show their proposed precautions are sufficient to prevent the nuisance. They have not discharged this burden, and we are entitled to have matters kept in statu quo till the trial.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Byrne, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the corporation.—We do not admit that the hospital is a source of danger. The onus of proof is on the applicants: Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Board, 1 Times L. R. 80, 2 Ib. 361. The balance of convenience is clearly on our side: Baines v. Baker, Amb. 158 (s. c. Anon. 3 Atk. 750).

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—This is the third motion which has been made against the corporation of Manchester in respect of the hospital they propose to open in the district of the Withington Local Board for the reception of smallpox patients. The present action is brought by the Attorney-General, not ex officio, but at the instance of relators, and also by private persons as plaintiffs; but the case of the private plaintiffs was not argued at the bar. The foundation of the motion is an apprehended public nuisance, the nuisance being not an actual or existing nuisance, but a future nuisance, which, it is alleged, will arise if the hospital is opened. The action, then, is what is technically known as a quia timet action. The question as to the principle on which the court proceeds in granting or refusing an injunction in such actions has been the subject of numerous decisions, among which are Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. 617; Ripon v. Hobart, 3 My. & K. 176; Haines v. Taylor, 2 Ph. 209; Hepburn v. Lordan, 13 W. R. 368, 1004, 2 H. & M. 345; Attorney-General v. Kingston, 13 W. R. 888; Salvin v. The North Brancepeth Coal Co., 22 W. R. 904, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 705; Fletcher v. Bealey, 33 W. R. 745, 28 Ch. D. 688. The principle appears to be the same whether the alleged future nuisance is public or private. In one of the cases to which I have referred the alleged nuisance was a public nuisance; in others a private nuisance. In some, acts had been done which, it was alleged, would result in future mischief or injury, but which had not already resulted in injury or substantial damage; in others, there was mere threat or intention. But in regard to all such cases the principle is the same. Where it is certain that the injury will arise the court will at once interfere by injunction; as, for instance, in the case of a threat to cut a permanent ditch across a public highway. But the court does not require absolute certainty before it intervenes; something less will suffice: see Lord Brougham's judgment in Ripon v. Hobart. In Crowder v. Tinkler (the gunpowder case) Lord Eldon, who granted the injunction, spoke of "extreme probability of irreparable injury": 19 Ves., at p. 622. In Attorney-General v. Kingston Wood, V.C., who refused the injunction, considered the question to be whether there was evidence of an actual nuisance committed, or "evidence of the extreme probability of a nuisance if that which was being done was allowed to continue." In Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylum Board (the Darenth Hospital Camp case), 1 Times L. R. 80, 2 Ib. 361, where the hospital was in actual operation, the court refused the injunction, Cotton, L.J., in his judgment laying it down that "the plaintiffs must make out that there was real danger, otherwise, however much they might feel the hospital to be an annoyance, they could not get an injunction."

The principle which I think may be properly and safely extracted from the quia timet authorities is that the plaintiff must show a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will, in fact, arise. Before stating the facts I will make a few observations in regard to public nuisance at common law. The plaintiffs' case is that the defendants are proposing to do acts which, if done, will constitute a common or public nuisance, and as such will constitute an indictable offence. A great variety of instances of the different kinds of public nuisances will be found collected in 1 Russell on Crimes, 5th ed., p. 418, et. seq., and in Stephen's Criminal Digest, 3rd ed., p. 126, including Rex v. Vantandillo and Rex v. Burnett, both smallpox cases, and cited at the bar in argument before me. These two cases show that, although no actual mischief had arisen from the acts done, there may be an indictable offence if there is danger to the public health. In The Queen v. Lister—the naphtha case—5 W. R. 626, Dears & B. C. C. 209, the keeping of large quantities of a highly inflammable fluid near a highway to the danger of the public was held to be an indictable offence, though no fire had taken place. In the Darenth case Sir E. Fry appears to have adopted, as applicable in such cases, Cockburn, C.J.'s statement of the law, that it must be shown that there is "a well-founded and reasonable apprehension of danger." The apprehended future danger in the present case is danger to the public health. Now, undoubtedly, there are many cases of public nuisance — by interference with an unquestionable right of the public, such, for instance, as the permanent obstruction of a highway, where the court did decline at once to permit evidence to be given of any supposed public benefit arising from the wrongful act complained of, and would refuse to balance the good alleged to accrue to some portions of the public against the mischief to the public in general. But in the case where the health of the Queen's subjects in general is concerned it may possibly be a question whether, if the evidence shows that the maintenance of a smallpox hospital is on the whole, balancing the good against the evil, more beneficial to the health of the public at large, or to that portion of the public that inhabits or frequents the neighbourhood, than the leaving of the persons suffering from the disease scattered in their own homes, some weight might not be properly allowed to this circumstance. If Lord Hardwicke is rightly reported in the case of Coldbath-fields Smallpox Hospital—Baines v. Baker — he appears to have entertained some such question when he stated his opinion that the hospital was "a charity like to prove of great advantage to mankind." But, although I throw out these observations as being possibly worthy of future consideration, I state expressly that they do not form any ground of my decision on this motion.

I now proceed to deal shortly with the facts. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] About the foregoing facts there is no substantial controversy. The contest begins with the evidence of the medical experts. Each side produces witnesses of high repute, competent from experience and study to speak on the subject of smallpox hospitals. The plaintiffs' evidence includes elaborate reports to the Local Government Board, such as the report of 1887-88 on the Sheffield case, and the report 1885-86. No imputation is made on the good faith of the expert witnesses. There is an honest difference of opinion, and each side maintains vigorously the opinion expressed in the affidavits. But this evidence has not been submitted to the test of cross-examination. The plaintiffs' counsel have not relied on the theory of aerial dissemination of the disease; that theory is not yet established. From the affidavits the plaintiffs' counsel extracted the proposition, which they urged, that a smallpox hospital is a centre from which the disease, somehow or other (it was not for them to say how), spreads to an extent dangerous to public health for the distance of a half-mile radius. It was necessarily admitted that the burden of proof lay on the plaintiffs, but at one time it seemed as if the argument were being put as dividing the evidence into two parts, and as contending that the plaintiffs had made out a primâ facie case which shifted on to the defendants a burden they had failed to discharge. But the argument was not so put in the reply, the contention being that there was to be found running through the evidence of the defendants an admission, express or implied, that it was not safe to leave an intervening clear space of less than 200 yards. I am unable to find any such admission; the substance of the defendants' evidence is that this hospital, situate and carried on as it will be, will not give rise to any appreciable danger to public health.

Much reliance was placed by the plaintiff's counsel on the Sheffield case in 1887. But the Sheffield case presents essentially different conditions from those in the present case. The hospital was placed on the verge of a poor and densely-populated district; there were grave faults in the administration of the hospital, both within and without, and there was a recklessness displayed by the population which seems almost incredible. I confess that I have not been much impressed by the spot maps that accompany and illustrate the report. I question whether they support the inference sought to be established, and whether they are in accordance, as it was said they were, with the strict principles of inductive logic. Each case depends on its own facts; other cases may afford assistance to the experts, but they are not guides which the court is bound to follow. So far as concerns any former case, whether decided in a court of justice or not, the Fulham and Darenth cases appear to be more apposite to the present than the Sheffield case. In the latter, the camp hospital contained 1,000 patients, and the clear space left round it was only fifty yards; yet it was held that the plaintiff had not made out real danger; and this decision was arrived at on the trial, and after the witnesses had been cross-examined. The plaintiffs' counsel resorted to the argument of convenience and inconvenience and the propriety of maintaining the existing status quo, urging that, if the injunction was refused, irreparable damage might fall on the inhabitants of Withington, whereas if it were granted but little or no harm would be sustained by Manchester. But this argument cannot prevail; the granting of an injunction might result in penning back this scourge on the citizens and thus inflict on them irreparable injury. In my opinion, however, the evidence in favour of the plaintiffs' case is not sufficiently cogent to make the question of granting or refusing the injunction turn on the consideration of convenience or inconvenience. I have purposely refrained from dealing with the medical testimony in detail. It is seldom advisable in a case of this sort to submit conflicting evidence to any critical examination on a motion. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the plaintiffs have failed on this motion to make out that there is a probability, much less that there is a high degree of probability, that the apprehended danger will in fact ensue. In parting with the case I think it right to say that the court ought to exercise great caution before it accepts any general proposition of fact which might tend to the closing of many a well-ordered smallpox hospital in the country. The necessity for caution is all the greater because the doctrine of coming to a nuisance was long since been excluded. See, for instance, Tipping v. St. Helen's Smelting Co., L. R. 1 Ch. App. 66, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 76. I, for the reasons given, refuse the injunction. Costs will be costs in the action.

Injunction refused.

Solicitors, Chesters, for Craven & Crofton, Manchester; Austin & Austin, for W. H. Talbot, Town Clerk, Manchester.

Chan. Div.
North, J. } Nov. 26, 27.

In re GOVERNORS OF THE CHARITY FOR THE RELIEF OF THE POOR WIDOWS AND CHILDREN OF CLERGYMEN AND SKINNER. (a.)

Charitable corporation—Donation of land—Sale of land—Endowment—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, ss. 24, 62, 66—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, ss. 29, 48.

Land conveyed to a charitable corporation by a voluntary settlement was afterwards sold by the corporation to a purchaser who took exception to such sale as ultrà vires without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

Held, that this land, not being subject to any specific trust, did not require the consent of the Charity Commissioners for its sale.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act to determine whether the corporation in question could sell land belonging to them without the consent of the Charity Commissioners. The charter of the corporation was granted in 1678 by King Charles II., and by its provisions the corporation were authorized to purchase and hold land not exceeding the yearly value of £2,000 and also to sell their land. Further licences extending the value of the land which they might hold had subsequently been granted to the corporation. The land about which the dispute had arisen, which is situate at Upper Whiston in the county of Yorkshire, had in the year 1717 (subject to some long since expired life interests) been granted to the use of the corporation and their successors for ever (the terms of which conveyance, so far as relates to the present case, appear set out in the judgment). The corporation in May, 1892, entered into arrangements with a certain Mr. Skinner for the sale of the land to him. In his requisitions on title this gentleman raised the objection that the land could not be sold without the consent of the Charity Commissioners. The Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137) provides by section 27, upon the application to the said board by the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity, representing to the said board that under the special circumstances of any land belonging to the charity a sale or exchange of such land can be effected on such terms as to increase the income of the charity or would otherwise be advantageous to the charity such board may, if they think fit, inquire into such circumstances, and if after inquiry they are satisfied that the proposed sale or exchange will be advantageous to the charity may authorize the sale or exchange and give such directions in relation thereto and for securing the due investment of the money arising from any such sale or by way of equality of exchange for the benefit of the charity as they may think fit. Section 62 expressly exempts from the Act various corporations and institutions, such as the universities, the Commissioners of Queen Anne's Bounty, and the British Museum, and any institution, establishment, or society for religious or other charitable purposes, or to the auxiliary or branch associations connected therewith, wholly maintained by voluntary contributions, and where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly from income arising from any endowment the powers and provisions of this Act shall, with respect to such charity, extend and apply to the income from endowment only, to the exclusion of voluntary subscriptions and the application thereof; and no donation or bequest unto or on trust for any such charity as last aforesaid of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, and which may be legally applied by the governing or managing body of such charity as income in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the said board, or the powers or provisions of this Act, and no portion of any such donation or bequest as last aforesaid or of any voluntary subscription which is now or shall or may from time to time be set apart or appropriated and invested by the governing or managing body of the charity for the purpose of being held and applied or expended for or to some defined and specific object or purpose connected with any such charity in pursuance of any rule or resolution made or adopted by the governing or managing body of any such charity, or of any donation or bequest in aid of any fund so set apart or appropriated for any such object or purpose as aforesaid, shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the said board or the powers or provisions of this Act. Section 66 defines endowment and land as follows: "In the construction, of this Act except where the context or other provisions of this Act may require a different construction, the expression endowment shall mean and include all lands and real estate whatsoever of any tenure, and any charge thereon or interest therein, and all stocks, funds, moneys, securities, investments, and personal estate whatsoever which shall for the time being belong to or be held in trust for any charity, or for all or any of the objects or purposes thereof; and the expression land shall extend to and include manors, messuages, buildings, tenements, and hereditaments, corporeal and incorporeal, of every tenure and description.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Charitable Trusts Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), provides:—

Section 1.—The Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, hereinafter called the principal Act, and this Act shall be construed together as one Act, and any provisions of the principal Act inconsistent with this Act are hereby repealed.

Section 29.—It shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant, otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament under any Act hereafter passed, or which may hereafter be passed, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the board, any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate, or any lease thereof in reversion, after more than three years of any existing term, or for any term of life, or in consideration, wholly or in part, of any fine, or for any term of years exceeding twenty-one years.

Section 48.—In the construction of the principal Act and this Act the word charity shall include every institution in England or Wales endowed for charitable purposes, but shall not include any charity or institution expressly exempted from the operation of the Act of 1853, and words applying to any person or individual shall apply also to a corporation, whether sole or aggregate.

S. Strickland, for the purchaser.—Section 62 obliges us to distinguish between a voluntary contribution and an endowment. The ground we take up is that this was an endowment, and that this charity is maintained by an income arising from endowment. In Governors of the Charity for the Relief of the Poor Widows and Children of Clergymen v. Sutton, 8 W. R. 167, 27 Beav. 651, the then Master of the Rolls, Lord Romilly, explains the meaning of endowment, and states that the word endowment in section 62 has reference to an endowment made for some particular purpose or trust; but it was a mere obiter dictum. [He referred to the Royal Society of London to Thomson, 29 W. R. 838, 17 Ch. D. 407, and Finnis to Forbes, 32 W. R. 55, 24 Ch. D. 391.] Our position is, land must be an endowment. When land is given it is not intended that it shall be applicable as income. As to section 62, the word donation cannot refer to land. It is to be noted that it is used in connection with the word bequest. If the interpretation given by Lord Romilly be accepted, this Act, which was undoubtedly passed to limit the powers of trustees in dealing with charitable funds, will be cut down to very narrow dimensions, and can only apply to specific trusts.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the corporation.—This land was given to the corporation for the general purposes of the corporation, and there is no question that, prior to the Charitable Trusts Acts, the corporation might have sold the land. We are within the exception in section 62 of the Act of 1855, for otherwise the anomalous result will follow that a gift of, say £10, would not be an endowment within the Act, but a gift of the smallest quantity of land would be. The word "donation" has been applied to gifts of land from the time of Bracton. It is not argued that the property was not given simpliciter, or that it was appropriated for any specific purpose. Accordingly it falls within the exception stated by the Master of the Rolls in Governors for the Relief of Poor Widows, &c., v. Sutton.

S. Strickland replied.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the consent of the Charity Commissioners is not necessary. The Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, as it is generally called, was established by Royal Charter in the year 1678, with power to purchase, hire, receive, and enjoy manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, liberties, franchises, &c. [His lordship read the charter.] According to the agreed statement of facts the title of the corporation to the land now in question arises under a deed dated 1717, by which, for considerations which I am told were not pecuniary, the owners of the land granted and released it to the persons named therein, their heirs and assigns, to the use of Margaret Dolby for her life, with remainder to the use of John Dolby for his life, with remainder to the use of Elizabeth Bayley for her life (she paying thereout a yearly sum of £10 for the relief of the poor charity children of a certain parish), with remainder to the only proper use and behoof of the corporation and their successors for ever. There are, I think, no other words in the conveyance of importance here.

This property remained vested in the corporation until, in March, 1892, they entered into an agreement for the sale of it to Mr. Skinner. The purchaser is satisfied with the title with one exception. He says that the corporation being a charity cannot legally sell the property without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, and he requires that their consent should be obtained. For some reasons which I do not quite know it has not been thought desirable to apply to them, or at any rate it has been thought right that the corporation should if possible be placed in a position to say that it is not necessary for them to apply to the commissioners. Whether or not they should apply is the question that I have to decide.

There can be no doubt that down to the year 18[illegible] the corporation might have sold the land as they pleased, or let it and applied the proceeds for the general purposes of the charity. Now the question is, have the Acts of 1853 and 1855 made any difference? The Act of 1853 is peculiarly framed, and there had decisions upon it which certainly facilitate my judgment. [His lordship then read section 24 of the Act of 1853, and continued:—] Therefore there were powers given to do what the trusts of the charity did not authorize, and if the sanction of the commissioners is given it is precisely the same thing as if the express trusts of the charity had authorized it to be done. Then I come to section 62; but before reading it I think I may usefully refer to the 66th section, the interpretation clause, which contains a definition of certain language used in the Act. [His lordship read the definitions of charity, endowment, and land.] There can be no doubt that the words of the interpretation clause include under the phrase endowment all real and all personal estate—that is to say, they do not say that all real and all personal estate shall constitute an endowment; but where the word endowment is used so as to apply to it, it is to apply to all real and all personal estate. If the Act had not contained the 62nd section there is no doubt but that it would have applied to the present corporation. But this 62nd section creates very large exemptions from the Act, and in my opinion it makes no difference whether the charities which are exempted from the Act are dealt with by express exemptions from the original words, or when the words used are general words in the first instance with express exemptions to be taken out of them. It seems to me to come really to the same thing in the end. Now what are the exemptions? First of all there are the universities, the cathedrals and collegiate churches and buildings registered as places of religious worship and used for that purpose, Queen Anne's Bounty, and other named charities, and among the exemptions is also "any institution, establishment, or society for religious or other charitable purposes, or the auxiliary or branch associations connected therewith wholly maintained by voluntary contributions." These cases are entirely exempted, but then the Legislature had to deal with the cases, many of which existed at that time, where an institution for charitable purposes was maintained in part by voluntary contributions and in part by other funds.

[His lordship then read the part of the clause dealing with the subject.]

Pausing there I may observe that I have not now to deal with the case of a body maintained wholly by voluntary subscriptions. It is clear that a charitable body maintained wholly by voluntary subscriptions is entirely outside the Act, and that a body maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by income from endowment is so far as relates to the voluntary subscriptions outside the Act. That this Act is to apply only to income derived from such endowment itself says, "The provisions of the Act shall with respect to such charity extend and apply to the income from endowment only," and the word endowment includes in the terms of the interpretation clause any real and any personal estate. That being the provision, one understands the meaning of the words that follow:—"No donation or bequest unto or in trust for any such charity as last aforesaid of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, and which may be legally applied by the governing or managing body of such charity as income in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, shall be subject to the jurisdiction or control of the said board." That is how the clause of the Act stands, and in a case in which this corporation were plaintiffs and Sutton and others defendants, Lord Romilly (27 Beav., at p. 663) says: "It is clear from the language that a donation or bequest would be an endowment, but if invested the income arising from it would be exempted from the control of the board, unless, to use the words of the Act, there was a 'special application or appropriation,' that is to say, an appropriation to some specific, as distinct from the general, purpose and object of the association. My opinion, therefore, founded on the consideration of this section, taken by itself alone, is that the word 'endowment' has reference to an endowment made for some specific or particular purpose or trust. I use the words 'specific or particular purpose or trust' advisedly, because a gift of a sum of money to the corporation simpliciter, or a gift in trust for the furtherance of the subjects and purposes for which the corporation was established would be various ways of accomplishing the same end—namely, making a donation to the corporation itself." Just in the same way a donation or conveyance of land would be precisely the same thing as the donation of a large sum of cash or Consols or other securities. Then, at p. 664, Lord Romilly adds: "What words would amount to and constitute a particular and specific trust so as to bring a bequest or donation within the meaning of the word 'endowment,' according to the sense in which it appears to have been used in this section, taken alone, it is not necessary for the present purpose to consider, as no such question arises. When it does the court must determine it." Then, a little further on, he says that the only way in which sections 62 and 66 can be reconciled is "to retain the interpretation I have already given to the word endowment in section 62—viz., the devotion of property to a specific and particular trust, and to give it the same meaning in section 66 (the interpretation clause), that is, to hold that the meaning of this clause is not to enact that the possession by any charity of any property of the various kinds there enumerated constitutes an endowment, but that property of all classes and character there specified may be made the subject of endowment; and therefore land, money, every species of real and personal property whatsoever, including even personal chattels, provided any such were, either by the will of the donor or otherwise, impressed with a particular and specific trust, may be made the subject of endowment in favour of the charity." In that case Lord Romilly did not decide what the meaning of a particular and specific trust is, and I do not pretend to give any precise definition of it. But I find in the very deed of 1717 by which the land was conveyed to the corporation an instance of such a trust, because after the first two life estates the property is limited "to the use of Elizabeth Bayley for her life, she paying throughout a yearly sum of £10 for the support of poor charity children of the parish of All Hallows, Lombard-street, London." That clearly is a "particular and specific trust," but when we come to the remainder, which is "to the only proper use and behoof of the corporation and their successors for ever," that clearly is not a "particular and specific trust" of any kind. It is a gift to the corporation out and out, in terms which would, if they were not a charitable corporation, enable them to apply the property for any lawful purpose just as they could apply subscriptions, but being a charitable corporation it means that they are the owners of the property in fee for the purpose of the charity which they have to administer.

It has been suggested that this land could not be applied as income in aid of the voluntary subscriptions. I do not see the force of that observation. Personal estate might not be so either, and by their charter this corporation have power to deal with, not only real estate but personal estate, and not only cash, but goods, chattels, and things whatsoever aforesaid, "and those goods, chattels, and things" might be things which could not without conversion in some way or sale, be applied in aid of the income by voluntary subscriptions. So far, therefore, as the Act of 1853 goes it seems to me that this corporation is clearly exempted from the operation of that Act. Then I have to turn to the second Act of 1855, the 29th section of which says: [His lordship preceded to read the section]. No doubt, as Vice-Chancellor Bacon pointed out, if we had merely to consider the earlier Act and the 29th section of the later Act, there would be nice questions to be decided as to how far the provisions of the 29th section of the later Act had superseded or got rid of the 62nd section of the earlier Act. But there is the 48th section of the later Act. [His lordship read section 48.] Now the words in section 29 were charity estate, and section 48 says what meaning is to attach to the word charity. It is not to include a charity which is expressly exempted from the Act of 1853. In my opinion this corporation is exempted by the Act of 1853, and by virtue of section 48 of the Act of 1855, section 29 of the 1855 Act, is prevented from having any application to this case. The words in section 48, "shall not include any charity or institution exempted from the operation of the Act of 1853," in my opinion mean not merely a charity or institution wholly exempted, as relating, for instance, to voluntary contributions, but it expressly applies to any charity or institution expressly exempted in part from the operation of the Act. It applies to it in so far as the Act of 1853 exempts it from its operation.

The result is, that in my opinion the Act of 1855 make no difference. We are, therefore, thrown back on the Act of 1853, and under the Act of 1853 the consent of the Charity Commissioners is not necessary to a sale by this charity.

There will be a declaration that, the court being of opinion that the corporation can sell and convey the above-mentioned hereditaments without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, and that a good title has been shown, &c., the costs of the application must be paid by the purchaser, and there will be interest on the purchase-money in the usual way.

Solicitors, Maudes & Tunnicliffe, for Marsh & Sons, Rotherham; Bridges, Sawtell, & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) — Feb. 1.

SMITH, Appellant.
LEGG, Respondent. (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Notice by district surveyor — Alteration after building completed — Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 45, 46, 105.

Under section 45 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, a district surveyor has power to give to a builder engaged in erecting a building, notice requiring alterations to be made in the work, and by section 46 a justice of the peace may order a builder to comply with the requisitions of the notice.

Held, that, where the notice is not served on the builder until after the building is completed, the builder cannot be ordered to comply with the notice.

Special case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

The appellant, who was a builder, was employed in January, 1892, by one Tappin to erect for him a structure which was a building within the meaning of the Metropolitan Building Acts. The appellant erected the building and completed it in March, 1892, and after that date ceased to perform any work upon it. The respondent was the district surveyor under the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, for the district of West Hackney, within which the building was situate. The appellant did not give to the respondent the notice required by section 38 of that Act. The respondent did not discover that the building had been erected until April, 1892. On the 22nd of July, 1892, the respondent gave the appellant a notice under section 45 of the Act requiring him to make certain alterations in the building. The appellant, not having complied with the notice, was summoned before a metropolitan magistrate, who made an order that the appellant should comply with the notice, but on the application of the appellant the magistrate stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Section 45 of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, is as follows:—In the following cases, that is to say, if in erecting any building, or in doing any work to, in, or upon any building, anything is done contrary to any of the rules of this Act, or anything required by this Act is omitted to be done; or in cases where due notice has not been given—if the district surveyor on surveying or inspecting any building or work finds that the same is so far advanced that he cannot ascertain whether anything has been done contrary to the rules of this Act, or whether anything required by the rules of this Act has been omitted to be done: in every such case the district surveyor shall give to the builder engaged in erecting such building or in doing such work notice in writing requiring such builder within 48 hours from the date of such notice to cause anything done contrary to the rules of this Act to be amended, or to do anything required to be done by the rules of this Act but which has been omitted to be done, or to cause so much of any building or work as prevents such district surveyor from ascertaining whether anything has been done or omitted to be done as aforesaid to be, to a sufficient extent, cut into, laid open, or pulled down.

By section 46, on non-compliance with such order, a builder may be ordered by a justice of the peace to comply with the requisitions of the notice.

Section 105.—In case where any building has been erected or work done without due notice being given to the district surveyor, the district surveyor may at any time within one month after he has discovered that such building has been erected or work done, enter the premises for the purpose of seeing that the regulations of this Act have been complied with, and the time during which the district surveyor may take any proceeding or do anything authorized or required by this Act to be done by him in respect of such building or work shall begin to run from the date of his discovering that such building has been erected or work done.

F. Low (Macmorran with him), for the appellant, contended that the district surveyor had no power to give notice under section 45 in the case of a building which had been completed.

He referred to Parsons v. Timewell, 44 J. P. 296.

Daldy, for the respondent.—The case is covered by section 105 which applies to cases such as this in which no notice has been given by the builder to the district surveyor. The fact that the building was completed before the surveyor gave the notice to the builder does not affect the application of section 105.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case a building has been erected, and I will assume for the purpose of the argument that the building was of such a character that if notice had been given in time the builder might have been ordered to stop the work or to pull the building down. The building was completed, however, before any notice was given, and apparently before the surveyor was aware of its erection or that the Act had been infringed. The surveyor thereupon gives the builder a notice under section 45 of the Metropolis Building Act, 1855, which would have been an effective notice if it had been given in time. The magistrate made an order in the terms of the notice. It is suggested that the magistrate was right in making the order on the ground that the 105th section of the Act enables a surveyor to enter a building after it has been erected and see whether the Act of Parliament has been complied with, and if it has not, to take such proceedings as the Act justifies him in taking; and the section further provides that the time for taking these proceedings shall be within a month of his discovery of the breach of the Act, apparently whenever that discovery takes place. The first observation which arises upon that section is this, that he is to take proceedings. Therefore we must ascertain what proceedings he could have taken, supposing he had been in time. That throws us back upon the 45th and 46th sections, and the proceedings authorized by those sections are proceedings against a person, either an owner or builder, while the building is in course of erection. During that time either the builder is responsible, and can be ordered to alter the work, or the owner who has employed the builder is responsible, and can interfere with his builder, and the provisions of the Act of Parliament can be complied with. But the condition precedent to the whole of that portion of the Act is that there should be a house or building in course of erection.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case there was no house or building in course of erection, and to hold that the 45th section applies in such a case as this would be to hold that even if the building has been completed by the builder, paid for by the owner, sold by him, and perhaps resold, the surveyor may order that the building should be pulled down without making any compensation. That is a strong proposition, but it does not exhaust the difficulty. The order requiring the building to be altered so as to comply with the Act is to be made upon the builder. The builder may have retired from business, is it to be supposed that he is to be compelled to return to business for the purpose of correcting some defect in a building which may have been erected a long time ago.? The builder may have died, what is to happen then? are his executors or administrators to be called upon to pull down a building after their testator is dead? Mr. Daldy is obliged to admit that such a case as I have put must be within the construction of this Act which he contends for, and his only answer is that such a contingency would not happen often; but if it can ever happen, it is a matter which we must take into account in construing the Act of Parliament, and we cannot take into consideration how often or how seldom a thing might happen. If Mr. Daldy's contention is correct we should be driven to suppose that Parliament deliberately intended to enact this, outrage I might almost term it, upon justice, good sense, and the laws of property. I think that it would be most unreasonable to suppose that Parliament intended anything of the kind. But there is also authority to support my view of these sections of the Act, namely, the case of Parsons v. Timewell. In that case Lush, J., said: "I think that the three sections, 45, 46, and 47, of the Metropolis Building Act, 1855, all go together, and only apply to a building in course of erection." That is distinct authority against Mr. Daldy's contention, but even without that authority we should have come to exactly the same conclusion, although that authority strengthens us in our conclusion. I am therefore of opinion that the magistrate was wrong.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is an extremely clear case. Section 45 provides that "in cases where due notice has not been given" the district surveyor shall give to the builder engaged in erecting such building notice in writing requiring him to make any necessary alterations. The notice of the surveyor is not to be given to the builder who omitted to give the notice, but to the builder engaged in erecting the building. It therefore may happen, where the original builder has been discharged, or died, or become a bankrupt, that this notice is given to a man who is not in the slightest degree responsible for the original failure to give the notice; but it is given to him because he is in the position to put matters right.

I should have thought that that enactment was quite clear, but it is suggested that section 105, which contains certain provisions as to limitations of time, enables us to put an unnatural sense, and a sense productive of very great injustice, upon the words of section 45. All that section 105 provides is that where a building has been erected or work done without due notice, the surveyor may, within any time within one month after such discovery, enter the premises to see whether the regulations have been complied with, and the time during which he may take any proceedings authorized or required by this Act to be done by him shall be taken to run from the date of his discovery that such building has been erected or work done. It only says that the time from which he shall take those proceedings shall begin to run from the time he makes the discovery. If when he makes the discovery the building is still going on, and the builder is engaged in erecting the building or doing work upon it, then section 45 comes into operation, and he may make this application accordingly against the builder who is so engaged or so employed, although, as I have said, he was not the builder who made the default in giving notice. But to say that section 105 has no application unless it can be read as against the builder who was engaged in building after he had ceased to be so engaged is nonsense. The section is a perfectly good section in many instances, without reverting to anything so unjust and monstrous as that. Suppose two or three builders have been engaged in the course of construction, owing, as I put it just now, to death or bankruptcy, which of them is the district surveyor to proceed against? Is he at liberty to make his choice and take any one of the three? Or, as my lord put it, may he go after the man who had retired, although he had nothing whatever to do with the original default? Can he compel him to return to business and engage workmen to commit a trespass upon the property of a person who may not be the person for whom the works were done, but who may be a subsequent purchaser and commit an outrageous trespass upon this man's property, and pull down the building which he has paid for, which somebody else erected, and with regard to which he has been in no default whatever, and that without any compensation at all to him? Anything more unjust it would be difficult to conceive. In my opinion the magistrate was clearly wrong in the conclusion he came to, and the appeal must be allowed.

Order quashed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. T. Ricketts.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. A. Blaxland.

Court of Appeal.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.)

March 17, 28.

Ex parte HUGHES.
In re HUGHES. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Assignment of property to trustees for creditors generally—Exception of leaseholds—Declaration of trust of leaseholds—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a).

Section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy "if, in England or elsewhere, he makes a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally."

A debtor executed a deed by which he conveyed and assigned all his property, with the exception of his leasehold property, to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally. The deed contained a declaration that the debtor should stand possessed of all leaseholds and leasehold interests in trust for and to convey and assure the same as the trustees should from time to time direct. The value of the leaseholds was about one-quarter of the value of the whole property of the debtor.

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting) (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that the execution of the deed was an act of bankruptcy within section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman, 38 W. R. 368, 24 Q. B. D. 728, distinguished.

Appeal of Hughes, the debtor, from an order of a divisional court, confirming a receiving order in bankruptcy which had been made against him by the judge of the Swansea County Court.

The act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition on which the receiving order was made was that the debtor had executed a deed which was a conveyance or assignment of his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. By the deed in question, after reciting that the debtor was jointly and truly indebted to the persons and firms therein mentioned, who were creditors of the debtor, in the several sums of money set opposite their names in the schedule, and that the debtor had proposed and agreed to convey and assign all and singular his property and effects, unto the trustees upon the trusts specified, the debtor conveyed all his freehold and copyhold, but not leasehold, lands and hereditaments, and assigned all his stock-in-trade, goods, and chattels to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of the creditors. With regard to the leasehold property of the debtor the deed contained the following provision:—

"Provided always, and it is hereby declared, that the debtor shall stand possessed of all leaseholds and leasehold interests in trust for and to convey and assure the same as the trustees shall, from time to time direct." The value of the whole of the debtor's property was £3,625, that of the leaseholds alone being £925.

The Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Henn Collins, JJ.) were of opinion that the execution of the deed amounted to an act of bankruptcy, and upheld the decision of the county court judge.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. Cooper Willis, for the appellant.—The execution of this deed by the debtor did not amount to an act of bankruptcy. In Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman, 38 W. R. 368, 24 Q. B. D. 728, it was held that, in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy under section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, there must be a conveyance or assignment, in the ordinary sense, of substantially the whole of the debtor's property. In the present case the value of the whole property is £3,625, the value of the leasehold property, which is excluded from the assignment, being £925. The assignment, therefore, is not of substantially the whole property. Further it was laid down in Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman, that a declaration of trust is not an assignment within the section.

Ex parte Bourne, 16 Ves. 145; Ex parte Luckis, In re Wood, 20 W. R. 403, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 302, were also referred to.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Cluer, for the respondent.—Although this deed may not, technically speaking, be an assignment as regards the leaseholds, still it is clear from the recital in the deed that the intention of the debtor was to divest himself of all his property so far as it was in his power to do so, and the deed carries out that intention. The debtor has conveyed and assigned all his property that was capable of being conveyed or assigned, and with regard to the remainder, the leaseholds, he has so dealt with them that the property in them is no longer left in him.

They referred to Young v. Fletcher, 13 W. R. 722.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—The judgment of Lord ESHER, M.R. (which was read by LINDLEY, L.J.), was as follows:—In Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman the court thought itself bound, in the first place, to construe section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and then to apply it to the facts of the case. The court first determined the rule of construction, and held that it was to be a rule of strict construction, because it dealt with an enactment casting an incapacity of managing his own affairs upon the person to be declared a bankrupt. As a result of this rule of construction the court held that the words "conveyance or assignment" of the debtor's property must be confined to such an act as in ordinary legal language would amount to an assignment or conveyance of the property dealt with, and that a contract or covenant to deal with property in a particular way, or a declaration of trust affecting property in a particular way, are not in ordinary legal language a conveyance or assignment of that property. This construction of the section was the foundation of the judgment elaborately reasoned by Fry, L.J., and clearly stated, I think, by Lopes, L.J., and myself. It was further stated, or was the necessary result of the rule of construction relied on, that the whole of the debtor's property must be dealt with by such an assignment or conveyance as was described in the judgments. I cannot retract from the rule of construction, or the consequent construction of the section, determined in that case. Applying them to the present case, it seems to me that, although a part of the property of the debtor was, within the meaning of the section, "assigned or conveyed," yet that a material, substantial part was not so assigned or conveyed, and, therefore, that the only act of bankruptcy relied upon before us to support the receiving order was not made out. It is not enough to say that the debtor dealt with the whole of his property; it is necessary to make out that he dealt with the whole of it by assigning or conveying the whole of it. I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

(a) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment, in which, after referring to section 4, sub-section 1 (a), and to the provisions of the deed, he said:—The only question is whether this deed is a "conveyance or assignment" of the debtor's property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally. The appellant contends that it is not, because the leaseholds are not conveyed or assigned, and he relies on Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman as an authority in his favour. I will first consider the question apart from that authority, and I will then examine the authority itself. The statute speaks of a conveyance or an assignment to trustees, and those words have to be applied to all kinds of property. What is their meaning when applied to property, which in practice is seldom, if ever, conveyed or assigned to trustees in the strict technical sense? Are the words to be construed as extending to and as including the various methods of dealing with such property to which conveyancers usually have recourse, although such methods are not conveyances or assignments in the proper sense of those terms? Or are the words in question to be construed strictly in their proper sense, so as to exclude their equivalents in a business point of view? I cannot think the latter can be their proper construction. In order to protect trustees from the burdens which would be imposed on them by an assignment of leaseholds, conveyancers seldom, if ever, assign leaseholds to trustees. They have recourse to a declaration of trust, instead of an assignment. The same mode of dealing with them is adopted when leaseholds cannot be assigned without the licence of the lessor, and his licence cannot readily be procured. Any conveyancer, instructed to prepare a conveyance or assignment by a debtor of all his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, would draw the deed in the form most appropriate to the various kinds of property to which the deed was intended to apply. A properly drawn deed for such a purpose would contain a grant of the debtor's freehold property, a covenant to surrender his copyhold property (if he had any), an assignment of his debts, stocks, funds, and securities, and a covenant or trust binding him to deal with his onerous property—i.e., his leaseholds and shares liable to calls—as the trustees should direct. Such a deed in such a form would, in my opinion, clearly be in ordinary legal parlance a conveyance or assignment by the debtor of his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, although, if its various parts were analyzed, it would be found that the legal estate in some of the property still remained in the debtor. I cannot entertain a doubt that such a deed in such a form would answer the description of a "conveyance or assignment" within the true meaning of those words as used in section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Nor can I entertain a doubt that the deed executed by the debtor in this case is a conveyance or assignment within that clause of the statute.

But then it is said that Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman is inconsistent with this view. I cannot so regard it. In that case there was nothing whatever which, by any stretch of imagination, could be regarded as a conveyance or an assignment in any sense whatever. An attempt was made to spell out of some correspondence a trust for creditors, and the court held that, if there was enough to create such a trust, yet there was no such conveyance or assignment as was contemplated by section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The court was not considering the meaning of conveyance or assignment as applied to leasehold property, and although there were some observations to the effect that a mere declaration of trust is not a conveyance or assignment within the meaning of the enactment in question, I cannot think that those observations were intended to apply, or ought to be treated as applying, to a formal conveyance or assignment by a debtor of all his property, except leaseholds, to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, and a covenant or declaration of trust by which his leaseholds are to be held and disposed of for their benefit also. The decision itself was, in my opinion, quite right, but to decide that this deed is not an act of bankruptcy, and to hold that Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman compels the court so to decide, would, in my opinion, be quite wrong. I have purposely hitherto refrained from alluding to the law as it stood before 1869. But it is clear that the execution by the trader of such a deed as this would have been an act of bankruptcy by him before 1869. In the Bankruptcy Act of that year a section was introduced similar in terms to section 4, sub-section 1 (a), in the present Act, and from 1869 to the present time the execution of such a deed as the present was always regarded as an act of bankruptcy: see Ex parte Wood. I regard the present appeal as an experiment, made to induce the court to hold that a deed, which has been regarded as an act of bankruptcy ever since bankruptcy laws have existed, is not to be so regarded any longer. I can find no trace of any intention to alter the law to this extent. The experiment has very likely been encouraged by some of the observations in Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman, which was decided in 1890, but, in my opinion, the experiment ought to fail. The appeal ought, I think, to be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—This case is distinguishable fron Ex parte Foley, In re Spackman. There was in that case no instrument under seal, no "conveyance," no "assignment," in any sense of those words; here there is an instrument under seal, there is an "assignment." But there are observations in that case, to which I was a party, which, it is said, were unnecessary for the decision of that case, and which go too far. It is said that those observations put too strict an interpretation on the words "conveyance" and "assignment." After a very careful consideration of the matter, I have come to the conclusion that the court in that case did put too strict, too narrow an interpretation upon those words. I think they ought to be construed with reference to the particular property to be dealt with and by the light of the language and practice of conveyancers. If instructions were given to a competent conveyancer to convey and assign all the property of this debtor to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, part of that property being leaseholds subject to onerous covenants, and subject to a provision against assignment without the licence of the landlord, he would prepare an instrument similar to the deed in the present case, which he would call an assignment. If we were to hold this document not to be an "assignment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, we should be holding that a deed in the most effectual manner denuding, and intended to denude, the debtor of all his property was not an act of bankruptcy. This would be a reaction on the bankruptcy law, which I cannot think was contemplated by the Legisture. A conveyance of all the property of a debtor to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally has always been held to be an act of bankruptcy within words of former Acts equivalent to sub-section 1 (b) of this section 4. It was said that although in so doing the debtor did not intend to defeat or delay his creditors, yet, it being the necessary consequence of his act, he must in law be taken to have intended it.

He was depriving himself of the power of carrying on his trade, and was putting his property into a course of distribution different from that which would take place under the bankruptcy law. I think it was to get rid of this somewhat forced inference that the mere conveyance or assignment of all the property of a debtor to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors generally was made an independent act of bankruptcy. I cannot think it was intended to alter the law to the extent that it would be altered if a debtor was permitted by deed to divest himself of all his property in the most effectual way, having regard to the nature of the property, and still not bring himself within the bankruptcy law. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Thomas Metcalfe & Sharpe, for Leyson, Swansea.

Solicitors for the respondent, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Fisher, Jesson, & Wilkins, Ashby-de-la-Zouch.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley, Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) March 28.

In re PARSONS AND FURBER'S BILL OF SALE. (a.)

Bill of sale—Re-registration—Accidental omission to re-register—Extension of time—Bankruptcy of grantor supervening—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 11, 14.

Under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, the court will not rectify an accidental omission to re-register a bill of sale by extending the time to re-register, as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the grantor, where the bankruptcy has intervened between the lapsing of the original registration and the application for extension of time.

Crew v. Cummings, 36 W. R. 908, 21 Q. B. D. 420, followed.

In re Dobbin, 56 L. J. Q. B. 295, 35 W. R. Dig. 33, not followed.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J.) affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J.).

The question was whether, in the case of accidental omission by the assignee of a bill of sale to re-register it at the proper time, extension of time could be allowed, the bankruptcy of the grantor having supervened.

In 1887 a bill of sale for £1,500 was given by one Parsons, and was duly registered. The following year it was assigned for value to one Furber. By accident it was not re-registered, as it required to be, in June, 1892, by virtue of section 11 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

Subsequently to June, 1892, a petition in bankruptcy was presented against Parsons; on the 8th of December a receiving order was made against him, and on the 28th he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and an order was made under section 121 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for the summary administration of his estate.

On the 9th of January, 1893, application was made in chambers on behalf of the holder of the bill of sale for extension of time for re-registration, and on the 11th the judge made an order extending the time, and the usual words making the order subject to any rights which had intervened were struck out. Subsequently the judge, on his attention being called to Crew v. Cummings, 36 W. R. 908, 21 Q. B. D. 420, set aside his order of the 11th of January.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the judge.

The bill of sale holder appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Willes Chitty, for the holder of the bill of sale.—Extension of time and re-registration should be allowed. In re Dobbin, 56 L. J. Q. B. 295, 35 W. R. Dig. 33, applies and settles the question in our favour. If Crew v. Cummings is against us it is distinguishable from the present case. The case of an execution creditor who had seized, as there, is not the same as that of a trustee in bankruptcy who has taken no step at all, as here.

Dickens, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee in bankruptcy, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—By the adjudication of the bankrupt there was a divesting of his property, and a vesting of it in the official receiver. The application to extend the time for re-registration, which is required by section 11 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, has been made under section 1a of that Act. The language of that last-mentioned section is very wide in its terms. It says:—"Any judge of the High Court of Justice, on being satisfied that the omission to register a bill of sale or an affidavit of renewal thereof within the time prescribed by this Act . . . was accidental or due to inadvertence, may, in his discretion, order such omission . . . to be rectified . . . by extending the time for such registration on such terms and conditions (if any) . . . . as he thinks fit." There have been decisions on this section, some of which appear hopelessly conflicting. In In re Dobbin the court rectified an error which made the registration of a bill of sale void, though the grantor had in the meantime become bankrupt. But in Crew v. Cumming the Court of Appeal held that it would not be right, if there were a discretion, to rectify a blunder after some third party had acquired a title. On the authority of that case, by which we feel ourselves bound, and upon the present facts, I think it is too late to extend the time. The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I concur.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—And I.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Richard Furber; Sole, Turner, & Co., for W. C. Cripps, Tunbridge Wells.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) Feb. 2, 3.

LE LIEVRE AND DENNES v. GOULD. (a.)

Negligence — Misrepresentation — Mortgage — Build agreement— Certificate of surveyor—Liability of s veyor for misstatements without fraud on contract Action of deceit.

A builder who was engaged in erecting houses o certain land under a building agreement mortgaged interest under the agreement. The mortgagees advan the mortgage money to him upon the faith of cert certificates given by a surveyor, that certain specified stages in the buildings had been completed. The surveyor was appointed, not by the mortgagees, but by a third party, namely, the vendor under the building agreement, to whom the certificates were made out; there was no contract between him and the mortgagees, and he was unaware of the terms of the mortgage deed. The certificates contained untrue statements, the result of the negligence of the surveyor; but there was no fraud on his part.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

Held, that, in the absence of fraud or a contractual relationship between him and the mortgagees, the surveyor owed no duty to them to exercise care in giving the certificates, and that an action would not lie against him at the suit of the mortgagees for negligence.

Cann v. Wilson, 37 W. R. 23, 39 Ch. D. 39, overruled.

Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, distinguished.

Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, followed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the Divisional Court refusing to set aside the judgment of the official referee.

The material facts were as follows:—

The plaintiff Miss Le Lievre was transferee of a mortgage from Dennes, the other plaintiff, of certain land at Ilfracombe and two houses which were being erected upon it by a builder named Lovering under a building agreement between himself and William Hunt, the owner of the land. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendant, an architect and surveyor, damages for loss which they alleged they had sustained by reason of having made payments on the faith of certain certificates given by him, which were inaccurate and untrue.

Under the building agreement dated the 23rd of August, 1889, Hunt agreed to convey the land in question, subject to a rent-charge, to Lovering upon the erection to the satisfaction of the vendor or his surveyor of two dwelling-houses upon the land by the 24th of June, 1890.

In order to enable Lovering to build the houses, Hunt agreed to procure for him a loan of £850, to be advanced in instalments as per a schedule of advances which was prepared and dated the 21st of November, 1889, and provided that the first instalment of £50 and the remaining ones of £100 each should be advanced at specified stages of the work, and the final one on the completion of the whole work.

The plaintiff Dennes agreed with Hunt to advance the sum of £850 to Lovering, and by agreement between Hunt and the defendant, Gould, it was provided that the latter should give certificates that the work had reached the stages specified in the schedule of advances, with a copy of which the defendant was then provided.

In pursuance of the arrangement between the plaintiff Dennes and Hunt, and after the agreement between Hunt and the defendant, a deed of mortgage of the land comprised in the building agreement, dated the 30th of November, 1889, was executed between the plaintiff Dennes and Lovering. By this mortgage it was provided that the mortgage money could be advanced in such instalments as the mortgagee or his surveyor should from time to time appoint, provided always that the mortgagee should not be bound to make any advance unless and until the surveyor should have certified in writing that the work had been proceeded with to the satisfaction of such surveyor and in conformity with the building agreement, so as to entitle the mortgagor to the advance certified. There were also covenants for repayment with interest, and the land was conveyed subject to redemption on repayment, together with the benefit of the building agreement.

The defendant Gould was not aware of the provisions of this mortgage deed.

An instalment of £50 was, under the mortgage deed, advanced by the plaintiff Dennes to Lovering in December, 1889, and four other instalments of £100 were advanced upon the faith of written certificates made out by the defendant to Hunt, and dated respectively January 30, March 1, April 24, and July 3, 1890, and which declared "that the sum of £100 is due to Wm. Lovering, Ilfracombe, on account of villas in Kingsley-avenue as per schedule of advances."

The plaintiff Dennes, on the 27th of October, 1890, transferred the mortgage to the plaintiff Miss Le Lievre, and she advanced the remainder of the instalments to Lovering upon the faith of similar certificates given by the defendant to Hunt as before.

The statement of claim alleged that in employing the defendant Gould, and in preparing the schedule of advances, Hunt was the agent of the plaintiff Dennes; that the certificates were untrue to the knowledge of the defendant; that even if there was no fraud on his part that he did not use due care, skill, and diligence to ascertain whether the facts certified were or were not true; and that in so giving the certificates the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, and acted in breach of the duty he owed to the plaintiffs.

The defence denied the employment of the defendant by the plaintiff Dennes, or on his behalf, or that the defendant ever undertook any duty towards the plaintiffs, and further denied the charge of fraud, and alleged that the certificates were given bonâ fide, and in the belief that the statements therein contained were true.

At the trial of the action, which was referred to an official referee, it was admitted that the certificates were inaccurate, and that the last certificate, to the effect that the houses were complete, was given upon an assurance of Lovering that the remaining work was to be shortly carried out by a tenant, but which was not done.

The official referee found that Hunt was not the agent of the plaintiffs to employ the defendant to give the certificates; that there was no contractual relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant; and that the defendant had not been guilty of fraud. He held that in point of law the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiffs; that the plaintiffs had no cause of action; and gave judgment for the defendant.

The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the official referee, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the appellants, referred to Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503; Cann v. Wilson, 37 W. R. 23, 39 Ch. D. 39; Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337; Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 114; Crawshay v. Thompson, 4 Man. & G., at p. 382; and Scholes v. Brook, 63 L. T. N. S. 837. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Angus v. Clifford, 39 W. R. 498, [1891] 2 Ch. 449, and Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82.]

The nature of the argument appears sufficiently from the judgments.

Upjohn, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is said that the plaintiffs have proved a cause of action against the defendant Gould. It is said, in support of that, first, that there was a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the terms of which were that the defendant should use reasonable care in giving certificates upon which the plaintiffs' money was paid to ascertain the truth of the facts to which he certified. There is no doubt, if there was a contract between these parties, it was an implied term of that contract that he should use such reasonable care. Secondly, it is said that even if there was no contract between the plaintiffs and Gould, the latter is nevertheless liable in respect of having given these wrong certificates, because he owed a duty to the plaintiffs to exercise care, inasmuch as he knew that the plaintiffs might, or would, act upon them.

Now, as to the first point, it seems to me that there is no evidence of any such contract as alleged, and that in truth there was none. The contract made with the defendant was made by Hunt through Russell, who had the authority of Hunt alone, and made the contract in his name. At that time Dennes was not mortgagee, he had only talked about it, and had no legal or equitable relation to the matter at all. How, then, could he be an undisclosed principal? He was not a principal at all.

We come, therefore, to the second point: have the plaintiffs shown a right of action independent of any such contract? It is clear that the defendant did give certificates which were wrong in point of fact, and did so, carelessly and negligently no doubt. But what duty is there between two people under such circumstances, where there is no contractual relation? A man might act carelessly, if you like with gross negligence, but can the plaintiffs rely on that if there has been no fraud? As affecting the plaintiffs, negligence cannot arise at all until a duty has been established, and what duty is there between persons between whom there is no relation by contract known to the law? Then the plaintiffs seek to rely on the case of Heaven v. Pender, which established that there is a legal relationship between two persons if of so contiguous a character that if one behaves carelessly he may do the other or his property a physical injury, and that there is thus a duty to take resonable care not to impinge upon him or his property so as to cause an injury. If, for instance, a man is driving a cart on Salisbury Plain and there is no one there, he may drive as carelessly as he likes; that would not be negligence. But if he sees some one coming, a duty is at once imposed to take reasonable care not to cause injury. It is that contiguity or neighbourhood which gives rise to the obligation. Now, if the case of Cann v. Wilson stood alone, it would carry this case. But it does not; it is bad law, and the proposition upon which Chitty, J., acted in that case was a wrong one, and was overruled by the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, which restored the law to what it was before Cann v. Wilson. Derry v. Peek re-established that when there is no contract between the parties, no action is maintainable unless there is fraud. If it were otherwise, the necessity of the finding of fraud by the jury in all the class of cases on statements by directors would not arise. And it never was the law that statements by directors, wrong in point of fact, but not fraudulent, were actionable. There is a long line of cases as to that. And when the case of Derry v. Peek was decided in the Court of Appeal, the court seemed to think that there was a distinction between chancery fraud and common law fraud. There is no such distinction; the effect of Derry v. Peek was that fraud in fact is so terrible a thing to charge that it ought not to be charged against a man unless he had an evil mind. It had been the common law rule all along that if a man told a wilful lie intending it to be acted upon, that was fraud all over. There is also another state of things, in which it can be said that a man has a wicked mind, and that is if he makes a statement intending it to be acted upon, but not only not knowing, but reckless as to whether it is true or false; if he says, for instance, "I intend A. to act upon my statement, but I don't know whether it is true or false, and I don't care." That view has been adopted for a long course of years, and if that is so it follows that negligence, however great, is not fraud.

Here the official referee who heard the case came to the conclusion that the defendant, though he acted carelessly, was not guilty of dishonest conduct, and negligently and carelessly to give an incorrect certificate gives no right of action for fraud at law or for deceit in equity, unless it is done with a wicked mind. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will add nothing on the first point. As to the third point, the official referee found no fraud in the sense in which the law understands it—i.e., no dishonest conduct—and that the defendant, though mistaken and careless, was not dishonest. It is therefore impossible that we should allow a new trial in face of that finding unless there were some ground of surprise. The official referee, as it seems to me, at first went wrong, but then recovered himself and decided right in point of law. The second point was the contention which the plaintiffs based upon the case of Cann v. Wilson. They said that although the surveyor was not dishonest, he was grossly negligent, and argued that, assuming he owed a primary duty to his employers and not to the plaintiffs, nevertheless that he knew, or ought to have known, that the certificates he gave would be made the bases of the advances by the plaintiffs, and that, that being so, a duty was thereby established to use care in regard to the mortgagee. Now I think it is not shown that such a duty exists, for Cann v. Wilson was overruled by Derry v. Peek. The latter case decided two things, the first of which was that you could not succeed in an action of fraud without proving that the defendant was fraudulent. It is singular that any doubt should have been cast upon that proposition. But I think there are two reasons which, in some minds, seem to have led to confusion. The first of these is the fact that equity judges have to decide law and fact together, and it often happened that an equity judge decided that there was fraud where gross negligence existed. If such a case had been tried at common law the judge would have pointed out to the jury that gross negligence did not amount to fraud, although it might amount to evidence of fraud if so gross as to be incompatible with the idea of honesty. But those cases piled themselves up until it came to be the idea that gross negligence was fraud. In all those cases, however, fraud and dishonesty was the proper ratio decidendi, and gross negligence was only one of the elements which the judge had to consider in making up his mind whether there had been fraud in the conduct of the defendant.

There also seems to me to be a misapprehension on the part of those who are not conversant with Nisi Prius actions as to the direction which is always given by the judge in an action of fraud—viz., that if the defendant told a thing, knowing it to be untrue, and intending it to be acted upon; or made it, intending it to be acted upon, but not knowing and not caring whether it was true or false, then he would be liable for fraudulent misrepresentation. Now his mind would be wicked in such last-mentioned circumstances, not because he was negligent but because of his wicked indifference to truth. In the first case it is his knowledge of falsehood which makes the fraud; in the second it is his wicked indifference.

Now there seems to have been some idea that when a jury were asked whether the defendant made a statement not knowing and not caring whether it was true or false, that the expression "not caring had something to do with negligence. But "not caring" does not mean not taking the care or trouble to find out, but not caring in his heart and conscience whether the statement was true or false.

The House of Lords in Derry v. Peek said, as common lawyers had always said, that in an action of deceit there must be fraud, and that negligence alone would not do, although in some cases it may have been of such a kind that the probabilities all pointed to fraud. They also said that a negligent misrepresentation can only amount to a cause of action if a duty exists not to be negligent, and in a class of cases of which Derry v. Peek was one the House of Lords thought that no such duty existed. Is there any such duty here? It is said by the plaintiffs that Cann v. Wilson shows that there is. I am not considering whether the law might not be stricter than it is, for we must consider what the law is, not what it might be. Heaven v. Pender and that class of cases have been cited also as showing a duty on the part of the defendant to the plaintiffs. It is as plain as daylight that the owner of a chattel—say a horse, or gun, a chattel of such a character that if it be used carelessly it will injure some one—is bound to be careful. Exactly the same duty exists on the part of the owner of premises, if he knows them to be dangerous, and people come there by his permission, and the reason that the duty is imposed upon him is that he has the conduct of things which he knows people are going and have the right to use. The case of Heaven v. Pender was an instance of that duty. But how can that or any other case, decided under totally different aspects and considerations of law, affect this case, which, if the defendant were held liable, would mean that the issuer of a certificate would be liable for carelessness to any person whom he thought might use it. But that is not the law; a certificate is not like a dangerous instrument, and unless a man who draws one intends to deceive, he cannot in the absence of contract be so liable.

After Cann v. Wilson, which was decided upon a misapprehension of the true effect of Heaven v. Pender, Romer, J., had the case of Scholes v. Brook before him, in which his attention was directed to Derry v. Peek as explained in the case of Angus v. Clifford, and the learned judge said: "Cases have been cited which, it is said, established such a liability. But, apart from Cann v. Wilson, it appears to me that the authorities may be divided into two classes. One of these classes is when one person invites another to come upon his premises, in which case the person giving the invitation must use reasonable care to insure that the condition of the premises does not subject the person invited to danger. Another class is when a person becomes liable for using or leaving about in such a way as to cause danger an instrument which is dangerous in itself. Beyond those two classes, I am not aware for the moment of any circumstances under which a person can be held liable in a case such as that which has been argued before me. But the present case falls within neither of those two classes. An invitation to advance money or to take shares on a valuation or on a prospectus does not, I think, come within the first class, nor can a valuation or a prospectus be considered a dangerous instrument within the meaning of that term as used above by me; and, that being so, I think that, if the plaintiff had not established a contract, this action must have failed, unless I followed Cann v. Wilson; but with reference to that case, after the speeches of the learned lords in Derry v. Peek, I find a difficulty in following it, and I think the case would not have been decided as it was after the judgment of the House of Lords, which, by implication, negatives the existence of any such general rule as laid down in Cann v. Wilson." It is obvious, therefore, that Romer, J., in deciding Scholes v. Brook, put aside the case of Heaven v. Pender in the same way as I have endeavoured, following the Master of the Rolls, to put it aside.

I should not have said so much had it not been for the reappearance of the old misapprehension as to the effect of the decision in Derry v. Peek, for I have myself laid down until I am almost tired of doing so, as I daresay are other judges, what that case did, and what it did not, decide; and the same point I elaborated at length in the cases of Angus v. Clifford and Low v. Bouverie.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In deciding against the plaintiff in this case we must overrule Cann v. Wilson. Now the defendant says, in his defence, that he owes no duty to the plaintiffs unless they can show, which they cannot, that he contracted with them to give the certificate. I think the defendant is right in saying that, unless the plaintiffs can make out a duty. The plaintiffs say, however, that Heaven v. Pender imposed a duty, but that case, as was pointed out by Romer, J., in Scholes v. Brook, applies to a different class of cases, and in my opinion it has no bearing here, so that it will not help the plaintiffs. Here there was clearly no contract proved, and no duty apart from it, therefore no duty was established. But it was still said by the plaintiffs that the defendant negligently made a representation by which they had been injured, and they cite Cann v. Wilson. But that case was decided by Chitty, J., after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Peek v. Derry and before it had been reversed by the House of Lords, and it seems to me that he there based his judgment that an action could be brought upon the ground that the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiffs irrespective of contract, and upon the ground of the defendant having made an untrue misrepresentation recklessly, though not fraudulently, and with the intention that it should be acted upon.

In my opinion, after Derry v. Peek, the decision in Cann v. Wilson can no longer be considered law, and I think that the decision of the Divisional Court in this case was right, and must be affirmed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Todd, Dennes, & Lamb.

Solicitors for the respondents, Woodcock, Ryland, & Parker, for Ffinch & Chanter, Barnstaple.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 30; Dec. 1, 6-8, 10, 13;
Chitty, J. } Feb. 16, 28.

WALLIS v. HANDS, NEWMAN, SCOTT, AND THE DISTRICT OF BRISTOL COLLIERIES CO. (a.)

Lease—Surrender by act and operation of law—Change of possession—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 3—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Interesse termini—Action for damages.

There is no surrender by operation of law of a lease in possession on the grant of a new lease purporting to be a lease in possession, unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents.

The foundation of the doctrine that the acceptance of a new lease by an existing tenant operates as a surrender in law is estoppel by act in pais. The grant of a new lease to a stranger, with the tenant's assent, and change of possession preceding or following the lease, brings such a case within the scope of the same doctrine.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Secus, where there is mere oral assent of the tenant and no change of possession.

An interesse termini is not an interest that will support an action on a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease, the essence of a breach of such a covenant being a disturbance of the lessee's possession, nor will it support an action for trespass or for damages.

Davison v. Gent, 5 W. R. 229, 1 H. & N. 744, considered and applied.

Dictum of Stirling, J., in Baring v. Abingdon, [1892] 2 Ch. 374, at p. 381, explained.

Locke v. Furze, 14 W. R. 403, L. R. 1 C. P. 441, and Gillard v. Cheshire Lines Committee, 32 W. R. 943, distinguished.

Action.

This was an action relating to certain collieries at Mangotsfield, in the county of Gloucester, heard as a witness action. The property had been the subject of numerous and conflicting dealing, the complicated facts relating to which were fully stated and discussed in his lordship's judgment. The following are material for this report.

In 1884 a lease was granted by Newman to Powell and two others for a term of forty-five years from the 24th of June, 1884. It comprised the upper series of coal in Mangotsfield, known as the Parkfield seam, but no other series, lying within a district of some 700 acres. It included also certain surface rights, and was renewable for a further period of 45 years. The lessees took possession under this lease and worked the coal, but their work had come practically to a standstill in or before the beginning of 1887. The means of the lessees were exhausted and the rent was in arrear when the transactions in which the plaintiff took part were begun.

On the 8th of August, 1887, a lease was granted by Newman to the plaintiff for a term of forty-two years from the 24th of June, 1887. It comprised (a) the upper series as in the lease of 1884, (b) the lower series under the same area, (c) the coal in an additional area, and (d) certain machinery and plant then on the property. The royalty reserved was less by a halfpenny than the royalty under the lease of 1884. There were also reserved a dead rent, surface rent, and rent for machinery and plant. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry for non-payment of rent, and for breach of the covenants to work, but no clause dispensing with the necessity of a legal demand for the rent. This lease was granted with the consent of the lessees under the lease of 1884. Such consent was given, but orally only, by their solicitor, acting on their behalf and with their authority, on the occasion of the delivery of his lease to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff had not entered into possession under this lease, nor had he done any working thereunder according to his covenants. The lease of 1884 was not delivered to the plaintiff or to the lessor Newman or his solicitors upon the grant of the the lease of 1887, which latter lease purported to be a lease in possession, but appeared to have remained in the hands of the lessees or their solicitor. This lease of 1884 had been dealt with adversely to the plaintiff as if it were a subsisting lease as follows:—It was assigned by the lessees to the defendant Scott by indenture dated the 13th of February, 1888; and it was assigned by Scott to the defendant company by indenture dated the 30th of May, 1888. It had since the issuing of the writ been reassigned by the defendant company to Scott, in whom it was now vested, if subsisting.

On the 30th of December, 1889, Newman granted to Scott a lease for forty years from the 24th of June, 1889, of the lower series only of the coal lying under the land described in the 1884 lease. On the 31st of December, 1889, Scott granted to Hands an underlease of the coal comprised in the lease of the 30th of December, 1889, reserving a nominal reversion only, and Hands worked coal by virtue of this underlease. On the 30th of December, 1889, Newman entered into an agreement in writing with Scott to grant to him a lease of the additional area comprised in the 1887 lease, so as to make Scott's holding co-extensive with the coal comprised in the 1887 lease. On the same day Scott agreed with Hands to assign or underlet to him this additional area.

The relief claimed by the plaintiff under these circumstances was a declaration that the lease of 1887 was valid, and the plaintiff's title prior to that of any of the defendants; a similar declaration as to another lease of 1885; injunctions to restrain a sale of the property, or any part, and to restrain working of the coal by Hands and the defendant company; and damages as against Newman for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment implied in the lease of 1887, and as against Hands and the company in respect of their working.

Alexander, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the plaintiff.—The grant of the lease of 1887 with the assent of the lessees under the lease of 1884 operated as a surrender of that lease by operation of law, and a deed or note in writing was not required in such a case by the Statute of Frauds. Next, if we establish our title to this lease of 1887, there is nothing to prevent our succeeding on the claims for damages against the defendant Newman on his implied covenant for quiet enjoyment under the lease of 1887, and against the defendant Hands for his working of coal comprised in that lease, whether the lease of 1884 has been surrendered, as we contend, or not, although our interest in the latter case is no more than interesse termini: Gellard v. Cheshire Lines Committee, 32 W. R. 943.

They also referred to Baring v. Abingdon, ante, p. 22, [1892] 2 Ch. 374, at p. 381.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the defendant company.—The plaintiff cannot prevail without getting rid of the lease of 1884. If that lease is subsisting we have it. The authorities on surrender by operation of law fall into two groups. In the first, where surrender prevailed, possession of the property had been given and taken in every single case. In the second, where surrender failed, possession was not so given and taken. Thomas v. Cook, 2 B. & Ald. 119, is the strongest case for the plaintiff. The other cases are Walker v. Richardson, 2 M. & W. 882; Lyon v. Reed, 13 M. & W. 285, where the exact point was raised, showing that the two last named cases are not of general application; Doe d. Huddleston v. Johnston, McCl. & Y. 141; Johnstone v. Hudlestone, 4 B. & C. 922; Davison v. Gent, 5 W. R. 229, 1 H. & N. 744; Nickells v. Atherstone, 10 Q. B. 944; Oastler v. Henderson, 2 Q. B. D. 575, 25 W. R. Dig. 198. The principle of Lyon v. Reed was approved of by Lord St. Leonards in Crespigny v. Blood, 3 Jo. & Lat. 133. Some act of notoriety is wanted to make a surrender by operation of law or the very mischief against which the Statute of Frauds is directed, arises. There is no jurisdiction to make such a declaration of title as is asked for, notwithstanding ord. 25, r. 5.

They referred to the preamble to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 50; and Trustees of Birkenhead Docks v. Laird, 2 W. R. 7, 4 De G. M. & G. at p. 738.

Levett, Q.C., and Pauli, for the defendant Newman.—Possession is necessary to support an action of trespass: Roscoe's Nisi Prius, 16th ed., p. 930. See Harrison v. Blackburn, 13 W. R. 135, 17 C. B. N. S. 678. [They also referred to Co. Litt. 296 b; Lowe v. Ross, 5 Ex. 553; Turner v. Cameron's Coalbrook Steam Coal Co., 5 Ex. 932]. The Court of Appeal in Gillard v. Cheshire Lines Committee did not mean to overrule all these cases, otherwise a man might come under a lease of ninety-nine years in the last year and say I have an interesse termini, and all prior acts were acts of trespass. Then a man cannot sue for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment where no enjoyment is proved: see Bullen and Leake's Pleadings, 3rd ed., p. 206, and Coe v. Clay, 5 Bing. 440.

Webster and T. Lee Roberts, for the defendants Hands and Scott respectively.

Alexander, Q.C., in reply.—None of the cases say that change of possession is essential for surrender by operation of law. The action is well brought for a declaration of title alone, as is shown by ord. 25, r. 5, in connection with the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24 (7), and Forms, Appendix A, pt. 3, s. 4: Annual Practice, 1893, vol. 2, p. 22. See also Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, ante, p. 322, [1893] 1 Q. B. 142. We could not have safely brought an action for recovery of land. [CHITTY, J., referred to Gledhill v. Hunter, 28 W. R. 530, 14 Ch. D. 492.] This is a case for the court to exercise its discretion and make the declarations that we ask: see Evans v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 328, 36 Ch. D. 626, at p. 640. Next, the owner of an interesse termini can maintain an action on the case for any damage done to the property. This is not an action in trespass. Lastly, he may sue for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment: Lock v. Furze, 14 W. R. 403, L. R. 1 C. P. 441.

16th Feb.—CHITTY, J.—[His lordship, after stating the facts and deciding an issue of fraud, raised against the plaintiff by certain of the defendants, against such defendants, and in favour of the plaintiff, continued:—] The next point raised by the defendant Newman against the lease of 1887 was that it had been determined by re-entry in April, 1888, under the provision for non-payment of rent. But it was admitted that no legal demand had been made for the rent, and this point was abandoned.

The next question is whether the lease of 1884 has, as the plaintiff contends, been surrendered by operation of law.

The plaintiff has never been in possession of the property demised by the lease of 1887. Consequently, as between the lessees of 1884 and those claiming under them, on the one hand, and the plaintiff on the other, there has been no change of possession. In these circumstances, it is contended for the plaintiff, as a proposition of law, that the grant of a new lease in possession with the oral assent merely of a person in possession under a prior subsisting lease operates as a surrender in law of the prior lease, and consequently that such grant and mere oral assent are sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the 3rd section of the Statute of Frauds, which enacts that no lease shall be surrendered unless by deed or note in writing or by act and operation of law.

The third section of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, avoids a surrender in writing unless made by deed, except in cases where the lease itself might have been created without a deed. The lease of 1884 required a deed for its creation.

All the authorities bearing on the question of surrender by operation of law were cited and commented on at the bar. The question again raises the controversy which subsisted at one time between the Courts of King's Bench and the Exchequer, illustrated by Thomas v. Cook and Lyon v. Reed, and discussed at length in 2 Smith's L. C., p. 884 et seq., 8th ed., p. 923 et seq., 9th ed. But it appears to me that this controversy was, so far as concerns the question before me, set at rest by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Davison v. Gent. In Thomas v. Cook there was in fact a change of possession, the old tenant Cook having gone out of possession when the plaintiff accepted Perkes as his tenant (see the observations of Lord St. Leonards in Creagh v. Blood, 3 Jo. & Lat. 160).

In his judgment in Davison v. Gent Pollock, C.B., states the law thus:—"It must therefore be taken to be established that where a lessee assents to a lease being granted to another, and gives up his own possession to the new lessee, that is a surrender by operation of law." This statement appears to me not to be qualified by any subsequent expressions in the same judgment. It substantially reconciles Thomas v. Cook with the principles enumerated by Parke, B., in Lyon v. Reed, so far as relates to leases in possession. It is not, perhaps, of any great practical importance in which of the two following ways the proposition of law is stated, viz.:—(1) There is no surrender by operation of law unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents; or (2) the change of possession is a necessary part of the consent. I prefer, however, the first as being the more correct form. To hold that mere oral assent to the new lease operates as a surrender in law would be a most dangerous doctrine; it would practically amount to a repeal of the Statute of Frauds, and let in all the mischief against which the statute was intended to guard.

The policy of that statute is carried still further by the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, which requires a deed in cases where formerly a mere writing would have sufficed. The foundation of the doctrine that the acceptance of a new lease by an existing tenant operates as a surrender in law is estoppel by act in pais, the law attributing the force of estoppel to certain acts of notoriety, such as livery of seisin, entry, acceptance of an estate, and the like; and the grant of a new lease to a stranger with the tenant's assent and change of possession preceding or following the lease bring such a case within the scope of the same doctrine, which mere oral assent would not do (see Shelford's Real Property Statutes, by Carson, 9th ed., p. 258).

The plaintiff's counsel relied on a dictum of Stirling, J., in Baring v. Abingdon, that the granting of a new lease to a stranger with the assent of the lessee operates as a surrender of the old lease. But on the facts of the case it appears that there there was a change of possession; the learned judge himself refers to Davison v. Gent, and I have his authority for stating that he did not intend to express any opinion on the point whether a change of possession was necessary. For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the lease of 1884 was not surrendered by operation of law.

The plaintiff claims damages against the defendant Newman for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment implied in the lease of 1887. Such an implied covenant is, generally speaking, an unqualified covenant, but extends only to lawful interruptions. The dealings by Newman in December, 1889, and any entry thereunder are not relied upon by the plaintiff as breaches of the implied covenant, because, according to the plaintiff's case, they are unlawful as against him, claiming, as he does, under the prior lease of 1887.

The alleged breach arises, as I understand the argument for the plaintiff, upon the lease of 1884. The mere fact of the existence of that lease is of itself no breach. The plaintiff was aware of the existence of this lease when he accepted the lease of 1887, and had taken his own measures, though ineffectual, for protecting himself against claims under the lease of 1884. It may be questioned whether, in these circumstances, the implied covenant would extend to disturbances by virtue of the lease of 1884: see 9 Bythewood, 3rd ed., p. 381, and Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., p. 886; and see also Birmingham, Dudley, and District Railway Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295, on the analogous case of an implied grant of light. The question, however, was not argued, and I pass it by. I rest my decision on the following grounds:—First, on the facts which show that the negotiations which resulted in the grant of the lease of 1887 were conducted throughout on the footing that, as between the plaintiff and the defendant Newman, the plaintiff should buy up from the lessees the lease of 1884. I think that there was an implied agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant Newman that the plaintiff should make his own terms with the lessees. This being so, the plaintiff cannot set up claims under the 1884 lease as breaches of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. Secondly, the essence of a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease appears to me to be a disturbance of the lessee's possession: see Sanderson v. The Mayor of Berwick, 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547. There has been no disturbance of possession. The plaintiff has merely an interesse termini under the lease of 1887; he has not only never been in possession of the property comprised in that lease, but there is no evidence of his ever having even attempted to take possession or having required Newman to put him in possession.

The law provides a person having an interesse termini with an adequate remedy against the grantor of the term without there being any necessity to have recourse to an action on the covenant for quiet enjoyment; he can bring an action against the grantor of the term for not putting him in possession: see Coe v. Clay and Jinks v. Edwards, 4 W. R. 303, 11 Exch. 775. This right of action is also founded on implied covenant. The present action is not to enforce any such right, nor are there any facts proved which would give rise to it. Although the authorities have been searched through by counsel, none can be produced to show that a person having a mere interesse termini can maintain an action on a covenant for quiet enjoyment. In Locke v. Furze, which was cited as the nearest authority on the point, the plaintiff was in possession when the lease, originally reversionary, but then possessory, was avoided by title paramount; and he remained in possession for a short period (some twenty days) during the currency of the term granted by the avoided lease upon the covenant in which the action was brought. It is, consequently, no authority on the point. [His lordship next decided that the plaintiff could not succeed on his claim in the action for damages against the defendant company, and then continued:—]

Thirdly, the plaintiff claims damages against Hands in respect of his working. The plaintiff's allegation against Hands is that he was working coal comprised in the lease of 1887 without specifying from what part of the property the coal has been worked. Hands, by his silence in his defence, admits this paragraph. Having but an interesse termini under the 1887 lease, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action of trespass against Hands on his title under that lease. His proper course, as against Hands, was to bring an action to recover possession. It is settled law that a person having a mere interesse termini cannot bring an action of trespass: see Harrison v. Blackburn, 13 W. R. 135, 17 C. B. N. S. 678, at p. 691; and Turner v. Cameron's Coalbrook Steam Coal Co.; and Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, p. 197, 13th ed., p. 205, 14th ed. This is in substance an action of trespass. The plaintiff's counsel, however, cited the decision of the Court of Appeal in Gillard v. Cheshire Lines Committee. The court there held that a person having a mere interesse termini could maintain an action for injury to his right. The cases on trespass, though not cited, were, of course, present to the minds of the members of the court who so held; there was no intention to overrule them, either directly or indirectly. The circumstances, shortly stated, were that the plaintiff had agreed to take a theatre for eight weeks to commence on a future day. Before his right of entry accrued the defendants, who were strangers, by excavations on their own property, deprived the theatre of the support of the adjacent land so that the theatre was rendered unsafe, and was closed during the eight weeks by the proper authorities. The judgment turned on the proposition that the defendants had injured the plaintiff's proprietary rights. While accepting that decision, as I am bound to do, without question, I think that it does not apply to the facts of this case. The plaintiff has deliberately refrained from exercising his right of entry under his voidable lease of 1887. I think that he is not entitled to any damages; if I thought otherwise, I should assess them at a mere nominal sum.

The reasons upon which I refuse to give the plaintiff damages are sufficient, and more than sufficient, to justify my refusing to grant an injunction.

The right order will be to give the plaintiff declarations on the two points on which he succeeds, and to dismiss the rest of the action. The declarations will be: (1) that the lease of the 8th of August, 1887, was not obtained by fraud on the part of the plaintiff, and (2) that the same was not duly determined in April, 1888, by re-entry by the defendant Newman by virtue of the condition for re-entry contained in the lease.

The right order as to costs is to give no costs except that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the defendant company, against whom he has altogether failed.

Feb. 28.—The case was mentioned this day, and, it being intimated that there might be further litigation between the parties, his lordship said that the order must be expressed to be without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to bring an action to recover possession, and must further declare that the lease of 1884 was not surrendered by act and operation of law, or otherwise, and that the plaintiff had no title either at law or in equity to that lease.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Whites & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant Newman, Prior, Church, & Adams, for Meade-King & Bigg, Bristol.

Solicitor for the defendant Hands, John Hands.

Solicitors for the defendant Scott, Learoyd, James, & Mellor, for W. J. Nicholas, Bristol.

Solicitors for the company, Greenop & Sons.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } Jan. 26, 31; Feb. 25.

CHRISTIE v. TAUNTON, DELMARD, LANE, & CO. (LIMITED).

In re TAUNTON, DELMARD, LANE, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Debenture—Equitable assignment—Calls prior and subsequent to winding up—Set-off—Companies Act, 1862, s. 75.

T., who was the registered holder of debentures in a company, in March, 1890, deposited some of them with a bank to secure a debt, and executed a memorandum of deposit and a blank transfer, but no notice was given to the company. These debentures were exchanged for others subsequently issued by the company, and the new debentures were deposited with the bank by T. on the 3rd of September, 1890, who did not execute any fresh memorandum or transfer. None of the new debentures were payable before the 31st of December, 1890.

T. was also holder of ordinary shares in the company, which were not fully paid up, and on the 3rd of November, 1890, a call was made upon the ordinary shares, payable on the 20th of November, 1890, at the bank, who were also the company's bankers. On the 4th of November, 1890, notice of the call was given to the bank, who were authorized to retain the proceeds of the call in payment of an overdraft. On the 6th of November, 1890, the bank gave the company notice of the deposit of T.'s debentures. The bank on the 12th of November, 1890, commenced an action on behalf of the debenture-holders against the company, and on the 19th of November the company went into voluntary liquidation. In the action sufficient assets of the company had been realized to pay the debentures in full, and in the winding up calls had been made on T.'s shares which had not been paid.

Held, that in respect of the call made on the 3rd of November, 1890, the company were entitled to set off the amount of such call against what was due on the debentures; but that, in respect of the calls made in the winding up, they were not entitled to do so. The liability to pay calls did not, under section 75 of the Companies Act, 1862, become a debt due until the winding up commenced, and therefore the case was governed by Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co., 15 W. R. 1107, L. R. 2 C. P. 593.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons in the above-mentioned action, and raised the question whether calls on certain shares in the defendant company could be set off against what was due upon certain debentures.

The company was incorporated under the Companies Acts in January, 1889, the share capital being £125,000 divided into shares of £10 each, some of which were preference and the others ordinary shares. Under the memorandum and articles of association the company had power to borrow or raise money on debentures. Article 13 enabled the directors to make calls, and article 15 provided that such calls should be deemed to be made at the time when a resolution of the directors to that effect was passed.

The company raised money on debentures upon each of which was indorsed a condition (inter alia) that the registered holder for the time being of the debenture should alone be deemed to be entitled to the principal moneys and interest thereby secured, and that the company should not be bound to enter in the register or recognize any trust or equity affecting such debenture or any principal moneys and interest thereby secured. Richard Taunton became entitled to, and the registered holder of, a large number of these debentures. On the 24th and 28th of January and the 5th of March, 1890, he deposited debentures of the nominal value of £5,250 with the Birmingham and Midland Bank by way of security for a debt, and executed a memorandum of deposit and a blank transfer, but no notice of the deposit or transfer was given to the company. Subsequently the company issued fresh debentures and agreed to exchange those previously issued to Taunton for debentures of the new issue of equal nominal amount, and the bank, to enable this exchange to be carried out, gave up the old debentures to Taunton, who on the 3rd of September, 1890, deposited with the bank the debentures he had received in substitution for them. None of these debentures became payable at an earlier date than the 31st of December, 1890. No fresh memorandum or transfer was executed by Taunton.

In and prior to January, 1890, and thenceforth down to the commencement of the winding up Taunton was the holder of 1,567 ordinary shares, upon which previously to October, 1890, £8 10s. only had been paid up. On the 25th of October, 1890, Taunton paid to the company £250 in advance of calls on those shares, and again on the 1st of November, 1890, he paid the company a sum of £600, also in advance of calls.

On the 3rd of November, 1890, a resolution was passed by the directors of the company that a call of £1 per share be made on the ordinary shares, payable on the 20th of November at the Birmingham and Midland Bank, who were the company's bankers. On the 4th of November notice of this call was given to the bank, who were authorized to retain the proceeds in payment of an overdraft.

On the 6th of November, 1890, the bank gave the company formal notice that the debentures had been deposited by Taunton with them by way of security, and the secretary of the company without (as was stated) consulting the directors entered notice of the deposit on the register of debentures and informed the bank that he had done so.

On the 12th of November, 1890, the above-mentioned action was commenced by the bank on behalf of the debenture-holders. The company on the 19th of November, 1890, passed, and on the 5th of December, 1890, confirmed, a special resolution that the company should be wound up voluntarily. In the action assets of the company had been realized sufficient to pay the debentures in full. In the winding up all that remained unpaid on Taunton's shares had been called up, but no part of such calls had been paid by him. The bank then made this application to the court to decide the question whether the calls could be set off against what was due on the debentures that had been equitably assigned to the bank.

Beale, Q.C., and T. W. Baker, for the bank.—There is no right of set-off here. The special terms of the debenture do not affect the case, for the company cannot attach such terms so that the debt shall not be assignable by the person to whom the debenture has been issued. In the case of married women interests in property cannot be created which would not have the ordinary incidents of property, and amongst them the power of assignment: Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 1. The company cannot say to the assignee of the debenture, "I am your debtor, but I shall not pay until you come and get registered": Binney v. Ince Hall Coal and Cannel Co., 35 L. J. Ch. 363, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 24. Here the company accepted notice of the assignment. The sole question is whether, independently of the terms of the debenture, there is any right of set-off. There was no debt due and payable at either the date of the assignment and our notice or at the date of the winding up. The right of set-off is a statutory right. In equity the fact that there was no legal debt did not prevent the set-off, but the rule went no further: Cavendish v. Geaves, 5 W. R. 615, 24 Beav. 163; In re China and Labuan Steamship Coal Co., Mackenzie's case, 17 W. R. 343, L. R. 7 Eq. 240. There is no estoppel in equity here, and no consideration was given after the date of the notice: Ex parte Swann, 16 W. R. 560, L. R. 6 Eq. 344; Ex parte Oriental Commercial Bank, 18 W. R. 474, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 358; In re Hercules Insurance Co., Brunton's case, 23 W. R. 286, L. R. 19 Eq. 302; Higgs v. Assam Tea Co., 17 W. R. 1125, L. R. 4 Ex. 387. The right of set-off was gone, if not at the time of the assignment, at any rate at the time of notice to the company: Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co., 15 W. R. 1107, L. R. 2 C. P. 593. There is no case in which a claim to set off a sum due on a future certain date has been allowed. The call made in the winding up was only a liability, and was neither due nor payable at the time of the notice.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Buckley, Q.C., and Kirby, for the liquidator.—We agree there is no set-off in respect of a debt not ripened: Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co. The court in that case decided that a debt arising out of an antecedent contract could not be set off. Here the debt was due but not payable. It must be regarded on the 6th of November as if the assignment had been then executed, for notice completes the transfer. Taunton was then subject to the set-off. As to the calls made subsequently by the liquidator, section 75 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that the liability of any person should be considered a debt due when the liability commenced. Before the Act the time of liability was referred back to the earlier date: Williams v. Harding, L. R. 1 E. & I. App. 9, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3. The call relates back to membership of thec ompany: In re China and Labuan Steamship Coal Co., Mackenzie's case; Jeffryes v. Agra and Masterman's Bank, 14 W. R. 889, L. R. 2 Eq. 674. At the date of the assignment no call was made; the subsequent call related back, and there was then a debt due but not payable, a liability subject of set-off of a chose in action equitably assigned: Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-s. 6; In re Overend, Gurney, & Co., Ex parte Grissell, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 528. A contributory debtor to a company cannot set off a debt due and payable. Watson v. Midland Railway Co. does not touch this case. The debenture which accrued due after the 20th of November is a good set-off against the bank, because on the 6th of November, when the bank became assignee, it was a debt, although not payable. In a case to which section 75 of the Companies Act, 1862, applies you are to carry back the liability so as to give an equity against the assignee. Again, in the terms of the debenture the parties are dealing with a particular instrument: New London and Brazilian Bank v. Brocklebank, 30 W. R. 422, 737, 21 Ch. D. 302. There it was held that shares in a settlement were liable to the incident that the legal holder of the shares was subject to a lien for sums due, and the lien prevailed over the settlement, although it accrued due subsequently. The same principle applies here. Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29, is not excluded for all purposes.

Beale, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25.—STIRLING, J.—The question raised by this application is whether the calls on certain shares which at, and previously to, the commencement of the winding up of the company stood in the name of Richard Taunton, can be set off against what is due on certain debentures which were originally issued to Richard Taunton, and were registered in his name, but which had been assigned in equity to the Birmingham and Midland Bank (Limited). [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] I have to consider first of all whether what remains due of the call of £1 made on the 3rd of November, 1890, can be set off. Under the last clause of the conditions indorsed upon the debenture the principal secured thereby became payable on the 5th of December, 1890. The conditions show that the debentures were meant to be assignable. There is no evidence that the debts in respect of the debentures and of the shares originated in the same contract or transaction; on the contrary, they seem to have originated quite independently; and, therefore, set-off cannot be claimed on any such grounds as prevailed in the case of Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Co., 13 App. Cas. 199, 36 W. R. Dig. 46. The bank never presented to the company any transfer which would have entitled them under the conditions indorsed on the debentures to be registered as the holders of those deposited by Taunton; all they did was to give notice to the company of the equitable deposit having been made. The conditions provide that "the company shall not be bound to enter in the register or recognize in any way any trust or equity at any time affecting such debenture." On behalf of the bank it was contended that the rights of equitable assignees cannot be over-ridden by such a provision. I think it unnecessary on the present occasion to decide whether that contention is well founded or not; for in fact the company did enter notice of the bank's title on the register, and the bank must, I think, be taken to stand in the position of equitable assignees of a chose in action who have given notice of their assignment. What, then, is that position?

I consider it first on the supposition that the company had not gone into liquidation, but was now sued by the assignees of the debentures. On the one hand the case of Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co. shows that after notice of an equitable assignment of a chose in action the debtor cannot set off as against the assignee a debt which accrues due subsequently to the date of notice, even although that debt may arise out of a liability which existed at and previously to the date of notice. On the other hand the case of Wilson v. Gabriel, 11 W. R. 803, 4 B. & S. 243, shows that the debtor may set off as against the assignee a debt which accrued before notice of the assignment. It is perhaps of importance to consider the principle on which that decision was given. The action was one for freight. There was a plea of set-off for money lent, paid and received, goods sold and delivered, interest and accounts stated; replication on equitable grounds that before the defendants became indebted to the plaintiff for any of the freights the plaintiff agreed to assign the freights to a firm of Early & Smith for value and also to secure repayment of money already advanced by them to the plaintiff, and that the amount so due to Early & Smith exceeded the amount of the debts in the declaration mentioned, and that the defendants had notice of this before any of the debts or freights became payable; but the replication did not state that the defendants had notice of the assignment before the right of set-off arose, and it was held that the replication was no answer to the plea. For the grounds of the decision I will refer to the judgment of Blackburn J., which is as follows:—"The plaintiff here sues for a debt and the defendants plead a set-off. There was debt due when the action commenced, and, therefore, at law the defendants have a perfect right to set off against it a debt due to them. Messrs. Early & Smith, the real plaintiffs in the cause, call on us to do what they otherwise would have called on a court of equity to do—namely, grant an injunction to prevent this; for that is what this replication amounts to. It is not, as Mr. Brown contends, that we are to see affirmatively that this is an equitable set-off; but we are to see whether the plaintiff has a right to ask a court of equity to prevent the defendants setting up their legal right of set-off. Equity never will do that when equities are equal. The contract under which the freight ripened into a debt was, before it became one, assigned for money to Messrs. Early & Smith, and the defendants had notice of that. It is perfectly clear in equity that from the moment the assignment of a chose in action is notified to the party concerned the assignee is owner of that contract and all belonging to it. Here Messrs. Early & Smith allowed the plaintiff to appear to be the true owner of this freight, and upon that what was the right between them and the other party, either by natural equity or the artificial thing we call by the name equity? So early as George v. Clagett, 7 T. R. 359, the ground of which is correctly stated in the well-considered judgment of the Exchequer in Isberg v. Bowden, 8 Ex. 852, 859, it was held that where a factor sells goods as his own, and the buyer knows nothing of any principal, the buyer may set off any demand he may have on the factor against a demand in respect of those goods made by the principal. I quite agree with what Mr. J. W. Smith says in the beginning of his note, Leading Cases, vol. 2, p. 108, 5th ed., 'This decision too clearly results from principles of natural equity to need much discussion or explanation.' This replication is, therefore, bad."

In Isberg v. Bowden the law with respect to principal and agent is thus stated:—"Where a principal permits an agent to sell as apparent principal and afterwards intervenes, the buyer is entitled to be placed in the same situation at the time of the disclosure of the real principal as if the agent had been then the real contracting party, and is entitled to the same defence, whether it be by common law or statute, payment or set-off, as he was entitled at that time against the agent, the apparent principal." I think that if the company were being sued by the bank it would be entitled to be placed in the same position as it occupied relatively to Taunton on the 6th of November, 1890, on which day Taunton was indebted to the company for calls payable on the 20th of November, while the company was indebted to Taunton on the debentures, which did not become payable until a later date. If, then, no winding up had intervened, and Taunton, or the bank in Taunton's name, had sued on the debentures, the question would be whether the company could set off the debt which accrued on the 3rd of November (the date of the call), but did not actually become payable until the 20th of November. Neither Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co. nor Wilson v. Gabriel covers this point so far as actual decision goes, for in the former no debt had accrued due to the defendants at the date of notice, and in the latter the debt at the date of the notice appears to have been both due and payable. I think, on the principle laid down by Blackburn, J., in Wilson v. Gabriel, the set-off ought to be admitted. If it be inquired whether a court of equity would in an action at law brought before the Judicature Acts have interfered by way of injunction to prevent the company from setting up the legal right of set-off, I think the answer must be in the negative. Not only did the bank neglect to avail itself of the conditions of the debenture by taking a transfer capable of registration, but it did not even perfect its equitable title by giving notice until after the debt had accrued due, and (what is still stronger) until after the bank had notice that it had accrued. Again, if recourse be had to the analogy of the rule laid down in George v. Clagett, I think that if the set-off were not admitted, the company would be placed in a less favourable situation as against the bank than was its position as regards Taunton, and it is to be observed that in George v. Clagett it appears from the report that the plaintiff, the undisclosed principal, gave notice of his title to the defendants on the 20th of November, 1795, and that the defendants were allowed to set off a bill which was payable two months after the 24th of September, 1795, and was consequently not actually due on the 24th of November, the date of the notice. I think, therefore, that in any action by the bank on the debentures the company must have been allowed to set off the amount due in respect of the call made on the 3rd of November, 1890. It follows that a similar set-off must be allowed upon a proof against the company in the winding up: Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, 31 W. R. 80, 32 W. R. 989, 9 Q. B. D. 648 (667, 668), 9 App. Cas. 434. Here, as I understand, the bank claims against the property which formed the subject of the security; but I apprehend that in such case the set-off might, under the procedure of the Court of Chancery have been claimed by a cross bill (see Dodd v. Lydall, 1 Hare, 333) and under the present practice by a suitable pleading; and as the parties agree that the question to be determined is one of right, and not of procedure merely, I think that the set-off must be admitted as regards the balance remaining unpaid of the call made on the 3rd of November, 1890.

I have next to deal with the calls made in the winding up. The claim to set-off in respect of these is based on the 75th section of the Companies Act, 1862. [His lordship read the section, and proceeded:—] It is said that as the event of the company being wound up has occurred the call in question must be taken to be a debt which accrued due before notice of the assignment though it did not become payable until a later date, and consequently must be set off in the same way as the call made on the 3rd of November, 1890. I think, however, that until the winding up commenced there existed in respect of this call merely a liability on the part of Taunton, and consequently that this portion of the case is governed by the decision in Watson v. Mid-Wales Railway Co. I do not think that this conclusion conflicts with the case of In re China and Labuan Coal Co., Mackenzie's case, for there the assignment did not take place until after the commencement of the winding up, and consequently (in my view) after the liability had ripened into a debt. Lord Romilly says (p. 244): "Of course, no question arises where the assignment takes place before the winding up, but if the winding up should take place before the assignment of the chose in action, then, in my view of the case, it is provided that after the winding up has taken place and before any calls are made the owner of the debenture shall not be at liberty to assign it and get money which he can dispose of, so that when the call is made he has nothing which can be made available to pay it." I understand his lordship there to intimate that if in the case with which he had to deal the assignment had taken place before the winding up his decision would have been different.

I think, therefore, that the set-off cannot be admitted as regards the call made in the winding up.

Solicitors for the bank, Beale & Co., London and Birmingham.

Solicitors for the liquidator, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Smith, Pinsent, & Co., Birmingham.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } March 1, 14.

In re BACON.
GRISSELL v. LEATHES. (a.)

*Administration—Annuity—Tenant for life—Remainderman—*Corpus or income.

B. granted certain annuities by bond, and subsequently died leaving his widow the testatrix, his universal legatee and sole executrix. Under her will her residuary estate was held in trust for a tenant for life, with remainders over to other persons.

Held, that each payment of the annuities, as it became due, must be raised out of the corpus of the estate.

Adjourned summons.

G. C. E. Bacon granted by bonds under his hand and seal three annuities. He subsequently died in the year 1880, having by his will constituted his widow, H. Bacon, universal legatee and sole executrix of his estate.

The will was proved by the widow. She died in 1891, having by her will settled her residuary estate upon trust for the defendant, Philip Leathes, who was unmarried, for life, with remainder to his children, and subject thereto upon trust for her sister and her children. Substantially the whole of her property was derived from her husband.

The question raised by this summons by the plaintiffs, who were the trustees of the will, was whether the annuities were payable out of capital or income of the estate of the testatrix or out of both capital and income, and in what proportions, and in what manner the annuities should be paid or provided for.

Ingle Joyce, for the tenant for life.—The question is, in payment of debts by instalments, how are they to be paid as between tenant for life and remainderman. The tenant for life is entitled on each payment of the annuity to a charge on capital for the amount paid, keeping down the interest thereon: In re Harrison, Townson v. Harrison, 38 W. R. 265, 43 Ch. D. 55; Allhusen v. Whittell, L. R. 4 Eq. 295, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 122.

Ingpen, for the reversioners.—As little should be borne by capital as possible, instalments should not be calculated as they become due: Yates v. Yates, 28 Beav. 637, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 9; In re Muffett, Jones v. Mason, 37 W. R. 9, 39 Ch. D. 534.

G. W. Tallents, for the trustees.

Ingle Joyce replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The annuities which are the cause of difficulty in this case were granted, not by the testatrix, but by her husband: but inasmuch as she had little, if any, property beyond that derived under her husband's will, it was admitted that for all practical purposes the annuities must be treated as debts chargeable against her estate, and I propose to deal with the case on that footing. On principle, and apart from authority, I should have thought that there was no room for doubt concerning the relative rights of tenant for life and remainderman. An annuity for life, secured by bond or otherwise, is only distinguishable from a debt for a lump sum payable in instalments in this, that there is necessarily a doubt how long the annuitant will live, and the liability for each periodical payment partakes of the contingency. This, however, cannot make the annuity less a charge on the estate liable to pay it or impose any greater burden on a limited owner than would attach to him if the contingency did not exist. If it be necessary or convenient to raise the charge by sale of the entire estate, or part of it, he will from time to time lose the income of so much capital as is employed in meeting the charge, and if, instead of a sale, recourse is had to a mortgage, he will be bound to keep down the interest on that mortgage, and his income will be reduced to that extent. But this seems to be the limit of his liability, and he cannot be required to provide in advance, to his detriment, for payments which may never become due. Convenience, of course, will prevent frequently recurring sales or mortgages, for it must be to the interest of the tenant for life quite as much as that of the remainderman to avoid, as far as possible, transactions which, other objections apart, are sure to prove costly. But it must be a matter for arrangement and consideration in each case what part of the settled property must be sold, or what sum must be raised by mortgage to satisfy the annuitant's demands and make provision for the future, so far as provision can reasonably be made. If the tenant for life is able and willing to meet the periodical payments, it may be convenient to the estate that he should do so, and he will be entitled to a charge for the amount advanced, with interest, just as much as a stranger. That being my view of the position, apart from authority, I turn to the decided cases to see if there is any which conflicts with it. I confess to some surprise at not finding the point as one of administration practice established beyond doubt, and I cannot but think that the real reason for this should be sought in the acknowledged rights of both annuitants and beneficiaries not requiring judicial decision. The authorities cited appear to me to recognize such a rule as I have endeavoured to express, and only to apply it differently because each has to deal with different circumstances. There is no occasion for me to refer to more than three of them. The judgment of Wood, V.C., in Allhusen v. Whittell has from its date been regarded as establishing the rule applicable to such circumstances as there occurred. The only point in which it approaches the present case is that respecting contingent legacies, and all that the Vice-Chancellor did as regards them was to hold that, although a proper amount must be set apart to meet contingent legacies when payable, the tenant for life of the residue out of which those legacies would ultimately be taken was entitled to the income of the fund set apart until required for that purpose. In In re Muffett, Jones v. Mason Chitty, J., had to consider how an annuity, for which a testator's estate was liable, ought to be paid as between the tenant for life and remainderman, and according to the head note he held that the annuity must be capitalized and borne by the tenant for life and remainderman in proportion to the value of their respective interests. Not being able myself to extract this from the reported judgment, or to understand precisely what was done, I thought it right to send for the order. That order declares that the sum certified to have been paid to the annuitant out of income, and all future payments of such annuity, or the sum necessary to purchase an annuity in lieu of the said annuity, ought to be raised or provided for by the sale or mortgage of a sufficient part of the testator's estate, and it directs a sale or mortgage of the freehold or leasehold property of the testator for the purpose of raising the costs payable thereout, and also the sum certified to have been paid out of income as above mentioned, and such sum as may be necessary for the purpose of securing the future payment of the annuity. That directly confirms the view which I have expressed respecting the rights of the parties, and makes precisely such a declaration and gives such a direction as that view would justify and suggest.

(a.) Reported by FRANCIS T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case before North, J. (In re Harrison, Townson v. Harrison), is really only another example of the application of the same principle. The circumstances were different, the chief difference being that there were three properties, and it was necessary to distribute each payment rateably between them. Also a different rule was suggested in argument. But the judgment proceeds on the same lines as that of Chitty, J. I do not quite understand what the learned judge means by saying that he did not think the tenant for life entitled to have the estate sold bit by bit, but he certainly did not intend that the tenant for life should not have a real charge with all its incidents. In this instance also, in my endeavour to make sure what was intended and done, I sent for the order, but it has never yet been drawn up. The registrar's notes informed me that Mr. Swinfen Eady was to prepare minutes. I therefore communicated with him, and he has been good enough, for my benefit, to communicate with his clients. It appears that the omission to draw up the order was the result of a natural and reasonable reflection that it would be better to realize the estates first, and work out the rights of the parties with reference to actual values thus ascertained. I understand that the estates have now been sold, and that North, J., will be asked, if he has not already been asked, to allow the order to be drawn up now, or to make some supplemental order on this footing. It is merely a question of working out the principle above mentioned with reference to the particular circumstances of the case. It will, I think, be found that other authorities are in harmony with this, or, at any rate, any apparent departure from it is due to special circumstances. In Yates v. Yates, 28 Beav. 637, for instance, the practical difficulty was occasioned by the fact that, until sold, a large part of the real estate on which the annuity was charged produced no income.

The precise form of the order to be made may require some consideration, but, in substance, it should follow that in In re Muffet, the effect of which I have already stated.

Solicitors, Gregory, Rowcliffes, & Co.; Hopgoods & Dowson.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Jan. 31.

"THE SOTO." (a.)

Practice—Taxation of costs—Solicitor—Allowance to country solicitor attending hearing—Discretion.

It is a general rule, for the guidance of the Admiralty registrar in taxing costs between party and party, that, where a solicitor in the country retained for one of the parties employs a London agent, a charge for the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing will not be allowed; but this rule is not inflexible, and will be relaxed if it appears that the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing was necessary for the proper execution of the suit.

This was a summons taken out on behalf of the owners of the steamship Earl of Chester, the plaintiffs in an action of damage against the steamship Soto, to review the assistant registrar's taxation of the plaintiffs' bill of costs.

Jan. 24.—The summons was adjourned into court.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Holman, for the plaintiffs.

Nelson, for the defendants, the owners of The Soto.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—BARNES, J.—In this case a summons had been taken out by the plaintiffs' solicitors on behalf of the plaintiffs to review the taxation of the plaintiffs' costs, and the summons came before me in the ordinary course in chambers. As the matter was one of importance I thought it right to adjourn it into court, and it came on immediately afterwards in court before me, and was argued by counsel, though I am afraid they had not so full an opportunity of referring to all the authorities as they would have had if the matter had been in court originally. The summons, as I have said, was to review the taxation by the assistant registrar of the plaintiffs' bill of costs, and the items in relation to which the taxation was questioned was these: "On the 13th of June journey to London. Attending all the witnesses. Attending court on the 14th of June when the case part heard. In court on the 15th, when the case concluded, and Soto held alone to blame for collision. Paid railway expenses Paid hotel expenses." There were some other matters objected to, but it is not necessary to consider them, no special importance attaching to them.

The suit was between the owners of The Earl of Chester and the owners of The Soto, arising out of a collision which occurred between these two vessels on the 7th of April, 1892. The Earl of Chester belonged to Cardiff, where her owners carry on business, and The Soto was a Spanish vessel belonging to Barcelona. The Earl of Chester, if I recollect the facts right, sunk after the collision, and The Soto was so much damaged that she had to be beached, and afterwards, I think, was taken to Cardiff. The Earl of Chester had sailed from Cardiff shortly before the collision with a cargo of coals. The owners of The Earl of Chester placed the conduct of the proceedings on their behalf in the hands of Messrs. Downing & Handcock, solicitors at Cardiff, whose London agents are Messrs. Downing, Holman, & Co. The owners of The Soto were represented by Messrs. Lowless & Co., solicitors of this city.

The hearing took place before me on the 14th and 15th of June last, and I found The Soto alone to blame. The managing clerk of Messrs. Downing & Handcock, who, as I understand, had taken, or supervised the taking, of the statements of the witnesses and conducted the proceedings on their behalf, attended the hearing before me in London, and it is in respect of his expenses and charges for so doing that the present question arises.

The assistant registrar, in his answer to the objections as to the disallowance of the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor, says that it has been up to the present time the invariable practice not to allow them. He has therefore not exercised any discretion in the matter.

It was contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that the attendance of the managing clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitor was necessary in the interests of his clients, and that the assistant registrar ought in his discretion to have allowed the items objected to. On the other hand it was argued that it had been a rule of practice not to allow them.

As the point is of general importance I have referred to such authorities as have any bearing on the question, and have made inquiry as to the practice in the other divisions. The following cases all bear upon the subject:—Bell v. Aitkin, 16 W. R. 704, L. R. 3 C. P. 320; Potter v. Rankin, L. R. 4 C. P. 76, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 31; In re Snell, 25 W. R.

736, 5 Ch. D. 816; In re Foster, Ex parte Dickens, 26 W. R. 915, 8 Ch. D. 598; In re Storer, 32 W. R. 767, 26 Ch. D. 189; Ex parte Snow, In re Sherwell, W. N., 1879, p. 22.

Bell v. Aitkin was a case in which the action was for an infringement of a patent. The cause of action arose at Stockport. The trial took place in London and lasted several days, and a verdict was ultimately found for the defendants. The defendants' country attorney, who had been engaged in getting up the evidence, attended at the trial as well as the London attorney. On the taxation of the defendants' costs the master allowed the attendance of the London attorney, but not of the country attorney, considering himself bound by a general rule not to allow both, and not, therefore, at all entering into the circumstances of the particular case before him. Bovill, C.J., said, in the course of his judgment: "But cases may arise in which it is necessary that the attorney who has had the conduct of the case from its commencement and is acquainted with all the facts should be present at the trial, and I think that the present was such a case. The master does not appear to have exercised his discretion in the matter, but to have considered himself bound by an inflexible rule that costs such as those in question shall be disallowed. I think that the rule is not inflexible, and that, in this case, it is right that the master should take the facts into his consideration and exercise his judgment upon them." Byles, J., gave judgment to the same effect, and Keating and Montague Smith, JJ., concurred. That case was referred to in Potter v. Rankin, where there was a rule moved for for a review of the taxation, and the court refused the rule, observing that the circumstances of the case relied upon, namely, Bell v. Aitkin, were very peculiar. The court gave no further judgment upon this particular point, and do not seem to have dissented from the principle which is adopted by the judges in the course of the judgments in Bell v. Aitkin.

The result of the cases seem to me to be that an allowance for the attendance of the country solicitor at the hearing in London is within the discretion of the taxing officer, and that although, as a general rule, no allowance will be made, yet such an allowance will be made in exceptional cases where it is necessary that the solicitor who has had the conduct of the case from the commencement, and is acquainted with all the facts, should be present at the trial. This is what I understand to be the practice in the different divisions of the court, though perhaps there is some difference in the strictness with which the general rule has been applied, and I am informed that in the Admiralty registry it has in some cases, and very exceptional cases, been relaxed.

The question is whether it was necessary that the country solicitor or his managing clerk should attend the hearing, and it is desirable to consider that question carefully, because, although this case was one of difficulty and magnitude, it did not surpass in that respect many heavy collision cases in this court, and the present decision will affect a number of admiralty cases.

The practice of disallowing the costs of the attendance of the country solicitor in an admiralty case probably originated under circumstances very different from those existing in the present day. In former time advocates and proctors alone had the privilege of practising in the High Court of Admiralty. This exclusive right was abolished in 1859 by the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 6; and in 1861 by the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 10, certain restrictions against proctors acting as agents for solicitors were done away with; but there seems little doubt from a perusal of the Admiralty Court Rules of 1859 and 1871 that the mode of conducting the cases continued very much the same as before. The London proctor appears to have been treated as having the real conduct of the case, though his instructions come from the outport solicitor, and the fees allowed and forms of bills of costs found in Williams and Bruce, 1st ed., Appendix, pp. lxx. to lxxviii., and pp. ccvi. to ccxxxiv., are in accordance with this view. Amongst these forms is given, at p. ccx., a list of outport charges, and to this a note is appended as follows:—"The outport charges are the charges of the country solicitor. They are frequently small in amount, because it often happens that nearly all the matters in respect of which costs are allowed as costs in the cause are transacted in London by the London agent. The outport charges are usually made out in a separate bill annexed to the bill of costs. In taxing the outport charges the charges for all matters done in the country in respect of which, if done in London, specific charges might be made are allowed in the usual way. But in addition to these charges a sum is ordinarily allowed under the head of Agency. This is intended to remunerate the country solicitor generally for necessary work and labour in respect of matters for which specific charges cannot be made. The sum allowed, of course, varies greatly, according to circumstances." It seems fairly clear that all the work was treated as conducted in the London registry, though there might be certain matters which were dealt with by the country agent, for an agent's charge was allowed.*

In the present day, since the establishment of the district registeries by virtue of the Judicature Acts, many cases are conducted entirely in the local registry until the hearing, and in any such case, when the hearing, as is usual in the Admiralty Division, takes place in London, the country solicitors on either side have the whole management of the case.

In 1870 a registry of the High Court of Admiralty was established at Liverpool under the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 45, and I am informed by the officials in the Liverpool District Registry that in cases conducted in the Liverpool registry it has been the practice since its foundation to allow the costs of the attendance of the Liverpool solicitors at the hearing in London, in cases in which the witnesses have been examined and depositions have been taken by them. By that I understand cases in which the Liverpool solicitors have themselves taken the real conduct of the proceedings and have had the responsibility of taking the statements of the witnesses. In cases where the solicitors of both parties practice in London no question arises, but where one side is represented in London and the other at an outport, or the one is represented at one outport, and another at another, and the case is conducted in London, the question to be decided in this case does arise. In this respect an admiralty action does not differ from some other actions tried in London. There are, however, certain peculiarities in an admiralty action which are not applicable to most other actions. The hearing of an admiralty case usually takes place within a very short time of the occurrence which gave rise to it, owing to the rapid despatch rendered necessary in a court where the witnesses are mostly seafaring men. The statements of the witnesses represented at an outport are taken by the solicitor with great accuracy; the witnesses usually arrive in London on the night before the hearing, under the arrangements which it is necessary to make for this class of witnesses, and the London agent in such a case may have no opportunity of examining them. In the conduct in court of a difficult collision case it is, according to my experience at the bar, most important that the solicitor who is responsible for the case and the preparation of the evidence should be present, and that counsel should have his assistance. The presence of the solicitor having the conduct of the case who has seen the witnesses is necessary, in many instances, for their proper examination in this class of case, and sometimes as a check even over the witnesses of his own side, or over the independent witnesses of the other side who have given him statements, and he is often obliged at a moment's notice to go into the witness-box to deal with statements made by these witnesses.

* The practice of bringing in an outport bill was discontinued in 1873, consequent upon the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in The City of Brussels, 21 W. R. 71, L. R. 4 A. & E. 196.

There are, therefore, in the Admiralty Court cases in which, owing to the exigencies of modern business and the conditions under which the cases are fought, the presence of the country solicitor may be necessary for the proper conduct of the cause, and where such is the case I am of opinion that the costs of his attendance at the hearing should be allowed.

If this principle is cautiously and properly applied no improper charge is thrown on the losing side, whereas if it is not applied and the general rule is adhered to in all cases, a successful suitor may have to bear the costs of the attendance of his own solicitor, though that solicitor's presence was necessary for the successful prosecution of his suit.

In the present case the attendance of the managing clerk of the plaintiffs' Cardiff solicitors appears to me to have been necessary, and I refer the case back to the registrar to review the taxation, and in doing so he will have to reconsider the allowance of the London agent of the plaintiffs' Cardiff solicitors, because if the country solicitor is allowed for, only such assistance as was necessary for him at the hearing can be allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Downing, Holman, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Lowless & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) [and Q. B. Div.] (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Lopes, L.J.) — April 11; May 8.

DE BERNALES v. "NEW YORK HERALD." (a.)

Practice—Writ of summons—Service—Person carrying on business in name other than his own—Foreigner residing abroad—Claim for injunction—Issue of concurrent writ for service out of jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f); ord. 48a, r. 11.

By ord. 48a, r. 11, "Any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name; and, so far as the nature of the case will permit, all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply."

A foreigner resident abroad was the proprietor of a newspaper called the New York Herald, printed and published at New York. He had an office within the jurisdiction, over the door of which was the name of the newspaper, the office being occupied by a telegraphic correspondent for the purpose of transmitting news to New York. At the head of one of the columns of the newspaper were the words, "New York Herald—James Gordon Bennett, proprietor." Copies of the newspaper were occasionally sold there. The plaintiff issued a writ of summons against the New York Herald, claiming damages for an alleged libel which had been published in the newspaper, and an injunction against any future publication.

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, that ord. 48a, r. 11, did not apply so as to allow service of the writ of summons upon the proprietor of the newspaper abroad, even if he were carrying on business within the jurisdiction under a name or style other than his own name, and that leave ought not to be given under ord. 11, r. 1, to issue a concurrent writ for service upon him out of the jurisdiction, although an injunction to restrain the publication of the libel was claimed, no grounds being shown for apprehending that the publication of the libel would be repeated.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the proprietor of the newspaper did not carry on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name, and that, therefore, ord. 48a, r. 11, did not apply.

Appeal from chambers.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Kennedy, J., in chambers setting aside the order of a master allowing substituted service of a writ of summons on the defendant, and an application by the plaintiff, referred by Kennedy, J., in chambers, to the court, for leave to issue a concurrent writ for service out of the jurisdiction.

The action was brought to recover damages for libel. A claim for an injunction to restrain the publication of the libel was afterwards added by amendment. The alleged libel consisted of an insinuation that the plaintiff was the perpetrator of certain notorious frauds. Before the commencement of the action a person other than the plaintiff was tried and convicted of the fraud in question. The alleged libel was published in America in a newspaper called the New York Herald, the sole proprietor of which, James Gordon Bennett, was an American citizen resident in Paris. The newspaper was printed and published in New York, and another edition of it in Paris. There was an office in London taken by Bennett and occupied on his behalf by a telegraphic correspondent for the purpose of the transmission of news to New York and to Paris for publication in the newspaper. Copies of the American edition were sold at the London office, including a copy of the issue containing the alleged libel. At the head of one of the columns of the newspaper was the statement "The New York Herald—James Gordon Bennett, Proprietor." Attempts were made on behalf of the plaintiff to serve the writ of summons at the London office upon some person having control of the business there, but it was found to be impossible to effect such service. The plaintiff then applied to the court, and on the 3rd of February the master made an order that service of a copy of the order and of a copy of the writ of summons by sending the same by a prepaid postal letter addressed to the defendant at the London office should be a good and sufficient service of the writ. Kennedy, J., in chambers, set aside the order of the master, on the ground (amongst others) that Bennett was the sole proprietor of the New York Herald, and was an American citizen residing in Paris.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ord. 48*a*, r. 11, provides that "any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name; and so far as the nature of the case will permit, all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply." Rule 1 of the same order deals with the suing of partners in their firm name, and rule 3 provides that "Where persons are sued as partners in the name of their firm under rule 1 the writ shall be served either upon any one or more of the partners, or at the principal place within the jurisdiction of the business of the partnership upon any person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business there; and, subject to these rules, such service shall be deemed good service upon the firm so sued whether any of the members thereof are out of the jurisdiction or not, and no leave to issue a writ against them shall be necessary.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL and W. F. BARRY, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Percy Gye, for the plaintiff.—Gordon Bennett is carrying on business within the jurisdiction, under the style of the New York Herald. The plaintiff is entitled, under ord. 48*a*, r. 11, to sue him in that style, and to have the benefit of the rules as to proceedings against firms which are contained in that order. The writ might have been served upon the manager of the plaintiff's business if he had not avoided service. We are therefore within the rule as to substituted service laid down in Field v. Bennett, 56 L. J. Q. B. 89, 35 W. R. Dig. 162. The fact that the defendant is resident out of the jurisdiction does not prevent the plaintiff from serving the writ here upon the manager, the practice which was formerly governed by Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, and Western National Bank of New York v. Perez, Triana & Co., 39 W. R. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304, has been altered by the rules under order 48*a*, which were framed to meet those cases, and to enable a plaintiff to obtain judgment against persons carrying on business in England and resident abroad. The judgments in Grant v. Anderson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 108, 40 W. R. Dig. 191, contain expressions adverse to this view, but the only substantial decision in that case was that the defendants were not carrying on business within the jurisdiction. Secondly, if the court will not allow substituted service of the writ, leave to issue a concurrent writ for service upon the defendant out of the jurisdiction ought to be granted; the writ claims an injunction against the future publication of the libel complained of, and that brings the case within ord. 11, r. 1 (f): Tozier v. Hawkins, 34 W. R. 223, 15 Q. B. D. 680.

Temple Franks, for the defendant.—Ord. 48*a*, r. 11, does not apply to a single foreigner residing abroad. The new rules as to partnerships apply to English partnerships only, and have not altered the previously existing practice as to suing and serving foreigners. Further, the New York Herald is not a "name or style" in which a business is carried on, it is merely the title of a newspaper, and cannot be used as a substitute for the defendant's name. The defendant's name is well known, and the attempt to sue him as the New York Herald is made with a view of bringing him within ord. 48*a*, r. 11. [He was stopped as to this point.] No leave for service of the writ abroad ought to be granted, because the defendant is resident out of the jurisdiction—not temporarily abroad or absent for the purpose of avoiding service: Smalpage v. Tonge, 34 W. R. 768, 17 Q. B. D. 644. The claim for an injunction cannot be sustained, because the paper is not published in England and the nature of the alleged libel is such that it is extremely unlikely that it will be repeated. The plaintiff, therefore, has not brought himself within ord. 11, r. 1.

Gye replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 11.—LOPES, L.J.—In this case the learned judge refused to allow substituted service. I am of opinion that he was right. The writ is issued against the New York Herald. The sole proprietor of that newspaper is Gordon Bennett, an American citizen residing in Paris. I regard the name of the New York Herald as an alias for the name of Gordon Bennett; and I deal with the case as if the writ was issued against Gordon Bennett individually. The object of issuing the writ against the New York Herald is obvious. It is an attempt to bring the case within the language of ord. 48*a*, r. 11, with which I will presently deal. Independently of that order the case is on all fours with Field v. Bennett, where it was held that substituted service cannot be allowed where personal service is impossible. Personal service is impossible here; the learned judge, therefore, was right in setting aside the order for substituted service. But it is said the code of rules contained in order 48*a* has enlarged the jurisdiction of the courts by including foreign firms within their scope. It is unnecessary in this case to express any opinion as to the effect of those rules in the case of the joint property in this country of a foreign firm carrying on business here. The New York Herald is not a "foreign firm." It is not "a firm" at all. The New York Herald is an alias in this country for Gordon Bennett, and Gordon Bennett is an American citizen permanently residing in Paris. The rule relied on is rule 11. [His lordship read rule 11, and continued:—] I cannot think that the authors of this rule intended that service might be effected on an individual foreigner permanently residing abroad, simply because he carried on business in this country under an assumed name, where it could not have been effected upon him if he carried on business here in his own name. The code of rules contained in order 48*a* is difficult to understand, but whatever their effect and meaning may be, I decline to put upon them a construction to my mind so unreasonable as this. The point therefore fails. The learned judge was asked on another summons to give leave for service of a notice of writ on the defendant under order 11, on the ground that an injunction was claimed. The writ as originally issued had not claimed an injunction, but had been subsequently amended. That summons was referred to the court. I think this leave ought not to be given, and for these reasons. I do not believe the claim for an injunction is made bonâ fide, but merely to bring the case within order 11. There is no evidence of any apprehended repetition of the libel, and, indeed, having regard to the circumstances, it is most improbable that it will be repeated. The injunction, if granted, would not be made effectual against the defendant, who is not within the jurisdiction. The giving leave to serve notice of writs out of the jurisdiction is a matter of judicial discretion. We should not, in my opinion, be properly exercising that discretion if we gave leave in this case.

The appeal against the refusal of the learned judge to allow substituted service will be dismissed, with costs, and the application for leave to serve notice of the writ abroad will be refused with costs.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I entirely concur.

The plaintiff appealed.

May 8.—Crump, Q.C., and Percy Gye, for the plaintiff.

Temple Franks for the defendant.

The COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.), dismissed the appeal upon the ground that under the circumstances the defendant did not carry on business within the jurisdiction in the name of the New York Herald, and that, consequently, ord. 48*a*, r. 11, did not apply.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Brandon & Nicholson.

Solicitors for the defendant, Lewis & Lewis.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — May 1.

DRIVER v. BROAD. (a.)

Contract—Statute of Frauds, s. 4—Interest in land—Contract for purchase of debentures — Company — Charge on undertaking and property — Floating security.

A company issued debentures whereby it charged its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. One of the conditions indorsed on the debentures provided that the charge thereby created should be a floating security; and another condition provided that the moneys secured by the debentures should become payable if the company created any specific charge on any of its freehold or leasehold property in priority to the debentures. The company was possessed of certain leasehold property.

Held, that a contract for the purchase of such debentures was a contract for an interest in land within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.

Judgment of Mathew, J. (ante, p. 415), affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of Mathew, J., on further consideration (ante, p. 415).

The action was brought for breach of a verbal contract for the sale by the plaintiff and the purchase by the defendant of twenty debentures in a company called Broad's Patent Night Light Co. (Limited).

The question reserved for further consideration was whether the contract for the sale and purchase of these debentures was a contract for an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds.

The debentures were first mortgage debentures, whereby the company charged with the payment of the principal money and interest therein contracted to be paid "its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being."

The debentures were issued subject to certain conditions indorsed thereon. Condition 1 was as follows:—"This debenture is one of a series of like debentures issued, or to be issued, by the company for the aggregate sum of £30,000 in the sums of £100 each, and all which said debentures, whatever the date of issue, shall rank pari passu in point of charge, and the charge hereby created shall be a floating security, and accordingly the company, until the appointment of a receiver or the commencement of a winding up, shall be at liberty, but only in the ordinary course of its business, to sell, deal with, and dispose of the property charged, and to give receipts for money, and divide its profits as if none of the said debentures had been issued. Provided that this condition shall not authorize the creation of any specific or floating charge ranking equally with, or in priority to, the said debentures, or any specific or floating charge except subject to the charge hereby created." Condition 13 provided that the principal moneys secured by the debentures were to become payable in certain cases—viz. (inter alia): "If the company creates any specific charge on any of its freehold or leasehold property in priority to the debentures." Condition 14 provided as follows:—"The registered holders of one-half in value of the outstanding debentures of this issue may by writing appoint some person approved by them or him to be receiver, or a receiver and manager, of the property charged by the debentures, and such appointment may be made when the company has made default for more than two calendar months in the payment of any principal moneys or interest hereby secured, or when any order has been made or effective resolution has been passed for the winding up of the company, and section 24 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, shall be regarded as modified accordingly. The receiver shall have power to sell the mortgaged property, and the provisions of the said Act as to sales by a mortgagee shall be applicable."

The company was possessed of certain leasehold property consisting of a factory and warehouses where its business was carried on.

Mathew, J., held that the contract for the sale and purchase of these debentures was a contract for an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and, there being no memorandum in writing of the contract, he gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

E. Morten, for the plaintiff.

A. T. Lawrence and J. G. Wood, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether these debentures charged land so that the contract for the purchase of them was a contract for an interest in land within the Statute of Frauds. They are expressed to charge the company's "undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future." Part of the property of the company is land and buildings. It is impossible to say that land and buildings do not come under those words. But that is not all. There are the conditions to be looked at, and condition 13 says that the principal moneys are to become payable if the company creates any specific charge on any of its freehold or leasehold property in priority to the debentures. The meaning of that must be that the debentures have created a charge not specific on the company's freehold and leasehold property. It is clear, then, that the debentures did create a charge on land, and the contract for the purchase of them was a contract for an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. It is said that is not so, because the debentures create only a floating charge. But where there is a charge on land it is not the less a charge on land because it is a floating charge. A floating charge means this—a charge on the property of the company subject to the power of the directors to dispose of any part of such property in the ordinary course of their business. It was such a charge that was considered in the case of In re Florence Land and Public Works Co., Ex parte Moor, 27 W. R. 236, 10 Ch. D. 530. I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am clearly of opinion that these debentures, which charged the company's "undertaking and all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever," created a charge on land, and, therefore, the contract between the parties was a contract for an interest in land, and ought to have been in writing. It is said that, the charge being only a floating security, the Statute of Frauds does not apply. But the case of In re Horne and Hellard, 29 Ch. D. 736, 33 W. R. Dig. 234, shows that the fact of a charge on land being a floating security does not make it any the less an interest in land,

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of these debentures is clearly to give an immediate charge on all the property of the company. As to its being a floating charge, that means that power is reserved to the company to dispose of any part of its property in the ordinary course of its business, as though the debentures did not exist. It does not mean that it is not a charge. The company being possessed of land, it is clear the debentures gave an interest in land within the meaning of the statute.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, James White.

Solicitors for the defendants, Faithfull & Owen, for E. Hillman, Lewes.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) April 25.

DOUGAL v. MCCARTHY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease for a year—Tenant remaining in possession at end of year—Consent—Tenant from year to year—Terms of original lease—Implication of law.

Where, on the expiration of a lease for a year, the tenant remains in possession with the consent of the landlord, and nothing is said or done inconsistent with his holding on under the terms of the lease, the implication of law is, that a tenancy from year to year has been created on the same terms in so far as they are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Hawkins, J.

The action was brought to recover £70 for two quarters' rent of three rooms in a house in the Strand, payable under an agreement in writing dated the 16th of February, 1891. The agreement was made between the plaintiff as landlord and the defendant Justin McCarthy and six other persons, being the directors of the Irish National Press Association, as tenants. It was expressed to be made as a separate and personal agreement by each of the tenants. The premises were let for one year, commencing on the 1st of February, 1891, at the rent of £140, payable quarterly in advance, payments to be made on the 14th of February, the 14th of May, the 14th of August, and the 14th of November.

The tenants entered into occupation of the premises and the year's rent was duly paid. At the expiration of the year the tenants remained in possession, and in fact so continued till the 14th of May, 1892.

On the 25th of February, 1892, the plaintiff wrote to the secretary of the Irish National Press Association:—"Will you kindly send me a cheque, £35, for quarter's rent due on the 14th inst." This letter was not answered.

On the 26th of March, 1892, the secretary, Mr. Dennehy, wrote to the plaintiff:—"I am instructed by Messrs. Justin M'Carthy, M.P., Thomas Sexton, M.P., John Barry, M.P., Thomas A. Dickson, M.P., T. M. Healy, M.P., and John Murrough, M.P., to inform you that it is their intention to discontinue their present tenancy of the offices at 62, Strand, London, at present occupied by them for the purposes of this company, and I am directed to give you notice that they will not continue same beyond the period required under their agreement. I shall, of course, be glad if you can see your way to take up the premises on the 14th of May, or even earlier. We shall, of course, give you every facility for the securing of a new tenant, and I am sure you will meet us in the same spirit."

On the 31st of March, 1892, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Mr. Dennehy:—"Dear Sir,—Mr. Dougal has handed us your letter giving notice to give up No. 62, Strand, London, which notice will expire on the 1st of February, 1893. Our client will be ready to meet you if you have an assignee of the premises, or will be happy to consider a surrender of the present term if other suitable terms are submitted. We are instructed to ask you to be good enough to pay us the quarter's rent due the 1st of February, and shall be obliged by a remittance at your early convenience." No answer was sent to this letter.

On the 10th of May, 1892, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Mr. Dennehy:—"Referring to our letter of the 31st of March, a half-year's rent, amounting to £70, becomes due on the 14th inst., . . . and we have instructions to proceed to recover this if the amount is not paid by the date appointed." In reply to this Mr. Dennehy wrote:—"I shall have a meeting of the directors of this company on Saturday, when I shall bring your letter of the 10th inst. under their notice."

On the 17th of May, 1892, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors:—"I had nothing to do with the arrangements, but of course my name was, and I believe still is, on the board of directors. Your client, I feel sure, is perfectly certain to get his rent without any trouble. I shall send your letter on to the secretary of the company in Dublin."

On the 20th of May Mr. R. Chance, the solicitor to the company in Dublin, wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, saying that there was some misapprehension, and that all rent up to the 1st of February then last had been paid. The letter proceeded:—"My clients are quite prepared to pay a reasonable sum for use and occupation up to the date when they ceased to use the offices."

On the 23rd of May the plaintiff commenced this action, claiming two quarters' rent alleged to be due on the 14th of May. The defendant's case was that on the expiration of the agreement of the 16th of February, 1891, he became a tenant at will, so that he could determine the tenancy at any time thereafter, and, inasmuch as he had tendered possession of the premises as from the 14th of May, 1892, he was only liable for use and occupation for the period between the 1st of February and the 14th of May. The defendant paid into court the sum of £70 under a master's order, and he was willing that out of that sum £40 10s. should be paid to the plaintiff in respect of such use and occupation.

At the trial before Hawkins, J., without a jury, the learned judge gave judgment for the defendant, being of opinion that there was nothing in the evidence to show that on the expiration of the first year a tenancy from year to year had been created.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. E. Bankes, for the plaintiff.—Where there is an unconditional consent by both parties to a holding over on the expiration of a tenancy for a year, the inference of law is that a tenancy from year to year has been created on the terms of the original tenancy so long as they are consistent with a tenancy from year to year: Right v. Darby, 1 T. R. 159; Richardson v. Langridge, 4 Taunt. 128; Waring v. King, 8 M. & W. 571. Payment of rent in advance is not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year.

J. W. McCarthy, for the defendant.—The man remaining in possession by consent at the end of the year's tenancy is not of itself sufficient to give rise to the inference of law, that a tenancy from year to year has been created. The only tenancy thereby created is a tenancy at will. Before a tenancy from year to year can be implied, there must be something done, such as the payment and receipt of rent, which points unequivocally to an intention between the parties to enter into a new contract for a tenancy from year to year. In each case it is a question of fact what inference ought to be drawn. In this case the learned judge has drawn the correct inference.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I cannot agree with the judgment of Hawkins, J. There is no dispute as to the facts of the case. Mr. Justin McCarthy and others became tenants to the plaintiff of certain premises on certain agreed terms for one year to end on the 1st of February, 1892. The agreed terms included, among others, the amount of rent and the times of payment. On the expiration of the year the tenants did not go out, but remained in possession of the premises for some considerable time. The evidence shows clearly that the plaintiff consented to their so remaining in possession, and that he consented to their so remaining in possession as tenants. He treated them as being tenants on the terms of the former tenancy—i.e., he treated them as being tenants for another year subject to all the terms and conditions of the old tenancy. It was on that footing that he demanded of them a quarter's rent in his letter of the 25th of February. They, on their part, remained in possession, but up to the 26th of March they said nothing. On that day the letter which has been read was written on their behalf to the plaintiff.

Now I think the doctrine laid down by Lord Mansfield in Right v. Darby is correct: "If there be a lease for a year, and by consent of both parties the tenant continue in possession afterwards," which is exactly what happened here—it being a question for a jury, if there is one, whether the parties did so consent—"the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract"—i.e., the law implies a tenancy for another year, and so on from year to year, on the terms of the old tenancy. If the tenant remains in possession, but at the same time makes some statement which is inconsistent with his being in as tenant—if, for instance, he claims to be owner—the jury would then say that he he was holding over in defiance of the landlord, and not continuing in possession by consent. In that case the implication of law spoken of by Lord Mansfield would not arise. If he remains in possession as tenant, but proposes some new stipulation, which is inconsistent with his continuing in possession on the old terms, though it is clear that he intends to remain as tenant, I do not think it necessary to determine whether in that case the implication of law would be done away with. But if the jury find that he has not said or done anything inconsistent with his holding on under the old terms, then the law implies the creation of a new tenancy from year to year on the terms of the old contract, in so far as they are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year. That seems to me to be the effect of the judgments of Lord Mansfield and Buller, J., in Right v. Darby. Therefore, if there is a consent to remain as tenant, and there is nothing to rebut this implication, the result in law is a tenancy from year to year on the terms of the old tenancy in so far as they are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year.

Now, to apply that to the present case, the letter of the 26th of March shows that these people were holding over; and, inasmuch as a jury ought not to infer that they intended to be trespassers, it ought to be taken that they were holding over as tenants. But the letter is express on the point, it speaks of their "present tenancy," which must mean a tenancy which came into existence after the first year's tenancy had come to an end. I think it is clear that they knew they were liable for another term; and the letter is practically a notice to quit at the end of the year. It asks the plaintiff to take up the premises on the 14th of May; but it does not allege a right on the part of the tenants to give up the premises on the 14th of May. This letter, so far from saying anything inconsistent with the implication of law arising from holding over with the consent of the landlord, clearly admits it. The prope inference to draw from the letter is that they consented to remain as tenants, and did not attempt to impose any term on the landlord inconsistent with their continuing as tenants on the old terms. Therefore, in accordance with the implication of law, they are tenants from year to year on the terms of the original holding, in so far as those terms are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year. The agreement to pay rent in advance is not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year. Therefore, I think the judgment of Hawkins, J., was wrong, and the appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—Lord Mansfield in Right v. Darby laid down the law as follows:—"If there be a lease for a year, and by consent of both parties the tenant continue in possession afterwards, the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract."

First let us take the case where there is a holding over by the tenant, but nothing is said by either landlord or tenant. In such a case the proper direction to the jury would be that from those circumstances there followed an implication of law that a tenancy from year to year had been created on the terms of the agreement which had expired, so far as they were not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year. Next let us take the case where after the expiration of the year letters or communications pass between the parties. It would then be a question for the jury whether such letters or communications showed that the parties consented to the tenant's holding over. If the jury found there was such consent, then the same implication would arise as before, unless there was anything further which negatived such implication. In the present case the tenant in fact held over, and the landlord assented to such holding over in his letter of the 25th of February. If the defendant had not answered this, and nothing further had passed, I think the implication of law would have arisen. But then came the letter of the 26th of March. If that letter were capable of the construction that it negatived the implication which would otherwise have arisen, then the question whether it in fact did so would be for the jury. But can it possibly be said that this letter negatives that implication? I do not think it can. It seems to me that the letter confirms the implication. It is true it contains an appeal to the plaintiff to allow the tenants to go out on the 14th of May; but it shows they did not imagine they had a right to terminate the tenancy on that day. I therefore agree that the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Burch, Whitehead, & Davidsons.

Solicitors for the defendant, Kime & Hammond.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — March 13.

NECK v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Practice—Security for costs—Counter-claim—Defendant residing out of jurisdiction—Counter-claim arising out of same matter as claim.

Where a counter-claim arises out of the same matter as the claim, so that the counter-claim is in reality in the nature of a defence to the claim, the court will not, in its discretion, order the defendant to give security for the costs of the counter-claim merely because he is a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J.) rescinding an order made in chambers that the defendants should give security for the costs of his counter-claim.

The action was to recover £69 10s. 3d., the balance of an account for board and lodging. The defendant, in her defence, alleged that she had paid the plaintiff the amount due, and by way of counter-claim alleged that the plaintiff detained certain trunks and jewellery as security for the amount of her claim, and claimed the return of the property and damages for their detention. The defendant was a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, and the judge at chambers, affirming the decision of the master, made an order that the defendant should give security for the costs of the counter-claim. The Divisional Court rescinded this order.

The plaintiff appealed.

Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff.

Beven, for the defendant.

The following cases were referred to:—Winterfield v. Bradnum, 26 W. R. 472, 3 Q. B. D. 324; Mapleson v. Masini, 28 W. R. 488, 5 Q. B. D. 145; Sykes v. Sacerdoti, 15 Q. B. D. 423, 34 W. R. Dig. 46; Lake v. Heseltine, 55 L. J. Q. B. 205, 34 W. R. Dig. 46.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The decisions which have been referred to lay down this rule, that where a defendant who is resident abroad sets up a counter-claim in respect of a wholly distinct matter from that which is the subject of the plaintiff's claim, the question will be considered from the point of view of the defendant being in reality a plaintiff, and security for the costs of the counter-claim will be ordered unless there is something to show that such an order should not be made. But where the counter-claim is not in respect of a wholly distinct matter, but arises out of the same matter, transaction, or contract on which the plaintiff's claim is founded, then the court will not order the defendant to give security for costs merely because he is resident out of the jurisdiction, but will take the whole matter into consideration, and consider what is fair and just between the parties, and will exercise its discretion accordingly. That rule applies whatever form the counter-claim may take, if in fact it arises out of the same matter, transaction, or contract on which the plaintiff's claim is founded. In the present case the counter-claim is in respect of the very same transaction as the plaintiff's claim. It is in reality a defence to the action, though in form a counter-claim. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The matter in the counter-claim is so closely connected with the claim as really to form part of the defendant's defence. It would not be fair or just to make the defendant give security for costs as the price of setting up such a counter-claim.

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Guilford E. Lewis.

Solicitors for the defendant, Ravenscroft, Hills, & Woodward.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Feb. 6.

WILSON, SONS, & CO. (LIMITED) v. BALCARRES BROOK STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of defendant—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11—Foreigner resident out of jurisdiction—Order to add as defendant—Discretion—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8.

Where there are two joint contractors, and an action is brought against one only, the other being a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, the defendant is not entitled as of right, under ord. 16, r. 11, to have the other joint contractor added as a defendant.

Held, further, that, upon the facts, the court ought not to order that the other joint contractor should be added as a defendant.

Semble, that, under ord. 16, r. 11, the court has a discretion to order other defendants to be added, but that such discretion ought to be exercised as nearly as possible in accordance with the principles upon which a plea in abatement would, before the Judicature Act, have succeeded or failed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Day and Collins, JJ.) discharging an order of Wright, J., at chambers.

The action was brought upon a joint guarantee given by the defendants, the steamship company, and one Benier, against certain disbursements. Benier was a foreigner resident at Antwerp, and he had chartered a ship, of which the defendants were owners, for a voyage from Antwerp to Santos. The plaintiffs, who carried on business both in England and at Santos, were agents both for the ship and charterer at Santos. Certain disbursements for lighterage and other matters became necessary at Santos. Questions as to who was liable for these disbursements arose, and it was therefore agreed, in order to accelerate the discharge of the ship, that the plaintiffs should make the disbursements, and that the defendants and Benier should jointly guarantee repayment of them to the plaintiffs in England.

By the agreement, the guarantee was given without prejudice to the rights of each party.

An application was made by the defendants to Wright, J., at chambers under order 16, r. 11, that Benier should be added as a co-defendant. Wright, J., while saying that if it were a matter of discretion he should not make the order, felt himself bound by the case of Pilley v. Robinson, 36 W. R. 269, 20 Q. B. D. 155, and made the order.

The Divisional Court reversed the order on the ground that, as Benier was a foreigner resident outside the jurisdiction, the defendants were not entitled as of right to have him added as a co-defendant, and that upon the facts the order ought not to be made.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, for the defendants.—This being a joint debt, we are entitled to have Benier joined as a co-defendant: Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 11. The guarantee is to be performed in England; it is a guarantee to pay in London. At any rate, there is a discretion, and in this case the discretion ought to be exercised by making the order. R. S. C., ord. 11, r. 1 (g), also applies.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Massey v. Heynes, 36 W. R. 834, 21 Q. B. D. 330; Pilley v. Robinson, 36 W. R. 269, 20 Q. B. D. 155; and Sheppard v. Baillie, 6 T. R. 327.

H. F. Boyd, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are not entitled to have Benier joined. Before the Judicature Acts no plea in abatement could have been pleaded in a case such as this. If there be a discretion under ord. 16, r. 11, the court will not interfere with the exercise of it by the court below unless they can see clearly that it was wrongly exercised. Although Benier is outside the jurisdiction, the defendants can give him a third-party notice: Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan, 1 Q. B. D. 644, 24 W. R. Dig. 205; Dubont & Co. v. Macpherson, 38 W. R. 62, 23 Q. B. D. 340.

Carver, in reply.—It was a common law right that you should not be sued alone, and it is an absolute right under order 16; there is no discretion.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiffs have sued the defendants, the steamship company, upon a joint guarantee. Thereupon a summons is taken out by the defendants who have been served in this country asking to join Benier. The question is, What are the rights of the defendants under that summons? Wright, J., said that if it were a matter of discretion he should not make the order, but the case of Pilley v. Robinson had been cited, which seemed to show that he was bound to make the order. It was argued in the Divisional Court that the defendants had an absolute right to the order. Benier is a foreigner resident abroad, and therefore the questions are (1) whether the defendants had an absolute right to the order that he should be joined as a defendant; (2) whether, if the judge at chambers had a discretion, he would be wrong if he exercised it by refusing to allow Benier to be brought in as a co-defendant. Had the defendants an absolute right? By the common law, if the plaintiff sued a defendant alone for a joint debt, and it came out that it was due from him and someone else, the plaintiff failed. But the statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8, said that the point must be taken by the defendant by plea. But the statute further drew a distinction, saying that if both defendants were resident in this country the plea in abatement operated as an absolute right to compel the joint contractor to be joined. But if the co-defendant who had not been sued was resident abroad, the plea in abatement could not be validly pleaded. Then came the Common Law Procedure Act, enabling you to serve a defendant who was abroad. That did not do away with the Statute of William. When the Judicature Act was passed it did away with that Act. It allows you to serve a defendant abroad in a great many more cases than the other statute. By doing away with the plea in abatement it does away with the application of the Statute of William to that case. It intended the larger power given by the new procedure to be applied in the same way as the law would have been by the existing machinery. If that be true and both defendants are in this country, and you use the machinery in the same way, you could say that the defendant has a right to bring in the other defendant. The form in the Judicature Act gives a discretion. It is not necessary to say that if the co-defendants are in this country, under no circumstances can you refuse to order the other to be joined. But as a general rule, unless there is something quite extraordinary, I should say the court is bound to order the defendant to be brought in. If the other defendant was abroad, then before the Judicature Act you could not compel the other defendant to be brought in, and, therefore, if one of the defendants is abroad and you are to use the machinery in the same way, there is a discretion; but I should say it ought to be exercised as nearly as possible as it was before. It is a matter of discretion, and therefore the court has jurisdiction to say he should be joined, but that discretion ought to be exercised with considerable care. If there were an absolute right to have a joint contractor joined, although he is resident abroad, it would give rise to considerable difficulties. Suppose the court ordered that such a joint contractor should be joined, he cannot be served with the writ without leave. Hence, after ordering the man to be brought before the court, the court might say "No, we cannot order him to be served," and therefore they would have ordered him to be brought in, and then would have said "No, we cannot order him to be served." If Benier is a joint contractor with them it seems that there must be a right to contribution, and the defendants can bring him in as a third party. If there is not a right to contribution, then the defendants are bringing him in for some indirect purpose, such as cross-examination.

We know that Wright, J., has not exercised his discretion fully. I say it is a matter of discretion, and, therefore, I shall exercise it the same way as he would have done, if he had thought it a matter of discretion.

This appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A plea in abatement upset the plaintiff, whether the defendants were resident within the jurisdiction or not, before 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. But 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 altered that, and said that a plea in abatement should not be allowed unless the defendants were within the jurisdiction. Then came the Judicature Act, which swept away pleas in abatement for non-joinder. It was still the right of the defendant in a sense to ask to have all the co-contractors sued the same way as himself, subject to the modifications pointed out in the statute. Lord Cairns said in Kendal v. Hamilton that it is an ordinary rule that where all the joint contractors are within the jurisdiction all ought to be sued, and that though the plea in abatement is abolished, the court still has the power of compelling the joint contractor to be added as a defendant. Lord Cairns never said that the substance of the old law had been affected in any serious degree by the Judicature Act. Unless it is just to impose this condition on the plaintiff we should not do it. The form of the rule leaves it in the discretion of the court. I should pause before I compelled the plaintiff to follow the other co-defendant perhaps all over the globe. There is no absolute right. As to to the way in which the discretion ought to be exercised, I agree with Wright, J.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is whether a joint defendant resident in this country and sued by the plaintiff can compel the plaintiff to join the defendant resident outside the jurisdiction.

Wright, J., came to the conclusion he had to make the order on the case of Pilley v. Robinson. It appears to me that whether the right is absolute or not, the defendant is ordinarily entitled to compel the plaintiff to sue the other joint contractor in the case when the two defendants are residing in this country. Then the defendant has a right to go to the judge and compel the other joint debtor to be added. That is not this case. Here the other joint debtor is outside the jurisdiction. Before the Judicature Act the defendant could not plead a plea in abatement because he could not aver that the other joint debtor was within the jurisdiction of the court. Then came the Judicature Act, under which there is a discretion, and if Wright, J., had exercised his discretion he would not have made the order, nor would the Divisional Court, nor will I.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ince, Colt, & Ince.

Solicitors for the defendants, Wynne, Holme, & Wynne, for Simpson, North, & Johnson, Liverpool.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) May 5.

Ex parte LESTER & CO.
In re HANNAH LYNES. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Bankruptcy notice — Judgment debt — Married woman—Separate estate—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-sections 1 (g), 2 —Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 5.

A bankruptcy notice cannot be issued against a married woman under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Ex parte appeal of Lester & Co. from the refusal of the registrar to issue a bankruptcy notice against Hannah Lynes.

Lester & Co. had recovered final judgment for £54 against the separate estate of Hannah Lynes, who was a married woman carrying on business separately from her husband, which judgment remained unsatisfied.

By section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, "every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she was a feme sole."

By section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy "if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him . . . a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, and he does not . . . comply with the requirements of the notice."

Section 4, sub-section 2, provides that a bankruptcy notice under the Act shall be in the prescribed form.

The prescribed form is that given in Form No. 6 in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, and is as follows:—"Take notice that within seven days after the service of this notice you must pay to the sum of £ claimed by him as being the amount due on a final judgment obtained by him against you," &c.

Lynn, for the appellant.—The registrar held that he was precluded from issuing a bankruptcy notice against a married woman by reason of the decision in Ex parte Coulson, 36 W. R. 142, 20 Q. B. D. 249, but that case is not applicable, because the married woman there was not carrying on trade separately from her husband. If this bankruptcy notice cannot issue, then section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is rendered nugatory.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that a bankruptcy notice cannot issue in this case. The person upon whom it is proposed to serve the notice is a married woman trading separately from her husband. It is true that such a person can be made a bankrupt, but the question in this case is whether this bankruptcy notice can be served upon her. The notice is issued under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides that the notice shall require the debtor to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment; but the notice must be in the form prescribed by the statute, and the form of a bankruptcy notice given in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules applies only to the case of a judgment in which the debtor is personally liable, and does not follow the terms of a judgment against the separate estate of a married woman. This notice, therefore, is not in accordance with the terms of the judgment, because it requires this married woman to pay the amount of the judgment personally, which she is not bound to do, as she is only liable to the extent of her separate estate.

It does not follow that a married woman may not be made a bankrupt in some other way.

LOPES, L.J.—The bankruptcy notice must be in accordance with the terms of the judgment, and must be in the form given in Form No. 6 in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules. That form is not applicable to the case of a judgment against the separate estate of a married woman. This decision does not interfere with what was said by the court in Pelton v. Harrison, [1892] 1 Q. B. 118, 40 W. R. Dig. 181, and it is not correct to say that section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, will be rendered nugatory, for it would be effective in the case of a married woman being made a bankrupt in some other way.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In Ex parte Hughes, In re Howes, 40 W. R. 647, [1892] 2 Q. B. 628, the court held that the bankruptcy notice must be in accordance with the judgment. In this case the judgment is against the debtor's separate estate, and the only bankruptcy notice which could be issued under the Act is one which required her to pay the debt personally. It was not, therefore, in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. H. Gibson.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
North, J. April 14.

BRIGHTON MARINE, &c., CO. v. WOODHOUSE. (a.)

Arbitration—Enlargement of time by consent for delivering defence—"Steps in the proceedings"—Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 8.

In an action by the plaintiffs against their contractor under an agreement which provided that all disputes should be referred to arbitration, the defendant had delivered no pleadings, but when the original time for putting in a defence was about to expire, he wrote to the plaintiffs asking for fourteen days further time to put in his defence, which was granted, and subsequently wrote asking for ten days further time, which was also granted. On motion by the defendant to stay proceedings under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4,

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that obtaining by consent an enlargement of time wherein to plead was not "taking a step in the proceedings" within the Arbitration Act, s. 4, and that there must be an order to stay proceedings.

Motion.

By two agreements dated respectively July 16, 1891, between the plaintiffs and defendant in this action, it was provided that in case of default by the defendant, a contractor, the plaintiffs might suspend him from completing the works and take possession of the premises and plant; it was also agreed that matters in difference between the parties should be referred to arbitration. Disputes having arisen, the plaintiffs, on the 5th of November, 1892, gave the defendant notice of suspension, and on the 10th of November took possession. On the 26th of January, 1893, the plaintiffs brought this action for a declaration that they had exercised their power of suspension, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the works. On the 6th of February the defendant entered an appearance. On the 10th of February the plaintiffs obtained ex parte an interim injunction against the defendant, and on the 3rd of March moved to continue the injunction, when, the defendant giving an undertaking, the motion stood over. The statement of claim was delivered on the 11th of March. On the 21st of March the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs asking for fourteen days further time wherein to plead, which application was granted. On the 29th of March the defendant gave notice of motion that the matters in difference between the parties having been agreed to be referred to arbitration, all proceedings in the action might be stayed under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4 On the 5th of April the defendant again wrote to the plaintiffs, asking for ten days further time wherein to plead, which was granted. The defendant now moved to stay proceedings. The Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4, provides that "if any party to a submission . . . . commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission . . . . in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may, at any time after appearance and before delivering any pleadings, or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to that court to stay the proceedings, and that court . . . . may make an order staying the proceedings."

Byrne, Q.C., and Baines, for the motion, referred to Chappell v. North, [1891] 2 Q. B. 252, 39 W. R. Dig. 12.

Farwell, Q.C., and Methold, for the plaintiffs.—The action should not be stayed. The defendant's obtaining the plaintiffs' consent to an extension of time "a step in the proceedings" under section 4. The steps in the proceedings are taken under ord. 64, r. 8, which allows the time for delivering any pleadings to be enlarged by consent without application to the court: Smith v. British Marine, &c., Association, W. N., 83, p. 176. The plaintiffs gave time in the belief that the action would be carried on.

Baines, in reply, cited Willesford v. Watson, 21 W. R. 350, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 473.

NORTH, J.—I think that I ought to make the order asked for. The application is made under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4. [His lordship then read the section, and continued:—] Now in this case the defendant has put in no defence, and so far he is in time. But then he must move before taking any steps—that is to say, before putting in a defence, or taking any other steps. The question is, Has he taken any other steps in the proceedings? It is said that he has, because when the original time limited for the putting in of a defence was about to expire the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs asking for an extension of time of fourteen days, and subsequently asked for ten days more, which expire to-morrow, and to which the plaintiffs consented. In my opinion that was not "taking steps in the proceedings," but outside them. Mr. Farwell says that that was taking steps under ord. 64, r. 8, but that rule —[his lordship here read the rule]—does not make the obtaining time by consent a step in the proceedings; that rule is framed in order to avoid expense, and if consent to enlarge the time is given, then the step of applying to the court is dispensed with. That such enlargements of time for delivering pleadings by consent are not "steps in the proceedings" is settled by Chappell v. North, where Denman, J., said: "Three different matters were relied on as being steps in the proceedings by the plaintiffs. The first was that he had obtained a series of consents from the defendant for the extension of time for the delivery of a reply. No doubt if the consent had been refused the plaintiff would have had to take out a summons, and that summons would have been a step. But I do not think that the obtaining a consent which was asked for, for the very purpose of avoiding the necessity of taking a step can itself be regarded as a step taken." It is said that that case was decided on another point, and that the application there to stay proceedings did not succeed. But this point was decided there by Denman, J. Then Mr. Farwell relied on Smith v. British Marine, &c., Association, where an action was not stayed because time had been obtained to plead, but as the report does not state whether the time was obtained by order or consent the point material for the decision of this case is left out. Then it is said by Mr. Methold it is in the discretion of the court as to whether the proceedings shall or shall not be stayed, and that when the plaintiffs gave time they did so in the belief that the applications were made for the purpose of going on with the action, and that therefore this motion should be refused. But at the time of the second application by the defendant notice of motion had already been given. I cannot therefore accede to Mr. Methold's argument. There must be an order to stay proceedings and refer the matter to arbitration, with liberty to apply.

Solicitors for the defendant, Thomas White & Co.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bolton & Co.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Jan. 26.

WILLIAMS v. JENKINS. (a.)

Settled Land Act—Tenant for life—Suspension or cesser of life estate—Person having powers of tenant for life —Trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 2, 5, 7; s. 58, sub-section 1 (vi.).

A testator devised real estate to trustees upon trust to permit his daughter to receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof during her life for her separate use, and directed that, if a claim for £1,000, settled on the marriage of his daughter, should be enforced for payment, "then all her interest and benefit from the estate" should "cease until all the debts and claims on the same" should be paid. After the testator's death the trustees of the daughter's settlement demanded payment of the £1,000. The personal estate of the testator was insufficient for the payment of the debts due from, and claims against, his estate. The testator's daughter, who was his heiress-at-law, claimed to have the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the daughter's life estate was suspended only; that the trustees might properly have received the income and paid it over from time to time in reduction of the debts; and that there was, in substance, an estate for life subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts; and Held, therefore, that the testator's daughter was a person having the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Act.

Adjourned summons.

John Jenkins, by his will dated the 20th of January, 1874, gave, devised, and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his trustees, Lewis Jenkins and John Jenkins, upon trust to make certain payments void under the Mortmain Acts, and then "upon trust to permit my daughter Elizabeth, the wife of Morgan Williams, to hold and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof during her life, and retain the same for her own separate use and benefit absolutely, free from the debts, control, or engagements of her present husband or any future husband she may marry, subject to educating her children, after deducting the payments as aforesaid, and fair payment to the said Lewis Jenkins and John Jenkins for their services as trustees, and if the claim of the £1,000 settled on the marriage of my said daughter Elizabeth be enforced for payment, or any disturbance made respecting the same, then all her interest and benefit from the estate to cease until all the debts and claims on the same be paid." The testator then made certain dispositions of the rents and profits in favour of the children of his daughter after her death.

The settlement referred to in the will was made in 1867, and the testator thereby charged his real estate with the payment of £1,000 to the trustees thereof. The testator died on the 23rd of January, 1874, leaving Elizabeth Williams his only child him surviving, and after his death the trustees of the settlement demanded payment of the £1,000. The personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts of and claims against the estate.

This was an originating summons taken out by Elizabeth Williams, asking for a declaration that she was tenant for life, or had the powers of a tenant for life under the testator's will, within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Badcock, for Elizabeth Williams.—The testator's daughter is beneficially entitled to possession, and is therefore tenant for life: Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-section 5. As heiress-at-law she is tenant for life under the settlement by virtue of that sub-section and sub-section 2 of section 2. At any rate she is a person having the powers of a tenant for life, there being an implied trust for the accumulation of income for payment of debts. Section 58, sub-section 1 (vi.)

He referred to In re Atherton, W. N., 1891, p. 85.

Warlters Horne, for the children of Elizabeth Williams, adopted the above contention.

Warmington, Q.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for the trustees of the will.—The case comes within the principle of In re Strangways, Hickley v. Strangways, 35 W. R. 83, 34 Ch. D. 423. The applicant is not tenant for life, though she may become so when the debts are paid. The trust is for the payment of debts out of either corpus or income, and does not come within section 58.

Badcock, in reply.—If the debts are charged upon corpus the case is within sub-section 7 of section 2.

KEKEWICH, J.—It was the intention of the Legislature to confer powers of sale and other powers upon persons who could fairly be called tenants for life of settled land. A difficulty occurred to the Legislature in the numerous cases in which persons are entitled to life estates subject to charges, portions, and the like. As regards incumbrances and charges, this difficulty is met by section 2, sub-section 7, of the Act, which enacts that "a person being tenant for life within the meaning of the foregoing definitions shall be deemed to be such notwithstanding that, under the settlement or otherwise, the settled land, or his estate or interest therein, is incumbered or charged in any manner or to any extent." By a later section—section 58—the same policy is pursued with reference to landed owners who are not properly tenants for life, for the Legislature must have intended to comprise by the description in section 58 persons not included in section 2. The persons described in section 58, sub-section 1 (vi.), are not tenants for life, but persons having the powers of tenants for life: "A tenant for his own or any other life, or for years determinable on life, whose estate is liable to cease in any event during that life, . . . or is subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts or other purpose." Therefore, if you have property given to trustees upon trust to accumulate income for the payment of debts, and, subject thereto, upon trust for A. for life, then A. has the powers of a tenant for life pending the trust for accumulation, and notwithstanding that the trust for accumulation will, in all probability, extend beyond his life. It cannot be said of A., in such a case, that he is tenant for life within the meaning of any sub-section of section 2, but, for the purposes of the Act, he is entitled to exercise the powers of the tenant for life. In Hickley v. Strangways the court held that the person there claiming to be tenant for life took no estate or interest at all; that a term of twenty years had priority to the alleged estate for life; that it was not an estate for life in possession; and that, therefore, there was no tenant for life under section 2, and no person having the powers of a tenant for life under section 58. An interest which could not come into possession until the expiration of the term could not be recognized as an interest subject to a trust.

In the present case the testator was entitled to real estate subject to certain charges — "debts and claims" he calls them—on the same, that is, money which could be raised by proper proceedings out of the estate. One of these charges was a sum of £1,000 which he had agreed to pay on the marriage of his daughter, whom he was minded to make the tenant for life under his will. This sum was a debt of the testator's, and his personal estate, being insufficient to pay his debts, it became by that mere fact a charge on his real estate. He wished to make his daughter tenant for life, and that, subject to her life estate, the property should descend to her children. He gives the property to her for life for her separate use, subject to educating her children and making certain payments which he particularly mentions. Combining that with the previous language in the will, there is, I think, a devise of the property to the trustees, and having regard to the direction to pay debts, the legal estate must be in the trustees. Having thus given his daughter a life estate, the testator proceeds as follows:—[His lordship read the clause set out above.] The clause seems to point to the entire cesser of her life estate, but though he uses the word "cease," he adds the words "until all the debts and claims on the estate be paid," so that I think he means something less than cesser in the proper sense of the word. In my opinion the daughter's estate does not cease altogether, but is suspended until the debts and claims are paid, and then revives. Then what becomes of the estate in the meantime? Someone must have the estate, and someone must pay the debts. The trustees have the legal estate, as I have already said, and during the suspension of the daughter's life interest, instead of treating her as equitable tenant for life, they are to pay the debts and claims. But when these have been paid, the daughter comes in again by virtue of her suspended estate. Now there are only two ways in which this differs from an estate for life subject to a trust for accumulation. First of all, there are no words directing accumulation, and, secondly, there is no trust for payment out of income, except by implication. As to the first point, it would be a narrow construction of the Act to hold that the words "subject to a trust for accumulation" apply only where there is found a trust for accumulation such as is found in well-drawn precedents. Then, as to the second objection, the trustees here could properly receive the income and pay it over from time to time in reduction of the mortgage debts. In substance, therefore, I think the trust is really one for the accumulation of income for payment of debts. The testator's daughter is tenant for life subject to such a trust, and, therefore, has the powers of a tenant for life under the Act, including a power of sale.

Solicitors, Crowders & Vizard; J. H. Wrentmore, for Frank James & Sons, Merthyr Tydfil.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Dec. 3, 10.

In re HENGLER.
FROWDE v. HENGLER. (a.)

Will—Trust for conversion—Unsaleable property retained—Tenant for life and remaindermen—Apportionment of loss or profit.

A testator directed that his residuary estate should be sold and converted on a particular day, and that a share of the proceeds should be held upon trust for his wife for life, with remainders over. The residuary estate included a circus, which it was found impossible to sell advantageously, and which had been carried on at a loss by the executors since the day named for the sale and conversion of the estate. In a summons asking for directions how such losses and any future losses (or profits) should be apportioned as between capital and income,

Held, that the amount of annual profit or loss should be apportioned between the capital and the income of the testator's estate by inquiring what sum, put out at interest at four per cent. per annum on the day appointed for sale and conversion, and, as regards succeeding years, accumulating at compound interest calculated at the like rate, with yearly rests, would, together with such interest and accumulations, after deducting income tax, be equivalent, at the end of each year, to the amount of such profit or loss, and by crediting such sum to, or charging it against, the capital of the testator's estate, the rest of such profit or loss being credited to, or charged against, the income thereof.

Adjourned summons.

Frederick Charles Hengler, by his will, dated the 29th of April, 1882, after directing that two of his sons should have the use and occupation of his circus buildings at Liverpool, Glasgow, Kingston-upon-Hull, and Dublin, until the 1st of March, 1892, provided that on that day, or if the sons should cease, to carry on business as circus proprietors in partnership before that date, then when they should so cease, the trustees were to have the circuses valued and to offer them to the two sons at a valuation, any circus not purchased by the two sons to be sold under the power of sale thereinafter contained. The testator then expressed his wish that no part of his real or personal estate should be sold until after the 1st of March, 1892; but that expression of his wish was not to fetter his trustees in the exercise of the discretion thereinafter given to them as to the time of sale. The testator then gave the residue of his estate to his trustees upon trust, that they should "as soon as conveniently may be after the said 1st day of March, 1892, or (subject to the directions hereinbefore contained as to my said business) before that date if they, she, or he shall in their, her, or his discretion deem it advantageous to my estate so to do," sell the same. After paying debts and legacies the trustees were to invest the residue of the proceeds, and to stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys and the investments for the time being representing the same upon trust during the widowhood of the testator's wife, Mary A. F. Hengler, to pay to her the income of a fourth, and to pay the income of the remaining three-fourths to the testator's three sons and five daughters, and subject thereto in trust for the sons and daughters in equal shares.

The will contained no power to the trustees to postpone conversion after the 1st day of March, 1892.

The will was proved by the plaintiffs and the defendant, Mary A. F. Hengler, who were the executors, on the 16th of December, 1887.

At the time of his death the testator held the lease of a circus in London, at a ground-rent of £1,300. The lease had then about twenty-five years to run. This circus, not being specifically mentioned in the will, passed as residue.

The rent and outgoings of the London circus were very large, and considerably exceeded the income. It had, however, been found impossible to sell the property advantageously, and the evidence showed that it would be best for all parties that the property should be managed under the superintendence of the trustees as a going concern.

The court had already dealt with the question of how the rent of the London circus ought to be borne up to the 1st of March, 1892, but now the question arose how the loss since that date, and future losses (or profits), ought to be apportioned.

Warmington, Q.C., and Theobald, for the widow, referred to In re Foster, Lloyd v. Carr, 39 W. R. 31, 45 Ch. D. 629; In re Earl of Chesterfield's Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643; Beavan v. Beavan, 32 W. R. 363n., 24 Ch. D. 649n.; In re Hobson, Walker v. Appach, 34 W. R. 70; In re Flower, Matheson v. Goodwin, 63 L. T. N. S. 201, 39 W. R. Dig. 9; and contended that the principle laid down and acted upon in those cases should be followed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and T. R. Hughes, for other beneficiaries, and P. O. Lawrence, for the trustees, left the question to the court.

They referred to Gow v. Forster, 32 W. R. 1019, 26 Ch. D. 672, and In re Clapham, Rutter v. Clapham, W. N., 1886, p. 54.

KEKEWICH, J., made the following order:—It appearing that an advantageous sale of the testator's circus buildings in London has not hitherto, since the 1st of March, 1892, been possible, and that an advantageous sale thereof may not be effected for a considerable period of time, this court doth declare that as from the 1st of March, 1892, the profit made or loss sustained in respect of such circus buildings in each year until the sale thereof ought to be apportioned between the capital and the income of the testator's estate in manner hereinafter directed. And it is ordered that, for the purpose of such apportionment, the following inquiries be made after the last day of February, 1893, and the last day of February in each succeeding year until such sale or further order; that is to say: (1) An inquiry what was the amount of profit or loss in respect of such circus buildings during the year ending on such last day of February. (2) An inquiry what sum put out at interest at four per cent. per annum on the 1st of March, 1892, and as regards such succeeding years, accumulating at compound interest calculated at the like rate, with yearly rests, would, together with such interest and accumulations, after deducting income tax, have been equivalent on such last day of February to the amount of such profit or loss. And this court doth declare that the sum ascertained by the last foregoing inquiry ought to be credited to or charged against the capital of the testator's estate, and that the rest of such profit or loss ought to be credited to or charged against the income thereof.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Collins, Robinson, Collins, & Driffield, Liverpool; Teebay & Lynch, Liverpool; Toulmin, Lawrence, & Shield, Liverpool.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Jan. 25.

In re PIONEERS OF MASHONALAND SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Fully paid-up shareholder—Grounds for winding up—Ultrà vires—Issue of shares at a discount—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 79, sub-section (5).

A fully paid-up shareholder presented a petition to wind up the above-named company, alleging that a number of the shares had been issued at a discount, and that the petitioner and the other shareholders had been prejudiced thereby; that the company was insolvent, but that the assets were of considerable value, and, if prudently realized, would be sufficient, not only to pay and satisfy the company's debts and liabilities, but to pay a substantial dividend to the members; and that, under the circumstances, it was "just and equitable" that the company should be wound up.

Held, that the fact that a winding up would result in a surplus for the shareholders, if those who had obtained shares at a discount were made to pay up the difference between what they had actually paid and the nominal amount of their shares, did not give the petitioner the right to a winding-up order, and that the petition must, therefore, be dismissed.

The distinction drawn by Lord Herschell in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, ante, p. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, was not between a company as a going concern and a company in liquidation, but between the rights of the company and the rights of the creditors of the company.

Petition.

This was a petition by a fully paid-up shareholder of the Pioneers of the Mashonaland Syndicate (Limited) for a winding-up order.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The statements in the petition, so far as material, were to the following effect:—

1. That the company was a company limited by shares incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, as a company limited by shares.

2. That the nominal capital of the company was £50,000, divided into 48,000 ordinary shares and 2,000 founder's shares of one pound each.

3. That the petitioner was the holder of 2,000 ordinary shares, and 1,200 of the founder's shares had been issued.

4. That it had recently come to the knowledge of the petitioner that the company had issued or purported to issue over 10,000 ordinary shares to persons who were the holders of shares in the New Mashonaland Exploration Co. (Limited), in liquidation, and received for each one pound share the sum of three shillings, and a transfer of an equal number of shares then held by such shareholders in the said New Mashonaland Exploration Co. (Limited) which were of no value whatever.

5. That the company was insolvent and unable to pay its debts.

6. That the assets of the company were of considerable value, and if prudently realized would be sufficient not only to pay and satisfy the company's debts and liabilities, but to pay a substantial dividend to the members.

7. That the petitioner and other shareholders of the company had been greatly prejudiced by the issue of the shares at a discount as mentioned in paragraph 6 of the petition.

8. That in the circumstances it was just and equitable that the company should be wound up.

The question argued was whether the above allegations were sufficient to warrant a winding-up order.

Dunham, for the petition, referred to the Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, ante, p. 90, [1892] A. C. 125.

Bramwell Davis, for the company, in opposition to the winding up.—The petition is demurrable. A fully paid-up shareholder has no locus standi to present a petition on the ground of insolvency of the company nor on the ground that an act ultrà vires has been committed by issuing shares at a discount.

He referred to In re Irrigation Co. of France, Ex parte Fox, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 176, 19 W. R. Dig. 54, 58; In re Rica Gold Washing Co., 27 W. R. 715, 11 Ch. D. 36; In re Diamond Fuel Co., 28 W. R. 309, 13 Ch. D. 400.

Dunham, in reply, said that a winding-up order was the only means whereby persons to whom shares had actually been allotted at a discount could be made to contribute to the assets (Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper), and that it had never been laid down as an absolute rule that the commission of an act ultrà vires is not a ground for the presentation of a petition to wind up.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It is said that clause 7 of the petition does not mean that the company is legally insolvent, i.e., unable to pay its debts now and in the future, but only that the company is insolvent in the sense that it is unable to pay its debts as they become due, and that if clause 7 be read in conjunction with clause 8, the proper inference is that the company, though unable to pay its debts now, would, on the realization of its assets, have sufficient to pay its debts and leave a surplus. I am inclined to think that I ought to take that view of the meaning of the petitioner, and that is the view which I took in the remarks which I have already made, and I dispose of the case upon that view; but, even if the petitioner has that part of the case decided in his favour, he has not, in my opinion, any right to the order which he asks for. His counsel, in argument on his behalf, admits that the only ground upon which he can support his petition is under the "just and equitable" clause (Companies Act, 1862, s. 79, sub-section 5). In my opinion, it is not just and equitable that he should have a compulsory order to wind up the company. It was very fairly admitted in the argument that it would not be "just and equitable" that I should make the order if that which the petitioner is complaining of here were a matter which he could have had dealt with in the ordinary tribunals by the ordinary process. It was admitted that if this were merely a case where the directors of the company were going to do something which was ultrà vires the petitioner could not come here and ask for a winding-up order for the purpose of preventing them from doing that, and it was objected that the petitioner must not apply to the court for the extraordinary remedy of a winding-up order, because he had a remedy by an ordinary action. In answer to that it is said that the right which the petitioner seeks to enforce is one which he can only enforce by means of a winding-up order.

The petitioner says that certain shares of the company were issued at a discount, and that although, as between the company and the shareholders to whom the shares were issued, the company could not insist on the difference between the actual amount and the nominal amount of the shares being paid up, yet if a winding-up order was made, the result would be that those to whom the shares had been so issued would be placed on the list of contributories and made to pay up the difference, and thus a fund would be created which would be available, in the first place for the creditors, and secondly for the shareholders, in case of there being a surplus. And it was contended that the petitioner had an interest in that contemplated surplus, and, therefore, an interest justifying the presentation of his petition to have the company wound up as the only means by which he could obtain payment. In my judgment he has no such right. His right is the same in relation to the matter as that of the company; and though it is true that he might have an interest in the surplus, that is a right which only arises when a fund has been created really for the benefit, in the first instance, of the creditors, and secondly, to the extent of the surplus, for the benefit of the shareholders. The contrast drawn by Lord Herschell in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, is not a contrast between a company which is now a going concern and a company in liquidation. The contrast which he draws is a contrast between the rights of a company and the rights of the creditors of a company. Lord Herschell is there really saying that the company has no right to enforce payment of the difference between the amount paid and the full amount of the shares, but that its creditors have such a right. That being so, and there being no right of creditors in question at all in the present case, the only rights are those of the shareholders, and, resting the case on Lord Herschell's judgment, a shareholder has no more right to come and enforce by petition this liability of the shareholder to whom shares have been issued at a discount than he had in that case to enforce it by an action. The petition must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors, B. F. Linnett; Munk & Adie.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Charles, JJ.) April 24.

FIRTH & SONS v. PALMER AND DE LAS RIVAS. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Foreign defendant—Service of notice of writ out of the jurisdiction—Appearance under protest.

A foreign defendant resident out of the jurisdiction was served with notice of a writ of summons. He appeared to the writ under protest, the appearance containing on the margin a memorandum that it was entered under protest, in order to preserve the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction.

Held, that the defendant could properly enter an appearance under protest without losing his right to object to the jurisdiction.

Motion of the defendant Martinez de las Rivas to set aside an order of Kennedy, J., in chambers (whereby it was ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to issue a concurrent writ of summons against de las Rivas, and to serve notice of the writ at Bilbao or elsewhere in Spain), and to set aside service of notice of the writ which the plaintiffs had issued in pursuance of the liberty given by the said order.

The action was brought against the defendants, Martinez de las Rivas and Sir Charles Mark Palmer, to recover a sum of money alleged to be due upon a contract for the supply by the plaintiffs to the defendants of steel tubes and other material for the manufacture of cannon, the defendants being parties to a contract for the supply of cannon by them to the Spanish Government. The defendant de las Rivas was a Spanish subject and had no place of business within the jurisdiction, but carried on business in partnership with Palmer, the other defendant, at Bilbao, in Spain. Palmer was a British subject, and, in addition to the partnership with de las Rivas, carried on business within the jurisdiction.

The contract was in French, and was entered into by the parties to it at Bilbao. The defendants had an option under the contract of taking delivery of the goods at Jarrow or Bilbao and of making payment in London or Paris, and they had elected to take delivery at Bilbao and to make payment at Paris.

The plaintiffs obtained leave on the 25th of February, 1893, upon an ex parte application at chambers to issue a concurrent writ of summons against the defendant de las Rivas, and to serve notice of the concurrent writ upon him at Bilbao. The defendant Palmer appeared to the writ on the 1st of March, and notice of the concurrent writ was served upon de las Rivas on the 3rd of March. Appearance under protest was entered for him, the following note being written on the margin of the appearance: "N.B.—This appearance is entered under protest in order to preserve the defendant Martinez de las Rivas' right to object to the jurisdiction."

In addition to the question as to the effect of an appearance under protest, it was also contended on behalf of the defendant that the facts of the case did not bring it within the provisions of ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (g), which deal with the cases in which service out of the jurisdiction is permitted. The court decided in favour of the defendant on this point, but as their lordships were of opinion that this portion of the case was covered by authority, it is only necessary for the purposes of this report to deal with the question of the validity of an appearance under protest.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Scott Fox, for the defendant.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Danckwerts, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant had no power to appear under protest, and the protest must be disregarded. His proper course was to move to set aside the writ before appearing, under ord. 12, r. 30. In Mayer v. Claretie, 7 Times L. R. 40, the court set aside a writ after appearance had been entered under protest; but ord. 12, r. 30, was not called to the attention of the court in that case. The only case in which an appearance under protest is permitted by the rules is under ord. 48*a*, r. 7, where a person is served as a partner.

He also referred to Davis v. André, 38 W. R. 437, 24 Q. B. D. 598; Western National Bank of New York v. Perez, Triana, & Co., 39 W. R. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304; Heinemann v. Hale, 39 W. R. 485, [1891] 2 Q. B. 83.

WILLS, J.—It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the appearance of the defendant "under protest" is an appearance for all purposes. It is obvious that the appearance is either bad or good, and either way the defendant's rights are not affected, for if the appearance is bad, then there has been no appearance at all, and the defendant can apply to set aside the service. On the other hand, if the appearance is good, the case falls within the principle laid down by Mathew, J., in Mayer v. Claretie, that an appearance unqualified by protest does not take away the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction if he gives notice of his objection at the time he enters his appearance. This case is different from Davis v. André and other cases in which it has been held that a conditional appearance is bad. I agree with the decision of the court in Mayer v. Claretie. When an appearance under protest is entered it is a question for the court to decide afterwards whether the appearance or the protest is to prevail; and in the present case I am of opinion that the defendant's contention, that the judge in chambers had no jurisdiction to make this order, is correct, and this appeal must therefore be allowed.

CHARLES, J.—I agree. I think the case is covered by the decision in Mayer v. Claretie. In that case there was an unconditional appearance accompanied by a notification on a separate piece of paper that the defendant would object to the jurisdiction. In the present case the appearance states on its face that the reason for appearing under protest is to preserve the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction. The notification is none the worse for being on the same paper as the appearance, and the judgment of Mathew, J., in Mayer v. Claretie is applicable to this case. On the other hand, if this is a bad appearance, it is obvious that it is open to the defendant to make this application.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Baillie.

Solicitors for the defendants, Maples, Teesdale, & Co., for Leitch, Dodd, Bramwell, & Bell, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Charles, JJ.) April 21.

ROBERTS v. HOLLAND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Non-joinder of plaintiffs—Action by one tenant in common for injury to reversion—Action for breach of covenant—Severance of reversion after demise.

One tenant in common of a reversion is entitled to maintain an action for injury to the reversion without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs.

Pleas in abatement being abolished, it can only be a question for the discretion of the judge at chambers whether the non-joinder of such co-tenants ought to be a ground for staying the action until they are joined.—Per curiam.

An action may be maintained by one tenant in common of a reversion for breach of a covenant running with the land, without joinder of his co-tenants in common as plaintiffs, where the severance of the reversion takes place after the demise.

Argument on points of law stated for the opinion of the court.

The action was brought to recover damages (1) for trespass and wrongful acts causing injury to the plaintiff's reversion, and (2) for breach of a covenant in a lease, under the following circumstances:—

One Ellis Humphreys demised a certain farm on lease to Holland and another.

Humphreys, by will, devised the reversion to his wife for life, and after her death to his six daughters as tenants in common.

Humphreys and his wife died, and the interest of one of the daughters became vested in the plaintiff Roberts.

The wrongful acts complained of were the tipping, by the defendants, of large quantities of mining refuse upon the farm. It was also alleged that this constituted a breach of a covenant in the lease.

The defendants applied at chambers to stay the action until the remaining tenants in common were joined as plaintiffs, whereupon it was agreed that the following points of law, raised by the defendants, should be stated for the decision of the court:—

(1) That the plaintiff, being one of several tenants in common, could not maintain the action without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs.

(2) That the covenant in the lease being with the deceased Ellis Humphreys, and not with the plaintiff, his title was as tenant in common with other persons, and that he could not maintain the action in respect of breaches of the covenant except jointly with such other persons.

Gore, for the defendants.—One of several tenants in common cannot maintain an action for tort: Pilley v. Robinson, 36 W. R. 269, 20 Q. B. D. 155. The rule is still the same, although pleas in abatement, the mode by which it would have been applied, are abolished. In Wilson, Sons, & Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co., [1893] 1 Q. B. 423, Lord Esher, M.R. (at p. 427), said:—"Under the Judicature Act pleas in abatement are abolished, and therefore the provisions of the Act of William the 4th can no longer have any direct application. But it was not intended by the Judicature Act to alter people's substantive rights. A larger power was given to the court by the new procedure as to joinder of parties; but that procedure ought, as it seems to me, to be administered with regard to the principles of the old law upon the subject. Therefore, where there are two joint contractors, both resident within the jurisdiction, I think that, prima facie, if one of them is sued on a contract he would have a right to have the other made a co-defendant." The effect of the Judicature Act, therefore, was to alter the form rather than the substance of the law. On the second point, the principle is the same in contract; joint covenantees cannot sue independently. The plaintiff's right here under the covenant, which was a single covenant made with

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Humphreys, is at most a right jointly with the co-covenantees. The covenant being originally an entire covenant, the cause of action under it to the present covenantees must be joint, and, as was laid down in Foley v. Addenbrooke, 4 Q. B. 197, by Lord Denman at p. 207, they must all sue. The defendants here, therefore, took the right course in applying to have the action stayed until joinder of the other necessary parties, the proper way of proceeding after the abolition of pleas in abatement.

S. T. Evans, for the plaintiff, was requested by the court to direct his argument to the second point. —Here the entire reversion is divided amongst several persons, each possessing a distinct interest in his particular portion. Each of them has, therefore, a separate right of action for any breach of a covenant running with the land which affects the value of the entire reversion. In Martin v. Crompe, 1 Lord Raym. 340, Holt, C.J., at p. 341, said that if there were two tenants in common of a reversion expectant on a lease for years on which a rent is reserved, they may join in debt for the rent, or sever, and the one may have an action for the moiety of £20 rent, but not for £10, and so it has been adjudged." That dictum was quoted with approval in the judgment of Tindal, C.J., in Simpson v. Clayton, 4 Bing. N. C. 758, at p. 781, in which it was said that the utmost that had been established was not that tenants in common must join, but that they might, in an action of covenant. That was the decision Kitchen and Knight v. Buckly, 1 Lev. 109, the effect of which was, as was pointed out in the judgments in Thompson v. Hakewill, 14 W. R. 11, that tenants in common might join or sever at their election when the severance of the reversion is after the demise. That affords the distinction between the present case and one where all the tenants in common join in a demise; in the latter case, in an action on a covenant to repair, they must all join. [He also cited Ackroyd v. Briggs, 14 W. R. 25.] By the Judicature Act a plaintiff to be joined must have given his consent in writing, and the effect of the defendants' contention would be that a single one of several co-tenants might arbitrarily refuse to join, and so prevent the action.

He also cited Jackson v. Kruger, 52 L. T. N. S. 962, 33 W. R. Dig. 160.

Gore, in reply.

WILLS, J.—The first question which we have to decide in this case is whether one tenant in common can sue for a tort without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs. Now the authorities establish that such an action can be maintained; the only objection which could be taken to it formerly was by a plea in abatement, a course which is not now allowed, the only thing dealing with the matter now being the order of court which regulates the staying of actions. But it cannot be that where one tenant in common refuses to be joined as plaintiff in such an action that that can be a fatal objection; it may possibly be a ground for staying the action, but that is a question for the discretion of the judge at chambers.

Then we have to consider whether one tenant in common can maintain an action of covenant without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs. On that point I have been convinced by the able argument of Mr. Evans. The real question is not, as he points out, whether several joint covenantees can sue independently; it is quite clear that they cannot maintain such an action. The question here, which is quite distinct, is whether, where an owner demises, and—the covenant running with the land—afterwards parts with the demise to six co-tenants, one of those co-tenants can sue alone; whether, in fact, it is still one joint covenant, or whether there are six different covenants. Now I think each of them, holding a separate interest and having an undivided sixth part, they become six several co-covenantees, and may maintain six separate actions. In Platt on Covenants, p. 130, it is stated that "where the contract is entered into with the covenantees jointly, and the estate taken by them is several, they may at their option sue jointly or severally: jointly in respect of the joint contract, severally in respect of the interest. And if there are three covenantees taking distinct interests, two of them may support an action without joining the third, though living."

Now that shows that where by any circumstances there are separate interests there are separate covenants. No question of joint covenant arises in this case, and I need not go through the cases cited by Mr. Evans, but I will refer to one or two which Mr. Gore cited as making the other way. The case of Foley v. Addenbrooke seems to me to decide that when the original covenant was joint nothing can make that a separate covenant with A. and B., or their executors or representatives. I do not see anything in the judgment of the court in that case to indicate that where there are assignees in common of property originally held by one, a covenant which enures to their benefit does not become a bundle of separate covenants.

The same observation applies to the case of Thompson v. Hakewill, the covenant there, being always joint, remained joint. Under these circumstances, therefore, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment, and to maintain his action.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have had some doubt on the last point, but in the result I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brother Wills.

In the first place, I think it is clear that one tenant in common can maintain an action in tort. It was said in argument that although the old plea in abatement was abolished, nevertheless the cases of Pilley v. Robinson and Wilson, Sons, & Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co. established that the judge at chambers ought to stay the action upon the same grounds as would have supported that plea. I cannot agree. I think that is an entire misconception of what the effect of those cases was. We merely decided in the case of Pilley v. Robinson that in an application under ord. 16, r. 11, where an action was brought against one only of several joint contractors, he was entitled as of right to have his co-contractors joined as defendants, and the subsequent case of Wilson v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co. carried the principle no further. The Court of Appeal then decided that as a rule the court in its discretion would apply the same principle as would have supported, or otherwise, a plea in abatement before the Judicature Act, when it was sought to join a defendant. Now the case is quite a different one here, where it is sought to join six plaintiffs, the consent of every one of whom must first be obtained. Whether that ought or ought not to be done must in every similar case be entirely a question of discretion.

On the other point the argument of Mr. Evans has removed my doubts. It is true that where there are six joint contractors they must all sue, and if they do not there would be a nonsuit, because the proof would show a variance with the writ. But that does not apply here, because the covenant was with Humphreys, who is dead, and under his will six persons became entitled to the benefit of it. They each have a separate title and separate interests, and I am therefore of opinion that each of them is entitled to maintain an action alone under the covenant, and that our judgment on these points must be in favour of the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Lloyd George & George.

Solicitors for the defendants, Saffery, Huntley, & Son, for Breese, Jones, & Cusson.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) Feb. 2.

ELLIS v. PLUMSTEAD BOARD OF WORKS. (a.)

Metropolis—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 75—"Building, structure, or erection"—Boundary wall or fence—Forecourts or spaces.

Section 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, is not intended, under the conditions specified in the section, to prevent an owner from erecting such a wall or fence as would be a reasonable ascertainment of, and protection to, his property; and it must be left to the good sense and discretion of the magistrate to say in each case whether a wall or fence is so, or whether, by not being bonâ fide confined to that object, it becomes a "building, structure, or erection" within the meaning of the section.

Appeal by way of special case from an order of a metropolitan police magistrate directing the demolition of a wall on the ground that it was an infringement of section 75 of the Metropolis Local Management Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102).

The appellant owned certain land fronting a street within the district of the respondent board, upon which he had erected a house which was in line with the general building line of the street, and was distant 50 feet from the highway. Between the house and the street there was a vacant space of ground which belonged to the appellant. Between this space and an adjoining vacant plot the appellant erected a wall 13 feet high, projecting 20 feet towards the roadway, and attached to the house at one end.

An order was made by a magistrate for the demolition of this wall on the ground that, being attached to the house, it was part of a "building," and therefore an infringement of the 75th section of the Act above mentioned.

The order, being confirmed on appeal by a divisional court, was carried out.

The appellant thereupon erected a second wall upon the same footings, and projecting the same distance, but not more than 7 feet 8 inches in height, and separated from the wall of the house by a gap of 7 inches in width.

A further summons was taken out against the appellant, and the magistrate, being of opinion that the wall was a "building, structure, or erection," within the meaning of the above section, which projected beyond the general line of buildings, made an order for demolition, subject to a case stated for the opinion of the court, which now came on to be argued.

Section 75 of the Metropolis Local Management Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), after repealing section 143 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 and section 140 of 7 Geo. 4, c. 142, enacts that in lieu thereof "no building, structure, or erection shall, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate in case the distance of such line of buildings from the highway does not exceed 50 feet, or within 50 feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds 50 feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway, such general line of buildings to be decided by the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being, and in case any building, structure, or erection be erected, or be begun to be erected or raised, without such consent or contrary to the terms and conditions on which the same may have been granted, it shall be lawful for the vestry of the parish or the board of works for the district in which such building or erection is situate to cause to be made complaint thereof before a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons, &c."; and the section further provides that an order may be made by such justice of the peace upon the owner, or occupier, or builder, &c., directing the demolition of any such building or erection, or so much of it as is beyond the general line so fixed as aforesaid, &c.

Section 98 of the same Act, after providing in effect that no existing road shall be hereafter laid out for building as a street unless widened to the full width of forty feet, and for the mode in which such width is to be measured, continues: "But where forecourts or other spaces are intended to be left in front of the houses or buildings, then the width shall be measured up to the fence or boundary dividing, or intended to divide such forecourts or spaces from the public way," &c.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellant.—It was not contemplated by the Legislature that a mere boundary wall should be a building, structure, or erection within the meaning of section 75. That section itself refers to "gardens," and the clear inference, therefore, is that it contemplated their being enclosed, and not left unprotected. Section 98 of the same Act, moreover, expressly recognizes the existence of such boundary fences, as does also the amending Act of 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 32), s. 6. Several of the properties in this road are divided by walls seven feet high, and if this wall be held to be a "building," then it follows that a merely divisional wall will be equally a "building." In Clark v. Vestry of St. Pancras, 34 J. P. 181, it was decided that there was no power to order the reduction of the height of a wall. The result, therefore, is that no divisional wall could be erected beyond the building line, and the property of owners in front of their houses would be unprotected from the public. This case is not precluded by the decision as to the former wall, as there is now no finding that the wall is part of a building, which was the case there.

Forman, for the respondents.—This wall is practically identical with that ordered to be demolished in the previous case, which should cover the present one. The Acts providing that no "building" should be erected beyond the building line were repealed; the new Act, therefore, must have been intended to embrace something more than that. "Erection" is a very broad term, and in Adams v. Bromley Local Board, 37 J. P. 662, a wooden fence three feet six inches high was held to be an "erection" within a bye-law. In Clark v. Vestry of St. Pancras, whatever the dictum of the Lord Chief Justice, the order was nevertheless allowed to stand. The right of the appellant to erect a fence on his boundary is not disputed, but it must not be one in the nature of a "building, structure, or erection."

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is an embarrassing

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

case, because we have to decide the meaning of a wide term in the Act of Parliament. It is exceedingly difficult to say that anything built between two adjoining properties is not a "building, structure, or erection." But I think that this wall, as ascertained by the magistrate, by the photographs, and by the plans, is within the section, and, therefore, that the magistrate was right in saying what I am not prepared to say, that every possible structure by which a man marks off his property from his neighbours', and which simply ascertains his own property, having that and that only for its object, would be a "building, structure, or erection" within the meaning of that section. I have shown and I feel a comparative absence of tenderness for private property in relation to streets, for a man who has such property has it immensely improved in value, and all sorts of conveniences given to him. That fact justifies Parliament and courts of law, in my opinion, in being less scrupulously tender towards it. But that must not, on the other hand, be pushed too far, and, therefore, I shrink from saying just how far it is within the intention of the Act to interfere in regard to this matter. It must, in each case, be left to the good sense of the magistrate to say whether such a structure is a reasonable ascertainment of the owner's property.

Now, I cannot see that this is a structure simply and solely for that purpose, and I am of opinion therefore that the magistrate's decision was right, and must be affirmed.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot think that section 75 is intended to prevent a man putting up a reasonable garden wall to protect his property. The object of it is to preserve the uniformity of a line of houses; for in a new street people often desire to have their houses set back to escape annoyance from passengers and other things.

If, therefore, the intention of the section were to prevent such reasonable walls, just see what the consequences would be. A man who had deprived himself of the advantages of part of his land, and set his house back to the fifty feet, would, if no wall were allowed, be liable to having people coming all over his ground and right up to his windows.

It seems to me, therefore, that to say that for fifty feet a man cannot protect himself in a reasonable way is quite unwarranted by the Act, but what a man does to reasonably prevent the public walking over his property is not forbidden; the object, as I have said, of the section is to prevent people destroying the line of uniformity. When we get to the case of this boundary wall, however, the matter is different. Here the magistrate has found that this thing in question is a "building, structure, or erection," and I agree, and I think it quite clear that the reasonable protection of his property was not the object of the owner in putting it up. He seems first to have tried to see how high and mighty a thing he could erect, and I cannot say that I think that the present one is a bonâ fide boundary wall or fence. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the appellants, Giraud & Shoppee.

Solicitors for the respondents, G. Whale.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.)
[and Q. B. Div.]
(Hawkins and Cave, JJ.)
April 24; May 16.

SHAW v. RECKITT.
(PONTEFRACT ELECTION PETITION.) (a.)

Parliament—Election petition—Amendment—Jurisdiction to grant leave to amend—Judge not upon the rota—Rules of Court—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), ss. 40, 56—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 25—Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868, r. 44—Practice—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 68), s. 14.

Section 40, sub-section 2, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, provides that an election petition may be amended with the leave of the High Court; and, by section 56, sub-section 1, "Subject to any rules of court, any jurisdiction vested by this Act in the High Court may," except as to criminal matters, "be exercised by one of the judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of election petitions," or by a master, "in manner directed by and subject to an appeal to the said judges." Rule 44 of the rules made under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, provides for the hearing of interlocutory matters by a judge on the rota "if practicable, and if not, then by any judge at chambers."

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, that the rules made under the Act of 1868 do not apply to section 56 of the Act of 1883, and that a judge who is not on the rota for the trial of election petitions has no jurisdiction to make an order giving leave to amend an election petition.

Held, also, that such an order ought not to be made ex parte.

Held, upon appeal, that the decision of the Divisional Court was a decision upon a question of law within section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881—which provides that the jurisdiction of the High Court to decide questions of law, upon appeal or otherwise, under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, or any Act amending it, shall be final and conclusive, unless special leave to appeal be given by the High Court—and that, therefore, no appeal lay without leave.

Application to rescind an order made by Grantham, J., in chambers, giving leave to the petitioner to amend his petition against the return of the respondent as member of Parliament for the borough of Pontefract, upon the grounds that the order was made without jurisdiction, Grantham, J., not being upon the rota of election judges, and that it was made ex parte.

On the 20th of March the statutory return of the respondent's election expenses was made.

On the 21st of March the petitioner bespoke a copy of the return, and this was furnished to him on the 25th of March. There was evidence that upon the 24th of March, the day upon which the order giving leave to amend was made, none of the judges upon the rota of election judges were at the Royal Courts of Justice. The 29th of March was the last day of the Hilary Sittings of the court.

The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, provides as follows:—

Section 40, sub-section 1.—"Where an election

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL and W. F. BARRY, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

petition questions the return or the election upon an allegation of an illegal practice, then notwithstanding anything in the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, such petition may be presented before the expiration of fourteen days from the date of the return and declarations respecting the election expenses by the member to whose election the petition relates and his election agent."

Sub-section 2.—"Any election petition presented within the time limited by the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, may, for the purpose of questioning the return or the election upon an allegation of an illegal practice, be amended with the leave of the High Court within the time within which a petition questioning the return upon the allegation of that illegal practice can under this section be presented."

Section 56, sub-section 1.—"Subject to any rules of court any jurisdiction vested by this Act in the High Court may, so far as it relates to indictments or other criminal proceedings, be exercised by any judge of the Queen's Bench Division, and in other respects may either be exercised by one of the judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of election petitions sitting either in court or at chambers, or may be exercised by a master of the Supreme Court of Judicature in manner directed and subject to an appeal to the said judges."

Sub-section 2.—"Rules of court may from time to time be made, revoked, and altered for the purposes of this Act and of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and the Acts amending the same by the same authority by whom rules of court for procedure and practice in the Supreme Court of Judicature can for the time being be made."

Pope, Q.C., and S. H. Day, for the respondent.—This order was made without jurisdiction. The power to amend an election petition was given for the first time by section 40, sub-section (2), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883, and section 56 of that Act shows how the power is to be exercised. According to that section, it is only an election judge who has power to give leave to amend, but that provision is to be "subject to any rules." No rules have been made under the Act of 1883, and the only election rules in existence are those of 1868, made under the Parliamentary Elections Act of that year. Under that Act there was no power to amend a petition, so the reference in section 56 must be to rules to be made under that section. But if that section refers to the rules of 1868, the petitioner must still, under rule 44, apply in a matter of this kind to an election judge, or show that it is impracticable to do so. This order, even if the judge had power to make it, ought not to have been made ex parte: Buckrose Election Petition, 4 O'Mal. & H., p. 116.

Bigham, Q.C., and W. Graham, for the petitioner.—The learned judge had jurisdiction to make this order. The only rules as to election petitions which are in existence are the Parliamentary Election Petition Rules made under section 25 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and they apply to the Act of 1883. Rule 44 regulates the procedure upon interlocutory matters; such matters are to be disposed of by one of the judges upon the rota "if practicable, and if not, then by any judge at chambers." In the present case, owing to the absence of judges on other duties and the near approach of the Vacation, it was not practicable to make the application to an election judge within the time prescribed—fourteen days from the date of the return of the election expenses. Therefore, any judge at chambers had jurisdiction in the matter. [CAVE, J.—Is not section 25 of the Act of 1868, from which the existing rules derive their force, impliedly repealed by section 56, sub-section (2), of the Act of 1883?] The existing rules remain in force until superseded by new rules made under section 56, sub-section (2). The rules referred to in sub-section (1) of that section, subject to which the provisions of that section as to jurisdiction are expressed to apply, must be the rules of 1868—the only rules in existence. If the procedure laid down by section 56 is in force, and is not affected by any rules, we should have been absolutely debarred in the present case from amending our petition; under that section only a judge upon the rota can give leave to amend, and it was impossible to make the application to such a judge with the prescribed time. To prevent such an unjust result it is necessary to have rules modifying section 56, sub-section (1), and that is effected at present by rule 44 of the Rules of 1868. There is no authority showing that leave to amend a petition cannot be made ex parte.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that the order of Grantham, J., must be rescinded. In this case a petition was presented and an application was made for leave to amend it under section 40, sub-section (2), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883. [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:—] In order to ascertain how the jurisdiction to allow an amendment is to be exercised we must look at section 56, and it is, I think, agreed that the word "may" in sub-section (1) of that section is to be read as "must." In my judgment the jurisdiction to grant leave to applicants to amend their petitions and to insert new charges must be exercised by one of the judges upon the rota for the trial of election petitions or by a master in the manner directed by a judge upon the rota, and if it is exercised by a master there may be an appeal to a judge upon the rota. I do not think that the rules made under section 25 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, apply to the Act of 1883. I am clear that the rules alluded to in section 56 are those to be made under that section by the Rule Committee. It follows that Grantham, J., not being a judge upon the rota for the trial of election petitions, had no jurisdiction to make this order. But that is not all. In making an order of this kind there ought, in my opinion, to be an exercise of discretion. Here there has been no exercise of discretion whatever. The other side was not even represented before the judge at chambers, and the order was made ex parte. For these reasons I think that the order of Grantham, J. must be rescinded.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 40, sub-section (2), confers a jurisdiction which does not exist under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and section 56 provides for the manner in which that perfectly new jurisdiction is to be exercised. To my mind it is quite clear that the "rules of court" referred to in sub-section (1) of section 56 must mean such rules as may be made under sub-section (2) of that section by the Rule Committee. No such rules have been made by the Rule Committee, and therefore section 56, sub-section (1), is not subject to any rules at all. The jurisdiction to allow amendments to a petition can only be exercised by one of the judges upon the rota for election petitions.

I am inclined to agree with my brother Hawkins that the judge has no power to make such an order ex parte; but even if such a power exists it is, in my opinion, monstrous to make such an order without hearing the other side. The attention of Grantham, J., was evidently not directed to the provisions of the statute; had his attention been properly called to those provisions he would have seen at once that i is contrary to the intention of the Act that such orders should be made ex parte.

Order rescinded; leave to appeal refused.

The petitioner appealed.

Pope, Q.C. (S. H. Day with him), took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay.—Section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881*, makes the decision of the High Court upon a question of law arising under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, or any Act amending it, final unless leave to appeal be given. This was a decision upon a question of law—namely, whether a judge not on the rota has jurisdiction to amend a petition under the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, which is an Act amending the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868—and no appeal lies without leave.

Bigham, Q.C. (W. Graham and Coward with him), for the petitioner.—The "questions of law" referred to in section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, are those questions of law dealt with in the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868—namely, a special case stated before the trial under section 11, sub-section 16, and a question of law reserved at the trial under section 12. This interlocutory question is not a "question of law" contemplated by the Act of 1881. The Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, was not then in force. Harmon v. Park, 29 W. R. 750, 6 Q. B. D. 323, though decided before the Judicature Act, 1881, bears out this view.

Pope, Q.C., in reply.—Section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, is not limited to questions of law dealt with by the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868. It is unlimited, and extends to any Act amending the Act of 1868, and therefore includes the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883.

He referred to Line v. Warren, 14 Q. B. D. 548, 33 W. R. Dig. 81; Unwin v. McMullen, 39 W. R. 712, [1891] 1 Q. B. 694.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of two judges, who are on the rota for the trial of election petitions, on the question whether an order with regard to an election petition made by Grantham, J., who is not on the rota for the trial of election petitions, was right. One objection to the order was that the learned judge, not being on the rota, had no jurisdiction to make such an order. Another objection was that it was made ex parte; but it appears to me that that does not become material here, because it is clear that the two judges had jurisdiction to determine whether anything which had been done with regard to the conduct of an election petition was right or wrong. They have come to a decision on that matter, and the question is whether there is an appeal to this court. Section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, says that there shall be no appeal without leave from a decision of the High Court of Justice on a question of law arising under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, or any Act amending the same; and in this case no leave was given. It is admitted that if the words of this section are read in their ordinary sense, they are large enough to include this case. But it has been argued that, looking at certain provisions of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, we ought to put a limited meaning on the words of this section. I think that the argument which has thus been addressed to us is not enough to induce us to construe the section otherwise than in accordance with the ordinary use of language. Therefore the section includes this case, and there is no appeal.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from the order of the Divisional Court rescinding an order made by Grantham, J., at chambers, which gave leave to amend the petition presented against the successful candidate at the last election for the borough of Pontefract. Since the filing of the petition the respondent and his agent had made a return of election expenses, and the petitioner applied ex parte to Grantham, J. (who was not on the rota of the judges for the trial of election petitions), at chambers for leave to amend the petition under section 40, sub-section 2, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, by adding charges founded upon that return, and Grantham, J., gave leave. The Divisional Court (consisting of Hawkins, J., and Cave, J., both judges on the rota for the trial of election petitions) rescinded this order, upon the ground that a judge not on the rota had no jurisdiction to make the order, and also upon the ground that the order ought not to have been made ex parte. The petitioner appealed to this court, and a preliminary objection was taken that no appeal lay, upon the ground that section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, prevented an appeal. That section provides that the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice to decide questions of law upon appeal or otherwise under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, or any Act amending the same, shall be final and conclusive unless the High Court gives leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. Leave to appeal in this case was refused.

Was the point decided by the High Court a question of law? The High Court decided that Grantham, J., not being a judge on the rota for the trial of election petitions, had no jurisdiction to give leave to amend the petition. This depended on the construction of certain Acts of Parliament, and was, in my opinion, a question of law. But it was urged it was not a question of law within the meaning of section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881. It was said that the "questions of law" referred to in that section were questions of law dealt with in the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, such as a special case stated before the trial, or a question of law reserved at the trial, and that this interlocutory question of law as to the power to amend a petition was not a question contemplated by section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881. But the words of section 14 are—after enumerating certain Acts, including the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868—"or any of the said Acts or any Act amending the same respectively." The Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, was an Act amending the Act of 1868, and the power of a judge to give leave to amend under section 40 of the Act of 1883 is a question of law. The preliminary objection therefore succeeds, and the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment:—In this case Grantham, J., sitting at chambers, he not at the time being on the rota of election judges, made an order amending an election petition filed against the sitting member for the borough of Pontefract, and in so doing acted under section 40 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1883. This order was taken by way of appeal to the Divisional

* Section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881:—"The jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice to decide questions of law upon appeal or otherwise, under . . . . the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, ... or any Act amending the same, shall henceforth be final and conclusive unless in any case it shall seem fit to her Majesty's High Court to give special leave to appeal therefrom to her Majesty's Court of Appeal, whose decision in such case shall be final and conclusive."

Court, consisting of two judges upon the rota, where it was argued that Grantham, J., had no jurisdiction to make the order. The Divisional Court held this to be so, and against this judgment the present appeal is brought. That this was a question of law I cannot doubt. It was attempted to be argued before us that amending a petition is merely a matter of discretion and not of law, but the point argued in the Divisional Court was not whether the judge had properly exercised his discretion, but whether he had any jurisdiction to exercise any discretion at all, or, in other words, whether he was the right judge to make the order; and the court held that he was not. This being so, the point now to be determined is whether this is a question of law within the meaning of section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881; for, if it is, there is no appeal to this court except by leave. Section 14 reads as follows: — [The Lord Justice read the section, and proceeded:—] It was argued by Mr. Bigham, for the respondent, that the questions of law mentioned in section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, were limited to those which were specifically mentioned in the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, such as in section 11, sub-section 16, and in section 12; but it must be remarked that section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, embraces questions of law arising not only under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, but any Act amending the same. No one can say that the Act of 1883 does not amend the Act of 1868: for instance, I may take section 43 of the Act of 1868, whereby a candidate found by the report of a judge upon an election petition guilty of bribery shall be incapable of sitting in the House of Commons during the seven years next after the date of his being found guilty, whereas, by section 4 of the Act of 1883, he is incapacitated for ever from being elected for the county or borough in which he has been found guilty. It will be seen that it is upon a question of law arising under the Act of 1883, which amends the Act of 1868, that the present point now arises, and consequently, in my judgment, there is no appeal except upon special leave. The case of Harmon v. Park, in the year 1880, was decided upon an Act which enacted that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas should be final when it gave its decision upon a special case; and it was there held that there was an appeal upon a decision on an interlocutory matter not raised by special case; but this decision was before the Act of 1881, which makes the decision of the Divisional Court final upon questions of law, no matter how raised, except special leave be given to appeal. The cases of Line v. Warren and Unwin v. M'Mullen, cited in argument, do not apply to the present point. For these reasons, in my judgment, the question decided by the Divisional Court was a question of law within section 14 of the Judicature Act, 1881, and consequently there is no appeal to this court, no special leave in that behalf having been granted.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the petitioner, H. W. Chatterton.

Solicitor for the respondent, Day, Russell, & Co.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) May 9

HILL v. COOPER. (a.)

Married woman—Protection order—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Power to contract—Judgment against married woman—Equitable execution—Receiver—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 18[illegible] (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 21, 25, 26.

A married woman, who was possessed of a life inter[illegible] in leasehold property for her separate estate, with[illegible] power of anticipation, obtained a protection order un[illegible] section 21 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes A[illegible] 1857. She subsequently mortgaged her life interest, a[illegible] the mortgagee obtained judgment against her in an ac[illegible] on her covenant to pay the mortgage debt.

Held, that, notwithstanding sections 21 and 26 of [illegible] Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, the restraint [illegible] anticipation still attached, and therefore a receiver of [illegible] rents and profits of the leasehold property could n[illegible] appointed by way of equitable execution.

Appeal from an order of a divisional court (W[illegible] and Charles, JJ.) dismissing an application to app[illegible] a receiver of the rents and profits of certain leas[illegible] premises.

In 1869 the father of the defendant, who was [illegible] an unmarried woman, died, having by his will [illegible] queathed certain leasehold property to trustees [illegible] trust to pay the rents and profits thereof to [illegible] daughter, the defendant, for life, for her separate [illegible] without power of anticipation, with trusts over. [illegible] defendant subsequently married, but in 1878 [illegible] husband deserted her. In consequence thereof [illegible] obtained from a metropolitan police magistrate a [illegible] tection order under section 21 of the Divorce [illegible] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. In 1889 the def[illegible] ant executed a mortgage of her life interest in [illegible] leasehold property, which mortgage was in [illegible] transferred to the plaintiff.

The defendant having made default in payme[illegible] interest on the mortgage debt, the plaintiff c[illegible] menced an action against her as against a feme [illegible] on her covenant to pay, and on the 3rd of Febr[illegible] 1893, obtained judgment against her in that a[illegible] The plaintiff then applied for the appointment [illegible] receiver of the rents and profits of the propert[illegible] way of equitable execution. This application [illegible] refused by the judge at chambers and also by [illegible] Divisional Court, on the ground that the property [illegible] not been acquired by the defendant since the dea[illegible] of her by her husband, and that the restraint ag[illegible] anticipation still continued to operate.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Butcher (Phillpotts [illegible] them), for the plaintiff.—The effect of sections 2[illegible] 26 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, [illegible] is that the defendant has, for the purposes of [illegible] tracting and suing and being sued, lost her stat[illegible] married woman, and is for such purposes to be t[illegible] as a feme sole. By section 21 a magistrate, if sa[illegible] of the fact that a wife has been deserted by her [illegible] band, "and that the same was without reas[illegible] cause, and that the wife is maintaining herself b[illegible] own industry or property, may make and give [illegible] wife an order protecting her earnings and pro[illegible] acquired since the commencement of such des[illegible] from her husband and all creditors and p[illegible] claiming under him, and such earnings and pro[illegible] shall belong to the wife as if she were a feme [illegible]

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister [illegible] Law.

. . . if any such order of protection be made, the wife shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been during such desertion of her in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts and suing and being sued, as she would be under this Act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." By section 25, "In every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, from the date of the sentence, and whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her; and such property may be disposed of by her in all respects as a feme sole." By section 26, "In every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, while so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract and wrongs and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding." The defendant being liable to be sued as a feme sole, it follows that the restraint on anticipation has gone, and there is no objection to the appointment of a receiver. The plaintiff is suing the defendant on her contract to pay, and the power to contract given by section 26 is a general power; there is no reason why a woman should not enter into a contract, after the making of a protection order, with regard to property which belonged to her before the protection order. The case of Waite v. Morland, 36 W. R. 484, 38 Ch. D. 135, was a decision on section 25, the court there holding that that section did not apply to property to which the wife was at the time of the decree entitled in possession. But there is a difference between the language of section 21 and that of section 25. Section 21 includes all property "acquired since the commencement of such desertion." The rents in question have been acquired by the defendant since the desertion, though she became entitled to them before.

They also cited Ramsden v. Brearley, 23 W. R. 294, L. R. 10 Q. B. 147, and Stogdon v. Lee, 39 W. R. 467, [1891] 1 Q. B. 661.

C. C. Scott, for the defendant.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed. As to what has been said with regard to the status of a married woman, it is clear that a married woman remains a married woman till her husband is dead or she is divorced. This Act of Parliament deals with circumstances which may arise while she is a married woman; it does not deal with circumstances which exist before she is married or after she has ceased to be a married woman. It treats her as a married woman, and says that with regard to certain circumstances certain consequences are to follow. The object of section 21 is to enable a married woman, who has been deserted by her husband, to obtain an order protecting her property against her husband. It says that although she is a married woman, yet, if she gets such an order, her property shall be protected against her husband. But the Legislature thought it would not interfere with property which she had before her desertion; it, therefore, enacted that the order should only apply to property which she might acquire after such desertion. Then at the end of the section come these words: "If any such order of protection be made, the wife"—the statute by calling her the wife expressly leaves her still a married woman—"shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been during such desertion of her in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts and suing and being sued, as she would be under this Act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." This refers us on to sections 25 and 26, which deal with the case of judicial separation, and which take separately the things which are taken jointly in section 21. Section 25 says that in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire, or which may come to or devolve upon her. A question arose whether this section applied to property to which the wife was entitled in possession at the date of the decree for judicial separation. But this was settled in Waite v. Morland. I think that the effect of the decision in that case is that the section only applies to property which the wife may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her after the governing date—i.e., either the decree for judicial separation or the desertion. Then we come to section 26, which says nothing about property at all, but enacts that the wife, while separated, shall be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding. It also adds something not mentioned in section 21—viz, "wrongs and injuries"; but it does not deal with property. Now, in the present case an attempt is made to deal with property—viz., the property of a married woman which was hers before she was deserted by her husband. Such property does not come within section 25, which, as we have seen, is limited to after-acquired property; and no property at all is dealt with by section 26. With regard to this property, then, the defendant remains in the position of a married woman; and her father's will, under which she acquired the property, says that so long as she is a married woman she is to be restrained from anticipating the rents and profits. It is clear that that makes it impossible to appoint a receiver. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, E. H. Goddard.

Solicitor for the defendant, E. B. Lawes.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) — March 1.

NORTH AUSTRALIAN TERRITORY CO. v. GOLDSBOROUGH, MORT, & CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Practice—Discovery—Production of documents—Examination of witness—Depositions—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115.

The liquidator of a joint-stock company, which had been ordered to be wound up, commenced an action in the name of the company to set aside a contract for the purchase of lands. The liquidator then obtained an order under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, for the examination of certain persons. Subsequently to their examinations being taken, a commission was issued in the action to take evidence abroad, and one of the witnesses who had been examined under section 115 was examined under the commission on behalf of the defendants, and, upon his cross-examination, certain of his answers were read to him from the depositions taken under section 115, and he was asked whether the statements therein contained were correct, and he said that they were. Certain questions were also put to him from the depositions with regard to the answers given by other witnesses. The defendants applied for inspection of those parts of the depositions which had been referred to on the cross-examination.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the defendants were not entitled to the inspection claimed.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., dismissing an application by the defendants for leave to inspect and take copies of certain depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862.

The plaintiffs, an English company registered under the Companies Acts, was formed for the purpose of purchasing certain land in Australia from one Fisher and his mortgagees the present defendants, and a contract for the purchase was entered into. In August, 1889, the plaintiff company was ordered to be wound up.

In November, 1889, the present action was commenced by the liquidator in the name of the company to set aside the contract for purchase upon the ground of misrepresentation. Subsequently, the liquidator obtained an order under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, for the examination of certain persons, among others, Mr. Murray Smith, Mr. Vicary Gibbs, Mr. Charles Parbury, and Mr. T. Archer, who were in this country, and their examinations were accordingly taken. Afterwards an order was made in the action for a commission to issue to take the evidence of certain witnesses in Melbourne, and among other witnesses Mr. Murray Smith, who had then returned to Melbourne, was examined on behalf of the defendants. In cross-examination on behalf of the plaintiff company, the witness was asked whether he did not make certain statements in his examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the witness replied that he could not say unless the answers were read to him. Thereupon certain of his answers were read to him from a copy of the depositions, and he was asked whether the statements contained in those answers were not correct, and he stated that they were. Certain answers given by Mr. Vicary Gibbs, Mr. Charles Parbury, and Mr. T. Archer were also read to the witness, and questions were put to him upon those answers. The depositions themselves were not put in, nor did the defendants or the witnesses see them or have copies of them. The defendants took out a summons before Kekewich, J., for liberty to inspect and take copies of the depositions taken on the examinations of Messrs. Vicary Gibbs, Charles Parbury, and T. Archer by the liquidator of the plaintiff company under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the application.

The defendants appealed.

Latham, Q.C., and Pollard, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs having used the depositions for the purposes of cross-examination, and having read extracts from them, the defendants are entitled to see them. The plaintiffs ought to have disclosed them in their affidavit of documents, when the defendants could have got inspection of them, and the plaintiffs cannot be in any better position by having omitted to do so. [They referred to In re Grey's Brewery Co., 32 W. R. 381, at p. 384, 25 Ch. D. 400, at p. 408.] Secondly, the learned judge in his discretion ought to have allowed inspection, as it would be unfair to the defendants that they should go to trial in ignorance of the contents of the depositions to which the plaintiffs have access.

Warmington, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff company brought an action against the defendants to rescind a contract for the purchase of certain lands in Australia. The plaintiff company is in liquidation, and after the action had been commenced the liquidator obtained an order under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, to examine certain persons, among them Mr. Murray Smith. It was suggested, though the suggestion was not pressed, that this examination under section 115 could not properly be taken after the litigation had commenced. I can see no such limitation in the section. If the examination takes place before the commencement of the action, it enables the company or the liquidator to consider and decide whether he will initiate the litigation. If it takes place after the action has been commenced, it enables the company or the liquidator to decide whether it is worth while to proceed with the litigation. There is nothing in the section to show that there is any distinction between those two reasons for bringing the section into operation. Now after the examinations under section 115 had been taken, a commission in the action was issued to examine witnesses in Melbourne. That examination ought to be conducted in the same way as if those witnesses were being examined before the court at the trial of the action. Among other witnesses who were examined under that commission was Mr. Murray Smith. Upon his cross-examination he was asked whether, in his examination under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, he did not make certain statements. He admitted that he did. Therefore there was no occasion to contradict him. But if there were occasion to contradict him, let me consider what would be the proper course. He is asked, "Did not you say so and so, and was it not taken down in writing?" He says, "Yes, it was taken down and reduced into writing." "But did you say it?" He says, "I do not wish to answer that question until I have heard what was said." He has no right to say so. He is bound to say whether he denies it or not. If he denies what the previous examination is supposed to prove that he did say, he can be contradicted, if it is considered desirable to contradict him, by reading what he did say before. But if that is done the document which contains what he did say before is put in; it is put in by those who are cross-examining the witness for the purpose of contradicting him; and then, if that be so, part of it being put in, the whole is put in. Therefore, it is only after he is asked the question that it can be read to him; otherwise it cannot be used to contradict him. But if it is used for the purpose of contradicting him, it all goes in.

Now in the examination under the commission the witness was asked questions as to what other persons had said in their depositions under section 115—that is to say, he was hardly asked whether they said so and so, but he was told that they had said certain things, and he was then asked whether he would contradict them. Those questions ought never to have been put. They were objected to, and the commissioner took down the objection. If at the trial the questions and answers are attempted to be read the court will decline to admit them. The answers to those questions will never be given in evidence. The result, therefore, is this, that what is said upon an examination under section 115 never can be used as evidence, or as proof, except for the purpose of contradicting a witness. The examinations are not taken as was suggested, as proofs. They are taken for the purpose of obtaining knowledge. That is all. They are not proofs, and never can be used as proofs. They were not taken as evidence or as proofs; they were taken merely as information. No doubt it is a severe method of procedure, but the Legislature has given the right to have this information obtained in this way. I have stated that what the witness said could only be used by way of contradiction. That is a new law. It is laid down in section 1,446 in Taylor on Evidence. That section puts the case exactly as I have put it. The witness is bound to answer the question. He cannot insist upon seeing what he has written, or what has been taken down in writing as to what he said, before he answers. If he does not contradict what he has said before, there is no use in going further as to what he has said before. He says so at the time, and that is his evidence. If he denies it, he can be contradicted by showing what he said before. It goes to his credit, that is all; it proves nothing. What he has said before does not prove the fact. But to show that he is not the witness of truth, that is, to contradict him, and to get rid of the evidence which he is giving before the court, it must be read to him before it can be read as contradiction against him, in order to give him an opportunity of explaining what he said. That being so, it seems to me quite clear that a party cannot have a right to see the depositions of the witness for the purpose of enabling that party to see the information which the liquidator has been enabled to get under section 115.

But it is then said that Kekewich, J., ought, in the exercise of his discretion, to have allowed the defendants to see this information now, on the ground that it would be unjust that the one side should have the information and the other side should not. The answer to that contention is that it cannot be unjust when the object of section 115 is to give one side certain information and there is no provision that that information shall be disclosed. It is merely information. It is not unjust that the person who is conducting the litigation should have information which the other side has not got. It may be that, as a matter of discretion, Kekewich, J., might have made an order allowing this information to be seen now. But he has refused to allow it to be seen at this stage. He has not said that he will not allow it to be seen at the trial. How can we overrule that exercise of his discretion? How can we say that it was so manifestly a wrong exercise of his discretion that this court can overrule it? So far from saying that it was a wrong exercise of discretion, I entirely agree with the learned judge. There is nothing to show that the defendants ought to have the information now, and, indeed, I should be more inclined to say that the learned judge would have been wrong if he had allowed them to see the document now. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned judge was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed. I merely desire to add that the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Grey's Brewery Co. does not touch this case at all.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the commission certain witnesses were called by the defendants and were cross-examined on behalf of the plaintiff company, and the counsel engaged in that cross-examination was supplied, for the purpose of cross-examination, with copies of the depositions which had been taken under section 115. The counsel made certain use, which has been detailed by the Master of the Rolls, of those depositions, and it is contended that on account of the use which he made of them the defendants are entitled to see them. Upon what ground can that contention be put? It was argued that the defendants were entitled to see them because they ought to have been scheduled by the plaintiff company in the affidavit of documents as being documents in their possession relating to the matter in question in the suit. If they had been scheduled, privilege would have been claimed for them, and the defendants would not have had inspection of them. Whether the depositions were or were not in their possession I do not pause to consider, because it would not be fair to the plaintiff company to treat the depositions as admitted by them to be in their possession without giving them credit for claiming privilege for them. It is obvious that the defendants never could have got these depositions under any machinery of inspection under the affidavit of documents, if the affidavit had been drawn with reasonable care.

Then it was said that there is something unfair in not letting the defendants know the contents of the depositions. I do not see that at all. It appears to me to be merely an attempt on the part of one litigant to find out how the other litigant is going to make out his case. I see nothing unfair in any use that has been made of these depositions, whatever may be done at the trial. Kekewich, J., has the control of these documents, and he can make any order for the production or otherwise at the trial that he thinks proper. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Saunders, Hawksford, Bennett, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Freshfield & Williams.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) — Dec. 14.

POULETT v. HILL. (a.)

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Personal judgment on the covenant—Second action for interest—Vexatious action—Practice—Receiver—Interest claimed as liquidated sum—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14.

While an action by mortgagee for foreclosure and for personal judgment against the mortgagor on the covenant was pending, the mortgagee brought a second action against the mortgagor for payment of the interest on the mortgage down to the date of the second action.

Held (reversing Kekewich, J.), that the second action should be stayed as vexatious, because the interest claimed in the second action was recoverable in the first action according to the form of order settled by the Court of Appeal in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co., 33 W. R. 265, 28 Ch. D. 482.

Where there is a receiver of mortgage hereditaments, although the rents be insufficient to keep down the interest on the mortgage debt, no liquidated sum can be claimed in respect of the interest, and therefore the mortgagee cannot issue a specially-indorsed writ claiming payment of a specific sum in respect of the interest.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

On the 26th of May, 1891, the same persons as were plaintiffs in the present action brought an action against the same person as was the defendant in the present action, in which they claimed an order for personal judgment against the defendant in respect of the principal and interest of a mortgage debt; an account of what was due thereon; in default of payment, foreclosure; and a receiver.

On the 15th of June, 1891, an order was made in that action appointing the equitable tenant for life of the mortgage debt, receiver of the rents and profits of the mortgage hereditaments, and the receiver was ordered to retain the arrears of interest and the current interest out of the rents and profits (from time to time), and to keep down the interest. The pleadings in that action had closed, but notice of trial had not, up to the 20th of September, 1892, been given. The rents proved insufficient to keep down the interest.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 20th of September, 1892, the writ in the present action was issued; the writ was specially indorsed for £1,106 18s. 3d., and the particulars were as follows: two years' interest (less income tax) on the mortgage, from the 24th of August, 1890, £2,699 14s. 8d., less £1,592 16s. 5d., the amount of rents in the hands of the receiver, together with a small sum of purchase-money received from sale of a portion of the mortgaged property, leaving a balance of £1,106 18s. 3d. The plaintiffs in the present action took out a summons for immediate judgment under order 14 for that sum. The defendant thereupon took out a summons to have the present action stayed as vexatious. Both summonses were heard together, and Kekewich, J., made an order directing the defendant to pay the sum of £1,106 18s. 3d., and that the present action be stayed. The defendant moved to discharge the order, and on the 2nd of December, 1892, Kekewich, J., dismissed the motion.

The defendant appealed.

Warrington, for the appellant, the defendant.—The judge has made an order under R. S. C., order 14, for payment by the defendant of £1,106 18s. 3d. But the defendant does not admit that that exact sum is due by him, and the writ ought not to have been specially indorsed, as the interest due is a fluctuating sum, as rents are being received by the receiver which reduce the sum due for interest. The present action is vexatious, because the plaintiffs could recover, in the first action, the whole of the interest which they claim in this action: Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co., 33 W. R. 265, 28 Ch. D. 482.

Carson, for the plaintiffs.—The only order the plaintiffs would have got in the first action would, in the first instance, have been an order for an account; but the plaintiffs wanted to have immediate payment of the arrears of interest, which are in fact due; the plaintiffs did not want personal judgment against the defendant for the principal, but only payment of the interest. The rents are insufficient to pay the interest. The present action is, therefore, not vexatious, and it cannot be stayed unless it be vexatious.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case the learned judge has made a mistake, which is attributable to a wish to save costs. On the 26th of May, 1891, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant for foreclosure, and by the writ they claimed not only foreclosure, but also, as the practice has been since the passing of the Judicature Acts, a personal order for payment. Under that writ an account of what is due would be directed—an account which, being taken on the footing on which such accounts were always taken in chancery, would include interest down to the date of the certificate, and an order would be made for personal payment of the amount found due. Before the Judicature Acts a personal order for payment could only be obtained by bringing a common law action, in which interest could only be recovered down to the date of the writ, and a personal order for payment of the subsequent interest could only be obtained by a fresh action. But now that a personal order can be obtained for payment of what is found due on taking the account, such second action is not necessary.

In Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co. the form of judgment was settled by the Court of Appeal. Whether this particular point was present to the mind of the court is not quite clear; but a general form was settled, giving a personal order for payment of what was found due for principal and interest on taking an account, so that the necessity for a subsequent action for interest is taken away. The plaintiffs, then, could in the first action have obtained a personal order for payment of all that was due to them for principal and interest, and the present action is unnecessary. If we were to affirm the order under appeal our decision would lead to the bringing of improper and vexatious actions, and, though I believe that the attempt to recover in the present action was well meant, it was a mistake.

I am, further, of opinion that this is not a case for the application of order 14, for, having regard to the receipt of rents by the receiver, the amount claimed was not a liquidated sum within the meaning of ord. 3, r. 6. The order must be discharged, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—A fusion of law and equity has taken place, and according to Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co. it is clear that the plaintiffs can obtain in the first action everything to which they are entitled, yet they bring a second action. This second action is unnecessary. Under the old practice a plea of abatement of a pending action would have been a perfectly good plea to the present action, all the relief sought in the second action being covered by the first. The order must be discharged.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The form in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co. runs thus:—"The court doth order and adjudge that the following account be taken: (1) An account of what is due to the plaintiff for principal and interest under the defendant's covenant to pay contained in the indenture of mortgage dated. . . . And it is ordered that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant the amount which shall be certified to be due to him on taking the said account, and also so much of his costs of this action as would have been incurred if it had been brought for payment only, such costs to be taxed by the taxing master." The reason is obvious: the court, now having jurisdiction to make a personal order for payment, wished to make the different parts of the order consistent by giving the same amount of principal and interest under the covenant as would be found due on taking the account for ascertaining what must be paid to avoid foreclosure, thus making it unnecessary to bring a second action for arrears of interest when no second action is wanted to obtain foreclosure. The object was to make successive actions unnecessary. I think that it was quite within the power of the court to adopt this form of order, for it is a mere matter of procedure. The strong ground for making orders in this form being to prevent multiplicity of actions, it is most improper, after a foreclosure action has been commenced, to bring a second action for arrears of interest, and if we sanctioned the order now under appeal we should be sanctioning a revival of that practice. When an action has been brought by which the plaintiff can recover everything to which he is entitled, he ought not to bring another. Moreover, this second action includes some interest which had become due before the issue of the writ in the first action. The second action is wrong in every way. The plaintiffs, too, were wrong in supposing that order 14 could be resorted to. A receiver being in receipt of the rents, the writ could not under ord. 3, r. 6, be specially indorsed for a liquidated sum.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Stibbard, Gibson, & Co., for Rowlands & Co., Birmingham; Hulberts & Hussey.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. April 12.

In re AMES.
AMES v. AMES. (a.)

Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 37, 51 —Sanction of court to sale of heirlooms—Proviso in restraint of sale of land.

A testator by his will settled real estate and bequeathed chattels as heirlooms. He directed his trustees to hold a sum of £4,000 on trust to keep up part of the estate, and to pay the surplus income to the person for the time being entitled to possession, with a proviso that, if such person alienated the property, the £4,000 was to fall into the residue. The tenant for life, under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, sold the estate. He also sold some of the heirlooms. On summons to obtain the sanction of the court to the sale of the heirlooms, and declare the rights of the parties in the £4,000,

Held, that the court could not, ex post facto, sanction the sale of the heirlooms already sold, under section 37 of the Settled Land Act; and that the provision in the will directing the £4,000 to fall into the residue on alienation was void under section 51.

Summons.

John Ames, who died in 1867, by his will, with codicils thereto, devised a mansion-house and lands in Devonshire to trustees on trusts for persons successively in strict settlement, and bequeathed furniture and chattels to be held with the mansion-house by way of heirlooms. And the testator gave to his trustees a sum of £4,000 Consols upon trust to apply the dividends thereof during certain named lives, of which the plaintiff's was one, to the maintenance and repair of a sea wall upon the property, and subject thereto to preserving in good repair walks and drives therein, any surplus to be paid to the person for the time being entitled to the possession of the property, and after the death of the survivor of the named lives to hold the capital for the person entitled to possession absolutely. And the testator further directed that if at any time during the continuance of the trusts of the £4,000 the person for the time being entitled under his will to the possession or to the receipt of the rents and profits of the property should by alienation or other act of his cease to be entitled to such possession or receipt, then the trusts declared of the £4,000 were to cease, and the same was to fall into his residuary personal estate.

In October, 1892, the plaintiff, H. St. Vincent Ames, the present tenant for life, under the testator's will, with the consent of trustees appointed for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, sold the property settled by the will, together with some of the heirlooms.

This was an originating summons by the plaintiff, to which the trustees of the will, the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and the residuary legatee were defendants, (1) to obtain the sanction of the court to the sale of the heirlooms already sold, and to authorize the sale of the remainder; and (2) that the rights of the parties in the £4,000 might be declared.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the plaintiff.—The proviso that the £4,000 is to fall into the residue on alienation is void under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 51, sub-section 1, which provides that "if in a settlement . . . a provision is inserted . . . attempting or tending . . . by a disposition . . . of any personal property, or . . . by forfeiture, or in any other manner whatsoever, to prohibit or prevent a tenant for life from exercising, or to induce him to abstain from exercising, . . . any power under this Act, that provision . . . shall be deemed to be void."

Everett, Q.C., and Stewart-Smith, for the residuary legatee.

H. Towry Law, for the trustees.

NORTH, J., said that he could not, under section 37 of the Settled Land Act, sanction ex post facto the sale of the heirlooms already sold, but that the summons might be amended by the insertion of a question as to whether the trustees ought to take steps to recover the heirlooms which had been sold without the sanction of the court, when a declaration would be made that the trustees need take no such steps. [His lordship sanctioned the sale of the remainder of the heirlooms, and continued:—] With regard to the proviso in the will that the £4,000 is to fall into the residue on alienation, I think section 51 of the Settled Land Act applies. [His lordship then read the will above set out, and continued:—] Therefore the plaintiff, the tenant for life, is entitled to have the income of this £4,000 applied in keeping up the sea-wall and drives, &c., on the estate, and if it is so applied he is in a better position with regard to the property than he would be if he possessed it minus the amenities produced by that income. To that extent, therefore, the property is increased in value for him. Now if he parts with the property he will lose that benefit, for he cannot sell that. So that if he refrains from selling he has the benefit of the extra expenditure upon it of the income of the £4,000, an expenditure which would otherwise have to come out of his own pocket, and although possibly there might be no surplus to go into his pocket, still he has an estate which, while it remains in his possession, is worth more to him by the income of the £4,000 than it would be if he parted with it, when, by the proviso in the will, it is to cease to come to him, as it is given to the person entitled to the residue. I think that is a state of affairs against which the words of section 51 are directed. [His lordship read section 51, and continued:—] In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is still entitled to the receipt of the income of the £4,000, and I must make a declaration that, notwithstanding the sale, no change is to be made as to the payments of the income of the £4,000 to the plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff and trustees, Burch, Whitehead, & Davidsons.

Solicitors for the residuary legatee, Guscotte, Wadham, & Co.

Chan. Div. North, J. March 4.

In re TUCKER.
TUCKER v. TUCKER. (a.)

Annuity charge by codicil on estate—Devise of estate in settlement subject to charge—Charge on corpus or income—Annuity in arrear—Mortgage or sale of settled estate to meet annuity.

The testator, by a codicil to his will, devised certain yearly rent-charges to his trustees to be paid to certain persons, and subject to and charged therewith he devised an estate to certain persons for life, with remainders over. The annuities having fallen into arrears, and the rents of the estate being insufficient to meet them,

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that they must be paid by a sale or mortgage of the settled estate.

Henry Tucker by his will, dated the 27th of August, 1873, appointed the defendant William Tucker, James Kayess, and Eli H. Mead executors and trustees thereof.

By clause 3 of his will the testator devised to his trustees a yearly rent-charge of £300 during the joint lives of the testator's wife, Elizabeth Tucker, and the plaintiff upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the same, and by clause 7 testator directed his trustees to pay the said rent-charge to the plaintiff, subject to certain conditions as to bankruptcy or attempted alienation on his part.

By a codicil to his will, dated the 4th of April, 1874, testator revoked, inter alia, clauses 3 and 7 of his will, and in lieu thereof devised to his trustees the five yearly rent-charges following, namely, one of £40 during the life of Ann Hill, one of £50 during the life of Annie Parris, one of £50 during the life of Elizabeth P. Gillmore, one of £50 during the life of Jane Mead, and one of £300 during the life of the plaintiff, and directed that the rent-charge of £300 should be held upon the trusts by clause 7 in the testator's said will declared respecting the rent-charge by clause 3 in his said will devised. Clause 7 in the said codicil was as follows:—"I direct that the five several yearly rent-charges hereinbefore devised shall respectively be charged upon and issuing out of my said Hinton estate exclusively, and shall respectively be paid quarterly, the first payment in respect of each yearly rent-charge to be made on the expiration of three calendar months after my decease if the person during whose life the rent-charge is given shall then be living. And I empower my trustees by distress, and also by entry upon and by perception of the rents and profits of my said Hinton estate, or any part thereof, to recover payment of all or any of the said rent-charges when in arrear for twenty-eight days." By clause 5 the testator (subject to and charged with the five several rent-charges thereinbefore devised and the remedies for recovering payment thereof) devised his said Hinton estate to the use of his said wife and her assigns during her life, with remainder to the use of the defendant Henry Emilius Tucker and his assigns during his life, with remainder to the use of his child if only one, or all his children if more than one, who either in his lifetime or after his decease being a son or sons attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry, and his, her, or their respective heirs and assigns, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common, with remainders over, but in the event of there being no child who should attain a vested interest under the above provision, the testator devised his said Hinton estate upon the trusts declared in his will concerning his estates in the counties of Berks and Wilts; "but not so as to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging." The testator died on the 17th of January, 1875, and his will and codicil were proved by his executors on the 14th of April, 1875. On the testator's death his widow entered into possession of the Hinton estate, and down to the 17th of July, 1891, the charges were duly paid to the persons entitled.

After her death, on the 26th of July, 1891, no payments were made, and the rental of the estate had been so reduced by agricultural depression and other causes that the gross rents received were less than the sums charged.

Proceedings were then commenced in the Chancery Division by the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and certain other annuitants, to obtain payment of the sums so charged by a sale or mortgage of the said estates, and for a declaration that the persons entitled to the charges were entitled to have the deficiency made good out of the said estates, and for administration of the estate.

The writ was issued on the 12th of February, 1892, and on the 2nd of April, 1892, the plaintiff was appointed by North, J., receiver of the rents and profits of the Hinton estate. On the 25th of June North, J., gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, without making any declaration as to whether or not the rent-charges were charged on the corpus of the estate. An inquiry, as sought in the statement of claim, was also directed to ascertain the persons then entitled to the several rent-charges, and the amounts due. On the 29th of November, 1892, the chief clerk filed his certificate as to these facts, and on the 6th of December the plaintiff took out a summons that he might be permitted to raise the arrears of the rent-charges by a mortgage of a competent part of the estate. On the adjournment of the summons into court,

S. Hall, Q.C., and H. Terrell, for the plaintiff.—These annuities are charged on the estate, and in spite of the settlement they ought to be raised by mortgage: Cupit v. Jackson, 13 Price, 721. [NORTH, J.—There it was taken for granted that the annuities were a charge on the corpus.] Cupit v. Jackson was followed in White v. James, 7 W. R. 35, 26 Beav. 191, against Graves v. Hicks, 11 Sim., p. 551. [They also referred to Pettinger v. Ambler, 34 Beav. 542, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 146; Todd v. Bielby, 27 Beav. 353, 354 n; and Birch v. Sherratt, 16 W. R. 30, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 644.] Horton v. Hall, 22 W. R. 391, L. R. 17 Eq. 437, a decision of Hall, V.C., is also in our favour. We admit, however, that that case cannot be reconciled with the decision of the same judge in Taylor v. Taylor, 22 W. R. 349, L. R. 17 Eq. 324, unless the Vice-Chancellor meant that where an estate is in strict settlement an annuity cannot be charged on the corpus, but we say that, in case of a settled estate, it is impossible to make a charge on the corpus except by using the words used by this testator and by the testator in In re Taylor.

They referred also to Pearson v. Helliwell, 22 W. R. 839, L. R. 18 Eq. 411.

W. C. Fooks, for the trustees and the two other annuitants.

C. Herbert Brown, for the parties interested in the estate.—There is grave doubt if the words are sufficient to constitute a charge on the corpus. In the case of a settled estate, to take annuities out of the corpus produces great confusion, and in any case the court must exercise a discretion: Graves v. Hicks; Picard v. Mitchell, 14 Beav. 103; Taylor v. Taylor. This is a case of strict settlement as defined by Hall, V.C., in Taylor v. Taylor: there is an estate to one person for life with remainders over. As the court clearly has a discretion whether or not these annuities should be raised from the corpus, this is a case in which it should be loth to exercise such discretion.

NORTH, J.—The question turns on the construction of the codicil. Should these annuities be charged on the income or on the corpus? Now in the codicil the testator devises to his trustees five several rent-charges, amounting altogether to £490, in trust for certain annuitants. In the next clause of the codicil (clause 3) he says: "I direct that the five several yearly rent-charges shall be respectively charged upon and issuing out of my said Hinton estate exclusively." Pausing there, there is no reference whatever to income. [His lordship then read clause 4 of the codicil, and continued:—] Then he gives his trustees power to recover payment by distress or entry. But these are not the only remedies, and he does not by these words cut down the effect of the prior charge. By the 5th clause, "subject to and charged with the five several rent-charges," he devises his estate, and here follow the limitations. I cannot doubt that this is a charge on the corpus of the estate as distinguished from the income.

In taking this view I follow Cupit v. Jackson and Picard v. Mitchell, in which latter case neither Cupit v. Jackson nor Graves v. Hicks were cited, but Lord Romilly, M.R., was of opinion that the estate was liable to be sold to satisfy the annuities. Birch v. Sherratt and Mason v. Robinson, 26 W. R. 734, 8 Ch. D. 411, are authorities that such annuities are charged on capital; and independent of authority I should have taken the view that these annuities should be raised by mortgage. This view is not consistent with the reported decision of Hall, V.C., in Taylor v. Taylor. But Taylor v. Taylor, as reported, is an unsatisfactory case. In the later case of Horton v. Hall, which was heard before the same judge about a fortnight after his decision in Taylor v. Taylor, he gives a different reason for his decision in that case to that which is given in the report. I am therefore of opinion that the annuities are charged on the corpus. Still, even when annuities are charged on the corpus, the court has still a discretion whether or not it will order them to be raised by mortgage or sale. The income of the estate, through agricultural depression, has been greatly reduced, so that there is not a sufficient sum left to meet the annuities, and there has been no evidence that the depression has arisen from causes which are likely to cease at an early date, and it therefore seems a case in which, if I have power to assist them, I ought to direct that the annuitants should no longer be kept out. It was not decided in Graves v. Hicks that under no circumstances can the arrears of an annuity be raised by the sale or mortgage of a settled estate. In that case it was recognized that the annuity was charged on the corpus; but if you cannot raise the money for the payment of the annuity, what is the meaning of a charge on the corpus? There are a large number of authorities in which Graves v. Hicks has not been followed: in Picard v. Mitchell; White v. James, in which case the Master of the Rolls expressed himself bound by Cupit v. Jackson; Todd v. Bielby, 27 Beav. 353; Pettinger v. Ambler; Hall v. Hurt, 2 J. & H. 76, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 5, which was decided by Lord Hatherley. Looking at the authorities, the decision in Taylor v. Taylor appears unsatisfactory, without even taking into consideration the contrary judgment of Hall, V.C., in Horton v. Hall, and I cannot treat it as an authority for doubting that the amount due under these annuities can be raised by sale or mortgage. I am accordingly of the opinion that the annuities are charged on the corpus of the settled estate, and the arrears must be raised by a sale or mortgage of the estate so charged.

All parties concurring that the arrears should be raised by mortgage, his lordship directed a reference to chambers for the purpose.

Solicitors, Rooke & Son; Hughes & Sons.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Jan. 24, 25.

In re KIDD AND GIBBON'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Succession duty—Sale subject to leases, but free from incumbrances—Leases at ground-rents—Duty payable in respect of increased value on determination of leases—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 20.

Land subject to leases at ground-rents was sold subject to leases, but free from incumbrances, the contract making no provision as to the payment of succession duty.

Held, that the succession duty payable in respect of the increased value of the property on the determination of the leases, payment of which had been postponed in accordance with section 20 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, must be borne by the vendors.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, by a purchaser of real estate, asking for a declaration that the vendors were liable for the succession duty in respect of the whole of their interest in the property contracted to be sold.

The contract was dated the 31st of March, 1892, and contained (inter alia) the following clauses:—

"1. The vendors are to sell and the purchaser is to purchase at the price of £41,000 the freehold property described in the schedule hereto, subject to the leases affecting the same, but free from incumbrances."

"4. The abstract of title is to commence with certain indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 1st and 2nd of July, 1818. Part of the property was demised by lease (still subsisting) dated in 1813, and the remaining portion was demised by lease (still subsisting) dated in 1814. Counterparts or copies of the said two leases have been produced to the purchaser, and he shall be deemed to purchase with notice of all the contents thereof."

"6. The property is sold subject to all quit, chief, and other rents, rights of way and other easements (if any) affecting the same, and to any subsisting liability, under enclosure award, covenant, or otherwise, to repair the fences, roads, or streets, and to the rights of the tenants to fixtures (if any), or to their statutory rights."

"7. The vendors are the only children of Robert Charles Kidd, deceased, named in the will of Fanny Kidd, dated the 28th of December, 1862. The purchaser shall not require any evidence of this fact, or of the deaths of the said Robert Charles Kidd and his wife, Mary Jane Kidd, other than a statutory declaration of those facts."

The contract contained no provision for the payment of succession duty.

The title of the vendors was derived from the will of Fanny Kidd, who devised the property to her son, Robert Charles Kidd for life, with remainder to his wife, Mary Jane Kidd, for life, with remainder to their children, the vendors.

Upon the death of Mary Jane Kidd, who survived her husband, succession duty on the value of the ground-rents was paid, payment of the duty in respect of the increased value of the property upon the determination of the leases being postponed until such determination, in accordance with section 20 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The leases were to expire in 1897. The ground-rents payable under the leases amounted to £67 10s. per annum, while the annual rack rental of the property was estimated at between £3,000 and £4,000.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question raised by this summons was whether the duty, which would become payable upon the determination of the leases in 1897, ought to be paid by the vendors or the purchaser.

Colt, for the purchaser.—The succession took place before the contract, and the duty is therefore payable by the vendors. The contract disclosed the leases, but not the fact that there was undischarged succession duty. Although payment of the duty may be postponed by virtue of section 20 of the Act, the duty is a present charge.

He referred to Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., p. 667, and In re Cooper and Allen's Contract, 25 W. R. 301, 4 Ch. D. 802.

Davenport, for the vendors.—This is the ordinary case of a purchaser buying a remainder expectant on the determination of a prior estate. The duty is therefore payable by him: Cooper v. Trewby, 8 W. R. 299, 28 Beav. 194; In re Langham, 39 W. R. 156. The principle is the same whether the remainder is expectant on a life estate or on a term of years.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is well settled that the purchaser of a reversion bears the payment of succession duty, payable when, by death or otherwise, the reversion is converted into an estate in possession. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that where a purchaser buys an estate in possession, notwithstanding that he buys it in part from owners in remainder—where, for instance, he buys from owners of prior estates with the concurrence of the remaindermen in fee—he is entitled to have the estate in fee in possession cleared from the burden of the succession duty which will become payable on the determination of the prior estates. In the present case I am dealing, not with an estate in one for life with remainder over, but with an estate in fee simple subject to a lease. No doubt, strictly speaking, that is a reversion. The purchaser does not buy a vacant possession. He takes a reversion expectant on the lease, but not a reversion in respect of which succession duty is to become payable when it becomes an estate in possession. What he takes is for all purposes an estate in possession. Now, under which of the above-stated rules does the present case fall?

Assuming for the moment that there is nothing in the contract to show that the purchaser took anything less than an estate in fee simple, subject only to the leases, it seems to me that he is entitled to have the property clear of all burdens, including this liability in respect of the duty which will be payable out of the property by-and-bye, but which does not really arise by the determination of the leases, but on an entirely different event. I do not think the Act of Parliament can govern the conclusion of the court in a case of this kind, where the question is between vendor and purchaser. The rights of the Crown are, of course, quite clear, however I decide the case. The succession of the vendors to the estate occurred long ago, but the payment of succession duty in respect of the reversionary value was postponed until, by the determination of the leases, the vendors should become entitled to the enjoyment in possession, and there is consequently now a charge on the property for some amount or other. To my mind, therefore, it is reasonably clear that the purchaser, taking an estate in possession subject to the leases, is entitled to demand from the vendors such an estate as he would enjoy if it were discharged from this burden.

But it is said that the only way to give him that is to compound the duty, and that cannot be done without the authority of the Crown, with whom it is a discretionary thing, and that a difficulty arises inasmuch as no one knows what will be the value of the property upon the determination of the leases. A complete answer to that is, that if the vendors have sold the property charged with a burden which they are unable to ascertain, then they fail to make a good title, and the purchaser cannot be compelled to complete.

Then the vendors say that the purchaser really knew that he was buying this property subject to the charge. It is not pretended that it is expressly mentioned upon the face of the contract, or that it is directly disclosed by its terms; but it is said that, under clause 4, he had notice of the contents of the leases, and that clause 7 shows that the vendors were claiming as successors in title to someone who was dead; but though that might afford some indication of the nature of the title, there is nothing on the contract sufficient to support the vendors' contention. I hold that a purchaser buying an estate in possession subject to a lease is entitled to have that estate free from succession duty. In order to get rid of that obligation the vendor must set out on the face of the contract the existence of the burden, and must even, I am inclined to think, go further, and expressly relieve himself from the obligation of discharging that burden. The purchaser's objection is a good one, and the vendors must pay the costs of the proceedings.

Solicitors, Langley, Gibbon, & Moore; Pickering & Neilson.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 11, 19.
Romer, J. }

SCHOLEY v. PECK. (a.)

Solicitor—Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28—Action on behalf of mortgagor—Charging order taking priority over interest of mortgagee.

An action was commenced by the solicitors for the purchaser of a leasehold house for specific performance of the agreement for sale. In the course of the proceedings it transpired that the purchaser had mortgaged his interest in the agreement; but the mortgagee declined to release her interest, or to concur in the proceedings. Judgment was obtained in the action, ordering the defendants to assign the lease of the house to the plaintiff or his mortgagee. Plaintiff's solicitors applied by petition for a charging order on the leasehold house for their taxed costs, charges, and expenses as solicitors for the plaintiff in the action.

Held, that they were entitled to a charging order as prayed, and that it must not only bind the plaintiff's interest in the house, but take priority over the mortgage.

Petition under Solicitors Act, 1860.

In the year 1868 three leasehold houses at Kilburn, in the county of Middlesex, were assigned to three persons, the trustees of the marriage settlement of one Maynard, by way of mortgage for securing the repayment of a sum of £800 and interest as in the said mortgage mentioned. In the year 1877 Maynard agreed in writing with Scholey for the sale of the property to him for £800 payable by instalments. This agreement was stated by Maynard to have been entered into by him without the concurrence of his trustees, and contained a proviso that if it should be determined by Maynard, under certain powers in that behalf contained in it, in consequence of any default on Scholey's part, Scholey should be entitled to an assignment for the whole term of one of the three houses for each principal sum of £266 13s. 4d. which should have been paid by him, being one-third of the purchase-money of £800.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the year 1891 the trustees advertised the mortgaged property for sale by auction, under a power in that behalf contained in the mortgage deed. Scholey had then paid instalments under his agreement amounting to about £276, and on ascertaining that the property was advertised for sale, brought this action against the trustees and Maynard for specific performance of the agreement so far as subsisting, and for an injunction restraining the trustees from selling one of the houses. The trustees thereupon withdrew that house from the sale and undertook not to offer it for sale till after the trial of the action. By the statement of defence it was stated, as the fact was, that Scholey had in 1881 executed a mortgage charging his interest under the agreement in favour of a Miss Cardale. In the course of subsequent correspondence between Scholey's solicitors and Miss Cardale's solicitors the latter refused to release her charge on one of the houses or to join with Scholey in the action. On the hearing of the action the defendants were directed to assign the lease of the house in question to Scholey or his mortgagee, and the costs payable by the defendants to the plaintiff were ordered to be set off against the costs of a counter-claim by the defendants and certain other costs payable by the plaintiff to the defendants.

This was an application by the plaintiff's solicitors for a charging order on the house in question for their costs and expenses as solicitors for the plaintiff in the action.

Jackson, for the applicants.—By the action the house in question has been recovered and preserved not only for the plaintiff but also for his mortgagee. A charging order under the Solicitors Act, 1860, takes precedence over the interests of all parties in the property recovered or preserved: Faithfull v. Ewen, 26 W. R. 270, 7 Ch. D. 495; Charlton v. Charlton, 32 W. R. 90; Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545.

Borthwick, for the mortgagee.—The mortgage was made before the action was commenced, and cannot be affected by the charging order. An implied authority or request is the foundation of the doctrine of salvage: Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 234. In this case there was no authority or request, either express or implied.

ROMER, J.—The authorities bearing on charging orders obtained under the Solicitors Act, 1860, show that what is recovered by the action of the solicitor is to be treated as if he had earned salvage, and that he is to be paid for his services on the theory that salvage services have been rendered. The 28th section of the Act is very general in its terms, and authorizes a charge, not on the interest of the plaintiff merely, but on all property recovered in the action, whether for the plaintiff only or for him in connection with others. It is not necessary that the property charged should belong to the person who employed the solicitor, but it must be by reason of the employment that the property is preserved. Here undoubtedly the property was preserved by the action brought by these solicitors on behalf of the plaintiff, and but for the proceedings taken by them the mortgagee would have lost her security. In my judgment the case is governed by the principle of Greer v. Young, and I hold, therefore, that the solicitors are entitled to the charge for which they ask, not only against the plaintiff, but also in priority to the charge of the mortgagee, who is taking the benefit of the action. Their charge will include their taxed costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by them in preserving the property.

The petitioner's costs of this petition must be taxed as between solicitor and client, and added to the charge; and the mortgagee can have her costs and may add the same to her security. There will be liberty to apply for the purpose of enforcing the charge.

Solicitors, Metcalfe & Sharpe; Iliffe & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Lawrance, JJ.) May 2.

HENDERSON v. THORN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Breach of covenants to keep premises in repair and to deliver up in repair—Actions by landlord during continuance of term and at end of term—Method of assessing damages in second action.

Two years before the determination of a lease a landlord brought an action against his tenant for breach of covenant to keep the premises in repair. The tenant denied liability, but paid a sum into court, which the landlord accepted in satisfaction of his claim, and the action was stayed. After the determination of the lease the landlord brought another action for breach of covenant to keep the premises in repair and for breach of covenant to deliver up in repair. No repairs were done to the premises between the date of the first action and the end of the lease, and the particulars in the second action included all matters which had been claimed for in the first action as well as some additional items of non-repair. The official referee, in assessing the damages, ascertained what sum was required to put the premises into repair, from which he deducted the sum paid into court and accepted in the first action, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the balance.

Held, that the official referee had assessed the damages in the right manner.

Motion on behalf of the defendant to set aside the findings and judgment of the official referee in an action brought to recover damages for breach of covenant to repair.

By a lease dated the 1st of March, 1871, the plaintiff demised to the defendant certain premises consisting of a house and garden for a term of twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1870. The lease contained the usual covenants on the part of the defendant to keep the premises in repair during the continuance of the term, and to deliver up the premises in repair at the end thereof. In January, 1888, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant a notice requiring the defendant to execute the repairs specified in the notice. These repairs were not executed, and on the 11th of February, 1890, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant in which he claimed £425 15s. damages for breach of the covenant to keep in repair. The defendant denied amy liability for the breach, but paid £235 into court. The plaintiff accepted that sum in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it was paid into court, and the action was discontinued.

The lease expired by effluxion of time on the 25th of December, 1891. On the 6th of April, 1892, the plaintiff commenced a second action against the defendant, alleging in his statement of claim that since the date of the former action and during the continuance of the term there had been a further breach of the covenant to keep in repair, and also alleging a breach of the covenant to deliver up the premises in repair at the end of the term. In respect of these two breaches the plaintiff claimed £1,324 7s. 8d. The £235 which had been paid into court in the first action had not been expended in executing the repairs to the premises, and no repairs were in fact done between the date of that action and the determination of the lease. The particulars of repairs required which were delivered in the second action showed that the plaintiff was claiming in respect of all repairs required to be done, including both those which had been specified in the particulars in the first action and also some further repairs, such as painting, which the defendant was not bound to do until the end of the lease. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff could not recover damages for any breaches in respect of which the £235 paid into court in the first action had been accepted; in the alternative the defendant paid £238 8s. 8d. into court.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was referred to the official referee, who found that £571 5s. was necessary to put the premises into repair; from this sum he deducted the £235 paid into court and accepted by the plaintiff in the first action, and also a percentage for depreciation and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £74 16s. 4d. in addition to the £238 8s. 8d. paid into court.

Witt, Q.C., and F. O. Robinson (W. E. Ball with them), for the defendant.—The method by which the official referee assessed the damages was wrong. The proper course would have been to have awarded damages for only such items of non-repair as had accrued since the date of the first action, and not to have allowed anything for matters which were included in the particulars in that action. It is admitted that the measure of damages would not be the same in the first as in the second action (Joyner v. Weeks, 39 W. R. 583, [1891] 2 Q. B. 31), but as the plaintiff accepted the sum paid into court in the first action in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it was paid, the referee was wrong in treating that sum as if it represented the measure of the plaintiff's legal right. No doubt that would have been the case if that action had gone for trial and the plaintiff had recovered judgment for that amount; but the acceptance by the plaintiff of the sum paid into court was in effect an acceptance of a sum by way of compromise in respect of everything which the plaintiff claimed, and the plaintiff's claim in the first action, as shown by the particulars, was a claim not for damages for injury to the reversion, but for such a sum as was necessary to put the premises into repair at that time.

Jelf, Q.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. I think that after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Joyner v. Weeks there is very little to be said in favour of the defendant's contention. It may be that when the defendant paid £235 into court in the first action he acted under a misapprehension as to his legal position; he may have thought that the measure of damages was the sum necessary to put the premises into repair, but on the other hand it is equally possible that he was aware that the true measure of damages when the action for breach of covenant to repair is brought during the currency of the tenancy is the loss to the landlord measured by the depreciation in the saleable value of the reversion. It must be taken, therefore, that the sum paid into court in the first action did not represent the sum necessary to put the premises into repair, or if it did it was merely a coincidence. The defendant cannot, therefore, treat that payment into court as made upon the footing that it was the amount required to put the premises into repair. If he were entitled to do so I should accept the proposition that the defendant is only liable for breaches of covenant committed since the date of the first action, but, the measure of damages being different in the two actions, I am unable to accept that view of what took place, and in my judgment the only way of dealing with the question of damages is that which was adopted by the official referee. No doubt it does sometimes happen that, when an action is brought at the end of a term for breach of covenants to repair and to leave in repair, the result of the rule of law as to the measure of damages is that the sum paid by the tenant represents more than the actual damage suffered by the landlord, but, on the other hand, a tenant who has broken his repairing covenants often has to pay a smaller sum than he would have done if he had observed the covenants. Of these two principles the Court of Appeal has adopted that which was thought to be the most workable—that is, that at the end of the term the landlord is entitled to recover the amount necessary to put the premises into repair, even though as a matter of fact the landlord suffers no loss at all through the non-repair. In this case we cannot treat the first set of damages as the equivalent of the cost of putting the premises into repair at the date of the first action; we can only say that at the end of the term the landlord is not entitled to have the money twice over, but must subtract what was previously paid to him from the amount which he recovers at the end of the term. In my opinion the case is perfectly clear when once the rule as to the measure of damages laid down in Joyner v. Weeks is clearly appreciated.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Jull & Godfray.

Solicitors for the defendant, Saunders, Hawksford, & Bennett.

Q. B. Div. (Pollock, B., and Kennedy, J.) April 13.

CARTER v. THOMAS. (a.)

Local government — Local authority — Fire brigade— Right to control of premises on fire—Exclusion of public—Justices—Jurisdiction—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), s. 32—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 171.

The effect of section 171 of the Public Health Act, 1875, incorporating the provisions of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, which, by section 32, provides that the urban authority "may employ a proper number of persons to act as firemen, and may make such rules for their regulation as they think proper," is to give the brigade provided by such local authority a right to do all necessary acts to maintain control over premises upon which they are lawfully engaged in extinguishing a fire.

The appellant, a member of a volunteer brigade in uniform attempted to enter premises upon which the brigade provided by the local board were engaged in putting out a fire. Being refused admission by the respondent, a member of the local board brigade, who was in uniform and was directed by his foreman to exclude people from the premises, the appellant attempted to force his way in, but used no unnecessary violence; the appellant was convicted by the justices of an assault upon the respondent.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the respondent was justified in excluding the appellant, who could not justify his attempt to force an entrance, and that the conviction was right.

This was a case stated by justices.

The appellant was convicted of an assault upon the respondent, and the facts appearing by the case were as follows:—

Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted and found as a fact that the respondent was a member and in the uniform of the fire brigade provided by the Heston and Isleworth Local Board under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1871, incorporating the provisions of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, and that the appellant was in the uniform of, and was a member of, a fire brigade called the Hounslow Original Fire Brigade, formed in the district and supported by voluntary subscriptions and payments and donations from various insurance companies.

It was also admitted and found as a fact that the respondent, when the alleged assault was committed, was at a fire which occurred in a house in the Inwood-road, Hounslow, in pursuance of his duty as a member of the local board fire brigade, and that Frank Marcham, the foreman, was also present in charge of such brigade, and that the respondent received instructions from his foreman not to allow anyone to pass in at the gate of the house where the fire occurred.

It was also admitted that the foreman of the Hounslow Original Fire Brigade, to which the appellant belonged, was in the house at the time the appellant presented himself for admission; that the appellant was at the time in uniform, and when he arrived at the gate he asked the respondent to allow him to pass; that the respondent thereupon told him the orders he had received from his foreman, and refused to allow him to do so, whereupon the appellant stated that the respondent should not stop him, and pushed the gate, and struggled with the respondent to get in, and tried to throw him over. This was the assault that was complained of.

It was admitted that no more force was used by the appellant than was necessary to enable him to pass the respondent and enter the premises.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had a right, as against the respondent, to go into the house, and that the justices had no jurisdiction to try what, it was contended, was a bonâ fide question of right.

It was further contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent had no legal right to prevent him entering the house, and that he was justified in pushing him and using sufficient force to enter the premises.

The justices being of opinion that the respondent, acting under the orders of his foreman, who at the time was the officer in charge of the brigade of the properly constituted local authority—namely, the Heston and Isleworth Local Board—who by statute were authorized to provide and keep engines and firemen, and which brigade the justices considered was the proper one to take charge of any fire that should occur in its district, had full authority to prevent any person from entering the premises in question without the sanction of the officer in charge of the brigade at the time, which in this case was Foreman Marcham.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:—

(1) Whether the justices had jurisdiction to try the case, the appellant having set up an alleged bonâ fide claim of right.

(2) Whether any member of the fire brigade provided by the local board had any authority, by statute or otherwise, to prevent a member of any other fire brigade from entering premises at which there was a fire for the purposes of assisting in extinguishing the same.

By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 171, it is provided that "the provisions of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the following matters—namely, . . . with respect to fires . . . shall, for the purpose of regulating such matters in urban districts, be incorporated with this Act."

10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, s. 32, provides that the commissioners may provide fire engines, &c., "and may employ a proper number of persons to act as firemen, and may make such rules for their regulation as they think proper."

A. Lyttelton (G. J. Talbot with him), for the appellant.—The effect of the statutes is simply to give power to the local authority to provide engines and to employ firemen, and does not extend to give such firemen control over premises on fire, to the exclusion of other persons. That proposition is borne out by contrasting the Public Health Act, 1875, with the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 90; which in section 12 provided a code of powers and duties for firemen. The Public Health Act, therefore, deliberately reverted to the Towns Police Act, as opposed to the London legislation. Here the appellant had a right to go on to the premises to help for the common weal: Maleverer v. Spinke, Dyer 35 b; at all events his own foreman was already on the premises, and it must be assumed that he, as well as the respondent, was on the premises by leave of the owner. If that was so, what right could one licensee have to exclude or control another? Further, to constitute a criminal assault, it is essential that there should be a mens rea, and it is a contradiction in terms to say that a man who bonâ fide acts under a claim of right is guilty of an assault in reasonably endeavouring to exercise his right. When that is the case the jurisdiction of the magistrates is ousted: Watkins v. Major, 24 W. R. 164, L. R. 10 C. P. 662; White v. Feast, 20 W. R. 382, L. R. 7 Q. B. 353.

Craies, for the respondent.—The conviction was clearly right. The provision in the statutes—and in particular section 32 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847—impart power to the local board brigade to do all such necessary acts to put out fire. The words are that men may be employed to "act as firemen," which clearly involves the power to carry out the necessary duties of firemen, although words expressly authorizing them to take charge may not be inserted: In re Corporation of Dudley, 8 Q. B. D. 86, 30 W. R. Dig. 120. It is obviously a necessary act upon the part of firemen to maintain order and control upon premises that are on fire, or their operations may be rendered impossible. The ratepayers are chargeable under the Act for the cost of putting out fires, and that is a statutory invitation to their brigade to be on the premises. The appellant was a mere volunteer, and it lay upon him to justify the assault. [On the question of jurisdiction he was stopped by the court.]

Talbot in reply.

POLLOCK, B.—This case from some aspects raises questions of importance, and I regret that the occasion for those questions should have arisen through the virtuous overzeal of the volunteer fireman. It seems that, when the facts are looked at, the case presents no great difficulty. A house at Hounslow was on fire. A local fire brigade, established under statute, come and are engaged in putting out the fire, and then the circumstances of the case arise. The first question is, by what right did they come; and the second, what was their position when they were there. The answers to these questions depend (1) upon the interpretation of the statutes, and (2) upon the necessary inference to be reasonably drawn from the facts by the justices.

In the first place, I think that it must be reasonably inferred from the facts that the local board brigade were on the premises with the consent of the owner. Now the Public Health Act, 1875, by reference to the Towns Police Act of 1847, enables a fire brigade to be established, and provides that the commissioners may employ a proper number of persons as firemen, and may make rules for their regulation as may be necessary.

In the present case no rules were made, and the question is, What may be inferred from the provision, "may employ a proper number of persons to act as firemen"? I think it would include the doing of such acts as are reasonably necessary to put out the fire, and to exclude persons whose presence would inconveniently interfere with their operations. The local board brigade, therefore, being properly on the premises, one of their men was stationed at the door with instructions not to allow anyone to pass in. The appellant, a member of another fire brigade and being in uniform, attempted to pass in, and being told he would not be allowed to do so, endeavoured to force his way, in which endeavour he was resisted by the other. The question therefore arises as to what right he had to go in to put out the fire. It is not here a question of mens rea, because it is for him, in order to justify the assault, to show that he was prevented from doing some act which he had a legal right to do. Mr. Lyttelton argued that because his foreman was on the premises he had as much right as the local board brigade had to be there also. I cannot draw such an inference, nor, in fact, have the justices done so. As I said, I think that power is impliedly given to the local board brigade by statute to keep people in order on the premises, and to exclude persons whose presence would be inconvenient to them. And further, I agree with what my brother Kennedy has said, that if the first brigade were on the premises with the owner's permission, but the second comers had no such permission, the same consequences would follow, because they would have had no right to enter. But the first reason I have given seems to me to be in accordance with law and with the fitness of the case. The general question of the right of persons to come in and put out the fire on the ground of public safety or that of neighbouring property does not seem to me to arise in the present case, and I do not express any opinion upon it. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must fail, and the conviction be affirmed.

KENNEDY, J.—The appellant in this case assaulted a fireman employed by a local authority. The appellant had no public position, nor does it appear that he had any permission from the owner. It is true that he was in the uniform of his brigade, and that he bonâ fide wished to assist in putting out the fire; but so might any one in Hounslow, and the contention put forward in support of his appeal comes to this, that any zealous person might go in, and those actually on the premises by leave of the owner would have no right to resist them. We must assume in the present case that the local board brigade were on the premises with the consent of the owner. Now what right or title to force an entrance had this volunteer? I am not going to say that there are not circumstances under which anyone might not have a right to assault people standing in the way when, for instance, it was a case of saving life or when there was obviously an insufficient force on the premises to cope with the fire. But it is not necessary to consider that here, because there is no evidence or finding that such was the state of things. The appellant has, in my judgment, failed to prove that he had a right to go in, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Charles Robinson & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent, Hugh R. Peake.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Bruce, JJ.) — April 17.

In re HARRISON.

Ex parte SHERIFF OF ESSEX. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Interpleader order—Receiving order—Costs of execution—Possession money—Notice of receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11.

After seizure by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. the goods of the debtor were claimed under a bill of sale, and an interpleader order was made, but, a receiving order having been made against the debtor, notice was given to the sheriff requiring him to hand over the goods to the official receiver. The sheriff declined to hand over the goods pending the interpleader order, and in the bill of costs subsequently brought in by him under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, he claimed possession money down to the date when such order was discharged.

Held, that the sheriff was not entitled to claim under section 11 any costs of execution subsequent to the time when he received the notice mentioned in the section, and that the taxing officer was right in disallowing all possession money after that date.

Appeal from an order of His Honour Judge Abdy, in the County Court at Chelmsford, by which he disallowed to the sheriff certain possession money.

The case raised an important question as to the right of the sheriff to possession money out of the bankrupt's estate where possession had been retained, after notice of the receiving order had been given, owing to the fact that interpleader proceedings were then pending.

On the 24th of August, 1891, a writ of fi. fa. was issued against the debter, under which possession was taken by the sheriff on the 28th of August, 1891. On the 4th of September, 1891, a claim was made to the goods under a bill of sale, and on the 14th of September, 1891, an interpleader order was made directing the sheriff to sell, unless within a certain time the money was brought into court by the claimant.

On the 16th of September, 1891, the sheriff received notice that a receiving order had been made against the debtor, and on the 17th of September, 1891, the official receiver called on the sheriff to hand over the goods.

The sheriff declined to hand over the goods pending the interpleader order, but on the 24th of September he received notice that the bill of sale holder withdrew his claim. On the 26th of September, 1891, the sheriff took out a summons to have the interpleader order dismissed, and on the 2nd of October, 1891, he was ordered to withdraw.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The sheriff thereupon on the 2nd of October, 1891, handed over the goods to the official receiver, and subsequently brought in his bill of costs under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and rule 118 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, by which he claimed possession money down to the 2nd of October, 1891.

The county court registrar on taxation disallowed all possession money subsequent to the 17th of September, 1891, on which date the sheriff was called upon by the official receiver to hand over the goods, and this decision having been affirmed by the county court judge, the sheriff now appealed.

Wightman Wood, for the sheriff.—The ground of the decision in the county court appears to have been that it was the duty of the sheriff to deliver the goods to the official receiver on the 17th of September, and that he had no right to continue in possession after notice of the receiving order and demand by the official receiver. But the fact that the interpleader order intervened compelled the sheriff to hold the goods until the order was discharged, or, at any rate, until he had notice that the claim was withdrawn. The sheriff was really holding as a stakeholder. The words of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, are where any "goods of a debtor" are taken in execution, and those words do not apply in this case. It is not clear that the goods here were the goods of the debtor, because they were goods which were claimed by a third party as being his goods. It was the duty of the sheriff to obey the interpleader order which had been made. These costs were clearly costs of the execution.

He referred to Bird v. Mathews, 46 L. T. N. S. 512, 30 W. R. Dig. 158; In re Levy, Ex parte the Sheriff of Essex, 38 W. R. 784 7 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 125; Ex parte Browning, In re Cracraft, 26 W. R. 559, 8 Ch. D. 596; Child v. Mann, L. R. 3 Eq. 806, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 52; Smith v. Darlow, 32 W. R. 665, 26 Ch. D. 605; Ex parte Lithgow, In re Fenton, 26 W. R. 834, 10 Ch. D. 169.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The only question is whether under the section the possession money comes within the words "costs of execution," and whether the estate is to pay these costs or the party really at fault for them. The matter depends entirely on section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and the cases decided under the Act of 1869 have really no application.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the county court was right. I do not think that the sheriff can claim under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, any costs of execution whatever subsequent to the time when he receives the notice mentioned in the section. It cannot be argued that the sheriff has any claim except by virtue of the provisions of section 11. That section provides that "where any goods of a debtor are taken in execution, and before the sale thereof or the completion of the execution by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall, on request, deliver the goods and any money seized or received in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver, but the costs of the execution shall be a first charge on the goods or money so delivered, and the official receiver or trustee may sell the goods, or an adequate part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying the charge." In my opinion it is plain that that means the costs of the execution up to the time when the notice is given. To read the section in the way in which we have been invited to read it would involve adding to the section some such words as "unless interpleader proceedings are pending," and a proviso that if interpleader proceedings are pending the costs of execution shall include all costs down to the discharge of the interpleader. It is said that the goods were not the goods of the debtor. All I can say is that if the goods were not the goods of the debtor the sheriff has no claim under the section. But if they were the goods of the debtor, then the sheriff on delivering over the goods is entitled to his costs down to that time. I agree with the county court judge that the only duty of the sheriff is to obey the provisions of the section, and on getting the notice his duty is to hand over the goods, and on handing them over he will get the costs of execution down to that time.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was clearly not intended that the sheriff should have costs for remaining in possession after he has received notice of the receiving order. I will go further, and will say that I do not think it was the duty of the sheriff to remain in possession after he had received notice of the receiving order.

Appeal dismissed, and leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the sheriff, Gepp & Sons.

Solicitor for the official receiver, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) [and Q. B. Div.] (Wills and Charles, JJ.) — April 19; May 30.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN BATER AND ANOTHER AND THE MAYOR, &C., OF BIRKENHEAD. (a.)

Local government—Unsound meat—Seizure—Refusal of magistrate to condemn — Compensation to owner—Measure of damages — Costs of attendance before magistrate on application to condemn — Power of magistrate to hear owner—Right of owner to refuse tender of the meat—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 116, 117, 308.

Where meat has been seized by the officer of a local authority under section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as being unwholesome, and taken before a magistrate for the purpose of being condemned, the attendance of the owner, though he has not been summoned, with his witnesses before the magistrate to give evidence as to the condition of the meat, is a natural consequence of the seizure; and, therefore, where the power of seizure has been wrongly exercised, and the magistrate refuses to condemn the meat, the owner is entitled to include in the amount of "full compensation" recoverable by him from the local authority under section 308 of the Act the costs incurred through his attendance before the magistrate.

So held by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division.

Held, also, by the Queen's Bench Division, that, when the meat which has been seized, and which the magistrate has refused to condemn, has been tendered by the local authority to the owner, he is not entitled to decline to receive it back, and the value of the meat at the time when it was tendered must be taken into consideration in assessing the amount of the compensation payable to the owner.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL and W. F. BARRY, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Special case stated for the opinion of the court under section 7 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49).

The applicants, Bater & Williamson, were importers and vendors of meat at Birkenhead. On the 23rd of August, 1892, the inspector of nuisances appointed by the corporation as urban sanitary authority seized the carcase of a bullock belonging to the applicants under section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as being unfit for human food. On the 24th of August the carcase was taken by the inspector before a magistrate to be dealt with by him under section 117 of the same Act; the applicants, though not summoned, attended and gave evidence as to the condition of the meat, and the magistrate refused to condemn it or to make any order in respect of it. On the same day, and after the decision of the magistrate, the inspector tendered the carcase to the applicants, who refused to accept it.

The applicants and the corporation then appointed arbitrators to determine the fact of damage in relation to these matters, and the amount of compensation (if any) to be paid to the applicants by the corporation in respect thereof. The corporation denied all liability, and appointed their arbitrator under protest. Questions arose during the arbitration (1) as to whether the applicants were in law entitled to refuse to receive back the carcase, and to claim compensation on the footing that it had been permanently detained by the corporation, and (2) as to whether, in estimating the amount of compensation (if any) to be paid to the applicants, they were entitled to claim as part thereof the costs incurred in opposing the application for the condemnation of the meat.

The arbitrators found as a fact that the applicants had suffered damage, and awarded to them a sum of £11 if the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and £4 2s. 6d. if it should be answered in the negative, and an additional sum of £29 18s. 6d. for the costs of the appearance of the applicants before the magistrate in case the second question should be answered in the affirmative.

The opinion of the court was requested upon these questions.

Provision is made by section 116 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the seizure by a medical officer of health or inspector of nuisances of any carcase or meat exposed for sale and intended for the food of man which appears to him diseased, or unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, in order to have the same dealt with by a justice. And section 117 provides that if it appears to the justice that any carcase so seized is diseased, &c., he shall condemn the same and order it to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of; and that the person to whom it belongs, or did belong, at the time of exposure for sale shall be liable to a penalty. Section 308 provides as follows:—"Where any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any powers of this Act in relation to any matter as to which he is not himself in default, full compensation shall be made to such person by the local authority exercising such powers; and any dispute as to the fact of damage or amount of compensation shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided by the Act." Section 179 provides for the mode of reference to arbitration.

Poland, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the applicants.—It must be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that the claimants are entitled to some compensation; the corporation dispute their liability, but that question is not now before the court. The compensation payable under section 308 is "full compensation." The applicants could not have sold the meat after these proceedings had been taken in respect of it: they were, therefore, entitled to refuse to take it back, and they ought to be paid its full value: White v. Redfern, 28 W. R. 168, 5 Q. B. D. 15. The costs of the appearance before the magistrate were expenses properly incurred by the applicants for the protection of their property which had been seized by a wrongful exercise of the powers of the corporation.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor, for the corporation of Birkenhead, were only called upon to argue the question of the inclusion in the compensation of the applicants' costs of appearance before the magistrate.—The object of the provisions of the Act is to give facilities for the rapid seizure and destruction of meat which is unfit for human food; and to make the sanitary authority liable for costs where a bonâ fide error has been made would be to put a serious obstacle in the way of the exercise by their officers of their powers. There are two processes which may be pursued: the one, which was adopted here, for the condemnation of the meat; the other for the punishment of the owner of the meat personally. In the latter case the owner is summoned and is entitled to appear and be heard in his defence. But upon an application to condemn the meat he has no such right. Some of the cases go so far as to say that the action of the magistrate in condemning the meat is merely executive, that he is bound to act upon the evidence brought before him by the sanitary authority, and that he has no power to hear the owner: Vinter v. Hind, 31 W. R. 198, 10 Q. B. D. 63; Waye v. Thompson, 33 W. R. 733, 15 Q. B. D. 342. At all events, the owner was in no way bound to appear, and he cannot recover his costs of so doing as part of the compensation to be paid to him.

Poland, Q.C., replied.

WILLS, J.—The difficulty which arises in this case is one which commonly occurs where legislation is imperfect and judicial interpretation is necessary to give meaning to a section. It was pointed out by Field, J., in Vinter v. Hind that section 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is inartificially drawn, and in that view most of those who have to deal with that section agree. The questions here are whether, when proceedings have been taken under sections 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and a man's meat has been wrongfully seized, he is entitled to recover as compensation under section 308 of that Act the full value of the meat seized and the costs of his appearance before the magistrate who was asked to condemn the meat. On the first point our judgment is for the corporation; we think it is impossible to say that when meat is seized and its condemnation does not follow, the owner has a right to refuse to take it back for what it was worth. The meat remains the property of the owner, and a person who is seeking to recover damages from another must show that he has acted reasonably, and done his best to prevent the damage which he has suffered becoming larger than was necessary. It appears that in this case each party was afraid to touch this property for fear of putting himself in the wrong, but I think that the applicants ought not to have refused to accept the meat when it was tendered to them, and that they are not entitled to damages representing the full value of the carcase.

Then there is the serious question as to the applicants' costs of their appearance before the magistrate. The proceedings under which the meat may be condemned is anomalous. It may take place quite behind the back of the owner, and in one of the decisions, Waye v. Thompson, I am reported to have said that it had already been decided that the owner

"cannot" be heard on the application to condemn. I think that that statement is incorrect; if the expression had been "is not entitled to be heard," I think it would have been correct, but I do not think that any decision has gone beyond that. It is, however, clear that the magistrate could refuse to hear the owner and his witnesses, and that the condemnation of the meat might yet be good. But Mr. Walton argues that since the owner had no right to be heard he has no right to recover the costs of his appearance as compensation. I cannot agree with that argument. The appearance seems to me to be the natural consequence of the seizure of the meat. The Act says that the compensation recoverable is to be "full compensation," and I think that common sense and justice require that the costs of any steps which a right-minded man, who thought that he had a good cause, would naturally take under the circumstances are recoverable as compensation when the exercise of the powers given by the Act has been erroneous. It is said that this decision will make it very difficult for sanitary inspectors to act in these cases; but every such officer must act in the performance of his duty upon his own judgment without having a certainty as to which way the decision will go. I feel the less pressed by that argument because I feel certain that if we decided that these costs are not recoverable this legislation could not stand where it does. The result would be terribly unjust to an honest man whose meat had been erroneously seized; he might be prevented from coming forward to defend himself and his property, if he knew that he could not recover any of the costs which he might legitimately incur in the defence. It often happens that in cases of nuisance, where far greater amounts than those now in question are incurred for costs, a local board is compelled to run the risk of incurring them, and there is no hardship in holding that they run the same risk here. This seems to me to be the natural construction of this Act of Parliament.

The result is that the applicants are entitled to recover the smaller amount mentioned by the arbitrator as damages for the seizure of the meat, and to recover also the costs of their appearance before the magistrate.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises on section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875. For the purposes of this case we must assume that the applicants are persons who have sustained damage by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act in relation to a matter as to which they are not in default. The compensation is to be "full compensation," and the questions are, whether the applicants were entitled to refuse acceptance of this carcase when it was offered to them, and to recover its full value as compensation, and, secondly, whether they are entitled to recover their costs of attending before the magistrate when he heard the application for the destruction of the meat. As to the value of the meat, I have nothing to add to what my learned brother has said. I think that the smaller sum named by the arbitrators is all that the applicants are entitled to receive in respect of the detention of the meat. They had no right to throw it upon the hands of the corporation.

The second question is much more important, Are the applicants entitled to recover the costs of their appearance before the magistrate? It is said that their appearance was not the natural consequence of the action of the corporation in seizing the meat. But I think it is natural and proper for a man who has had notice of proceedings such as these to appear and defend himself and his meat. It is said, again, that it was useless for the applicants to appear, for the magistrate had no power to hear them upon the question of the condemnation of the meat; but, as my brother Wills has pointed out, no case has gone so far as to decide that. There are expressions in the cases of Waye v. Thompson and Vinter v. Hind which point in that direction, but neither of those cases decides that the magistrate has no power to hear the owner of the meat upon these proceedings. It appears to me that, although the owner is not entitled to be heard, the magistrate is permitted to hear him. If he goes before the magistrate to put his case, the charge against him personally under section 117 may be heard, and in that case the magistrate might give him costs if he were successful. That was not done here, but the magistrate did hear the owners and their witnesses upon the application to condemn the carcase, and he declined to condemn it. I think that their attendance before the magistrate was the natural consequence of the act of the officer of the corporation, and that the costs so incurred ought to be included in the "full compensation" which is to be allowed under section 308.

The corporation appealed.

May 30.—J. Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor, for the appellants, contended that the costs of appearing before the magistrate and opposing the application for the condemnation of the meat could not be recovered under section 308.

Poland, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The same authorities were referred to as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. It seems to me that section 308 must be read in its ordinary and grammatical sense. It provides that, where any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the Act, where he is not in default, full compensation shall be made to such person. What is the ordinary meaning of those phrases? The words must include anything which the person suffers by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act, and for the damage so sustained he is to receive full compensation. It seems to me to be natural and reasonable for a person whose property has been attacked to defend it, and for that purpose to appear before the magistrate and to call witnesses to show that he is not in the wrong. If that is so, how can it be said that the expense of so doing is not part of the damage he has suffered? It appears to me that these expenses are part of the ordinary damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act. It was sought to call them costs in the strict sense of that term, and to insist, upon that ground, that they could not be recovered as costs. The answer to that is, that they are not costs in the strict sense of the term—namely, costs such as can be taxed. They are expenses in the ordinary sense, and the claimants are entitled to be paid back the expenses to which they have been put by the act of the corporation. They are, therefore, entitled to this head of compensation.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicants, Hamlin, Grammer, & Hamlin, for R. B. Moore & Son, Birkenhead.

Solicitors for the corporation, Venn & Co., for A. Gill, Town Clerk, Birkenhead.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and Lopes, L.JJ.) Jan. 25; Feb. 14; April 24.

HAMPDEN AND ANOTHER v. EARL OF BUCKINGHAMSHIRE. (a.)

Settled Land—Power to mortgage settled land to pay off incumbrances—Interest of parties entitled under the settlement—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 53—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 11.

Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2 (1) (3) (4), 20, 21, and the Settled Land Act, 1890, ss. 2, 3, 11, the tenant for life of a settled estate has power to mortgage the whole of the settled estate to pay off an incumbrance upon part of it.

Held, further, that, upon the facts of the case, the tenant for life could not properly exercise the power, having regard to section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, at least until it had been ascertained that no sale at a proper price could be effected; and that the court ought to restrain him from exercising the power, upon the ground that its exercise would be a breach of trust, although he was acting bonâ fide.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal by annuitants (whose annuities were, under the will of the late Earl of Buckinghamshire, charged on the whole of the estate settled by his will) from the refusal of Kekewich, J., to restrain the present Earl of Buckinghamshire, the tenant for life of the settled estates, from mortgaging a portion thereof called The Beechwoods otherwise than subject to the rights of the annuitants. The questions raised by the appeal were, first, whether the tenant for life of a settled estate has, under sections 2, 3, and 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, and sections 2 (1) (3) (4), 20, and 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, power to mortgage the whole of the settled estate to pay off an incumbrance upon part of it. Secondly, if he has such power, ought the court, having regard to the facts of the case, to restrain him from exercising it when the tenant for life is acting bonâ fide, upon the ground that its exercise would be a breach of trust?

The facts were as follows:—The late Earl of Buckinghamshire was entitled to estates in Ireland and also to estates in Buckinghamshire. He had mortgaged his Irish estates for £28,000, but this mortgage had been paid off. He had mortgaged the bulk, but not the whole, of his Buckinghamshire estates for £39,000. Part of his Buckinghamshire estates called Beechwoods was not mortgaged, and this part, equally with all the rest of his estates, he by his will charged with annuities. The testator's personal estate and the property comprised in the mortgage were insufficient to pay the mortgagees. By his will he declared that all charges and incumbrances which should affect his Irish or Buckinghamshire estates (which expression includes The Beechwoods) respectively, should be primarily charged on and paid out of such estates respectively, in exoneration of his general estate and effects. He then devised his Irish estates and his Buckinghamshire estates in strict settlement in the usual way. He devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his younger children. He gave his trustees power to sell his Irish estates for the purpose of paying off any incumbrances on his Buckinghamshire estates. By his codicil he bequeathed pecuniary legacies to a considerable amount. On his death his personal estate amounted to £28,000.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In an action for the administration of his estate the mortgagees both of the Irish and of the Buckinghamshire estates proved their debts. The mortgagees of the Irish estates proved for the whole amount due to them—i.e., £15,000 and interest—and the mortgagees of the Buckinghamshire estates proved for £28,000 and interest, part only of their debt. By these proofs the whole of the personal estate was exhausted. The mortgage on the Irish estates was paid off in full, but £15,000 and interest still remained due to the mortgagees of the Buckinghamshire estates. Attempts had been made to sell the Irish estates so as to relieve the Buckinghamshire estates, but these attempts had not yet proved successful. In November, 1891, an order was made by consent to raise £40,000 by mortgage of the Buckinghamshire estates, but as to The Beechwoods, subject to the annuities charged upon it; but attempts to raise money on these terms had failed, and on the 2nd of November, 1892, an order was made for the sale of the Buckinghamshire estates, but the order was not to be drawn up for a month. It had, however, since been drawn up, but a sale under it had been postponed, as the present earl, the tenant for life, proposed to raise £40,000 by mortgage of the Buckinghamshire estates including Beechwoods, but so as to override and not be subject to the charge on them in favour of the annuitants. Out of the mortgage money he proposed to pay what was still due to the mortgagees, and also the pecuniary legatees. This proposed mortgage the annuitants sought to restrain. A sale of the mortgaged estates apart from The Beechwoods could not be effected, and if it could, it would not yield enough to pay off the mortgagees and the pecuniary legatees. The value of the Buckinghamshire estates was put at £80,000. No purchaser at that or any other price had yet come forward, but a sale at that price would be much more beneficial to the annuitants than a mortgage for £40,000 which should override these annuities.

Section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, provides that "where any money is required for the purpose of discharging an incumbrance on the settled land or any part thereof, the tenant for life may raise the money so required . . . on mortgage of the settled land or any part thereof." Section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, provides that "a tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position, and to have the duties and liabilities, of a trustee for those parties."

Kekewich, J., refused to restrain the tenant for life from mortgaging The Beechwoods otherwise than subject to the rights of the annuitants.

The annuitants appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and Birrell, for the appellants.—The proposed mortgage would not be a proper exercise by the tenant for life of his powers, under the 53rd section of the Settled Land Act, 1882. If the mortgage would keep the property in the family and enable the will to be carried out we should not oppose. But it merely postpones the collapse of the settled estates. It does not regard the interests of the annuitants. It postpones them indefinitely. The settlement will be overridden by the mortgage.

They referred to In re the Earl of Radnor's Will Trusts, 45 Ch. D. 402, 39 W. R. Dig. 202. [LOPES, L.J., referred to the Duke of Marlborough's Settlement, 34 W. R. 377, 32 Ch. D. 1].

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the respondent, the Earl of Buckinghamshire.—The tenant for life has exercised his discretion. No mala fides is alleged. It is merely said that it would be more advantageous to the annuitants that he should exercise his discretion in another way. If this motion is well founded anyone who thought his interests not properly considered could come forward for an injunction: In re Lord Stamford's Estate, 56 L. T. N. S. 484. The tenant for life is master of the settlement. The court has no jurisdiction unless mala fides (i.e., including an arbitrary exercise of his powers) is shown.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24.—LINDLEY, L.J., read the following written judgment, with which BOWEN and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred:—This is an appeal from the refusal of Kekewich, J., to restrain the tenant for life of some settled estates from exercising his alleged power of mortgaging them under the authority said to be conferred upon him by section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. The appellants are annuitants whose annuities are charged on the whole of the settled estates, and they contend that their interests are in danger of being sacrificed in order that the settled estates may be preserved for the benefit of other persons. The appellants urge that by virtue of section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the tenant for life is a trustee for them as well as for the other persons claiming under the settlement, and that the proposed mortgage will be a breach of trust on the part of the tenant for life, and ought to be restrained accordingly. In order to decide the question thus raised it is necessary first of all to ascertain the exact position of affairs and the rights of the several persons interested in the property proposed to be mortgaged. The late Earl of Buckingham was entitled to estates in Ireland and also to estates in Buckinghamshire. He had mortgaged his Irish estates for £28,000 and the bulk, but not the whole, of his Buckinghamshire estates for £39,000. Part of his Buckinghamshire estates called Beechwoods was not mortgaged, and this part, equally with all the rest of his estates, he charged with annuities when he made his will. But although The Beechwoods were not comprised in any mortgage, the mortgagees, as specialty creditors of the testator, could have recourse to these lands for payment of their debts if the testator's personal estate and the property comprised in their mortgage were insufficient to pay them, as I understand they were. It must, therefore, be borne in mind that, although the mortgages did not comprise Beechwoods, yet the payment of the annuities charged, inter alia, on The Beechwoods was liable to be defeated, or at least delayed, by the mortgagees. By the will to which I have referred the testator bequeathed certain annuities to his younger children, and charged them both on his Irish estates and on his Buckinghamshire estates, which expression includes The Beechwoods, and he gave the annuitants powers of distress and entry. He bequeathed part of his personal estate to trustees to go as heirlooms with his Buckinghamshire estates. He declared that all charges and incumbrances which should affect his Irish or Buckinghamshire estates respectively should be primarily charged on and paid out of such estates respectively in exoneration of his general estate and effects. He then devised his Irish estates and his Buckinghamshire estates in strict settlement in the usual way. He devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees upon trusts for his younger children. He gave his trustees power to sell his Irish estates for the purpose of paying off any incumbrances on his Buckinghamshire estates. Such is a general outline of the will. The testator does not mention The Beechwoods in his will. He treats them as part of his Buckinghamshire estates. As regards his mortgage debts his general idea is that the Irish estates shall, or at least may, be sold for the preservation of the Buckinghamshire estates, and that these shall indemnify the general personal estate from all mortgages on them. The will contains various other provisions which, however, are not material for the present purpose. By his codicil he bequeathed pecuniary legacies to a considerable amount. On his death his personal estate amounted to £28,000. In an action for the administration of his estate the mortgagees, both of the Irish and of the Buckinghamshire estates, proved their debts. The mortgagees of the Irish estates proved for the whole amount due to them—i.e., £15,000 and interest—and the mortgagees of the Buckinghamshire estates proved for £28,000 and interest, part only of their debt. By these proofs the whole of the personal estate was exhausted. The mortgage on the Irish estates was, if I understand rightly, paid off in full. £15,000 and interest still remains due to the mortgagees of the Buckinghamshire estates, and they can require the whole of those estates, including The Beechwoods if necessary, to be sold for their payment; and if The Beechwoods are sold these mortgagees, as between themselves and the annuitants, will be entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of sale in priority to any claims of the annuitants. The tenant for life proposes to mortgage all the Buckinghamshire estates, including The Beechwoods, for £40,000, and to pay off not only what is still due to the mortgagees, but also to pay the pecuniary legatees, who have been deprived by the mortgagees of the personal estate, out of which alone the legacies were payable. As between the mortgagees and the legatees and as between the legatees and the devisees of the mortgaged estate in Buckinghamshire the legatees are entitled to stand in the place of the mortgagees to the extent to which they have been paid out of the personal estate. This is so by virtue of Locke King's Act independently of the will. But the will itself directs that the Buckinghamshire estates shall bear the mortgages upon them in exoneration of the testator's general estate. This direction is ambiguous, but is very important in the present case. Does it mean that all the Buckinghamshire estates, including the unmortgaged Beechwoods, are to exonerate the testator's general estate, or does it mean no more than that the mortgaged estates in Buckinghamshire shall bear their own mortgage debts in exoneration of the general estate? If construed in the latter sense the direction would be unnecessary by reason of Locke King's Act. I am of opinion that the testator meant much more than to express what would be implied in the absence of the clause in question. Having regard to the definition of Buckinghamshire estates in the will and to the general scope of the will, to which I have already alluded, I am of opinion that this direction charges the mortgages on The Beechwoods for the purpose of exonerating the general estate, by which is obviously meant the real and personal estate not specifically disposed of by the will.

This clause therefore entitles the pecuniary legatees to stand in the place of the mortgagees, not only as against the mortgaged property, but as against The Beechwoods also. But I agree with Mr. Warmington's contention, that the charge on the Buckinghamshire estates, including The Beechwoods, is only for the purpose of exonerating the general estate, and does not affect the right of the annuitants as between themselves and the devisees of the mortgaged estates to have the mortgage debts paid out of those estates in priority to The Beechwoods. Attempts have been made to sell the Irish estates so as to relieve the Buckinghamshire estates, but these attempts have not yet proved successful. The legatees have the conduct of those proceedings.

In November, 1891, an order was made by consent to raise £40,000 by mortgage of the Buckinghamshire estates, but, as to The Beechwoods, subject to the annuities charged upon it. But attempts to raise money on these terms have failed, and on the 2nd of November, 1892, an order was made for the sale of the Buckinghamshire estates, but the order was not to be drawn up for a month. It has, however, since been drawn up, but a sale under it has been postponed, as the present earl, the tenant for life, proposes to raise £40,000 by mortgage of the Buckinghamshire estates, including Beechwoods, but so as to override and not be subject to the charge on them in favour of the annuitants. This mortgage they seek to restrain.

A sale of the mortgaged estates apart from the The Beechwoods cannot be effected, and if it could it would not yield enough to pay off the mortgagees and the pecuniary legatees. Since the case was argued the court has been furnished with evidence of the saleable value of the Buckinghamshire estates. That value is put at £80,000. No purchaser at that or any other price has yet come forward; but a sale at that price would be much more beneficial to the annuitants than a mortgage for £40,000 which should override these annuities.

Such being the rights of the parties and the position of affairs, it becomes necessary to consider, first, whether the tenant for life has any power to make the proposed mortgage apart from the question whether to make it would be a breach of trust; secondly, if he has such a power, ought this court to restrain him from exercising it upon the ground that its exercise would be a breach of trust?

The first question turns on the true construction of sections 2, 3, and 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, and of section 2, sub-sections (1) (3) and (4), and sections 20 and 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

It was contended by counsel for the appellants that the tenant for life had no power to mortgage the whole property to pay off an incumbrance upon part of it. This contention cannot, however, be supported. The settlement in this case is the will of the late Earl of Buckinghamshire dated the 31st of October, 1877. The testator and settlor died in October, 1885, and by section 2, sub-section (1), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the will, although made before the Act came into operation, is a settlement within the meaning of the Act. The settled land is all the land settled by that will, including The Beechwoods, on which the appellants' annuities are charged: section 2, sub-section (3). The tenant for life under that settlement is the present Earl of Buckinghamshire: section 2, sub-section (5). He is the tenant for life of the whole of the property comprised in the will, although the annuities of the appellants are a first charge under the settlement on part of the land of which the earl is tenant for life. The proposed mortgage is for the purpose of raising money in order to pay off an incumbrance on part of the settled land, and is warranted by section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. The incumbrance consists of the mortgage debt on the mortgaged Buckinghamshire estates, including so much of it as has been paid off at the expense of the pecuniary legatees. Even if the will had not charged this mortgage debt on The Beechwoods, the 11th section expressly authorizes a mortgage of the whole of a settled estate in order to pay off an incumbrance on part of it only.

The money raised will be capital money for the purpose of paying off the incumbrance, and by sections 20 and 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the mortgage when executed will take priority over the annuities and over all other charges and estates created by the settlement — i.e., the late earl's will. Apart, therefore, from the question whether to create the mortgage will be to create a breach of trust, it is, in my opinion, clear that the tenant for life can exercise the power to mortgage. The order for sale already made having been suspended does not, in my opinion, deprive him of this power. It was decided in Cardigan v. Curzon-Howe, 33 W. R. 836, 30 Ch. D. 531, that a tenant for life could sell notwithstanding a decree for the execution of the trusts of the settlement, and this goes far to show that a suspended order for sale ought not to deprive the tenant for life of the power to mortgage conferred upon him by the statute.

It remains to consider whether the tenant for life can properly exercise this power having regard to section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. Upon this point I felt considerable doubt until the evidence as to the value of the Buckinghamshire estates was furnished to the court. But this evidence satisfies me that the proposed mortgage will be unjust to the annuitants; and that justice to them requires that no such mortgage shall be made at least until it has been ascertained that no sale at a proper price can be effected. It was forcibly contended by Sir Horace Davey that it was for the tenant for life and not for this court to determine what ought to be done, and that so long as the tenant for life was acting bonâ fide the court could not properly interfere with him.

Speaking generally I think this is true. But assuming a tenant for life to be acting bonâ fide and with a view to preserve the estates for those intended by the settlor to enjoy them, still an honest trustee may fail to see that he is acting unjustly towards those whose interests he is bound to consider and to protect, and if he is so acting and the court can see it although he cannot, it is, in my opinion, the duty of the court to interfere. It must be borne in mind that the effect of a sale under the Settled Land Act is merely to substitute money for land, and that whatever rights persons had in the land, are preserved to them in the money produced by its sale. But a mortgage which overrides an incumbrance has a very different effect. The incumbrancer's rights are pro tanto destroyed, not preserved, unless he is paid off out of the money raised by the overriding mortgage. In this case it is not proposed to pay off the annuitants out of the money to be raised by the mortgage, nor could the annuitants be so paid off even if the tenant for life desired it (see section 11, clause 2, of the Settled Land Act, 1890).

In my opinion a tenant for life is not justified in trying to preserve a heavily incumbered estate by mortgaging it if he thereby sacrifices the interests of existing incumbrancers upon it. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed. The order appealed from must be discharged and an injunction be granted restraining the Earl of Buckinghamshire from mortgaging The Beechwoods otherwise than subject to the right of the persons entitled to the annuities charged thereon by the will of the settlor.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Stevens, Bawtree, & Stevens.

Solicitors for the respondent, Cookson, Wainewright, & Pennington.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ.) April 17, 24.

In re HUMPHRYS.
HUMPHRYS v. LEVETT. (a.)

Will—Infant—Maintenance—Accumulations—Vested gift to infant for life—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.

Property comprising, in part, a share of residue, was devised and bequeathed to trustees in trust to pay the income to an infant for life, remainder to such of her children as should attain twenty-one, and in default of such issue, then over. There was no express maintenance or accumulation clause.

The trustees, until the marriage of the infant, made an annual allowance out of the income of the said property for the infant's maintenance and education, and accumulated the balance.

Held, that the infant took a vested interest in the property; and as the income of the property had been expressly given to the infant by the instrument under which the infant's interest arose, that the infant was entitled to the accumulations of income accrued prior to her marriage; and that the case came under sub-section 3 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, by which the section is only to apply if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument under which the infant's interest arises.

By his will, dated the 5th of February, 1878, the testator, Wm. Chas. Humphrys, after various specific and pecuniary bequests, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert for certain purposes, and to hold the residue in trust for all or any of his three daughters and his granddaughter, Angela Humphrys Drummond (now Mrs. Levett), who should be living at his death and attain the age of twenty-one years, or marry under that age with the consent of their guardians, with directions as to the settlement of such shares.

By a codicil dated the 27th of April, 1882, the testator directed as follows:—"I declare that the trustees or trustee for the time being of my will shall stand seised of my messuage and hereditaments at Bursledon, known as 'Highfield,' now in lease to Mrs. Beale Browne, upon trust during the lifetime of my granddaughter, Angela Humphrys Drummond, either to permit her to occupy the same or to pay to her the annual income thereof for her separate use, and so that she shall have no power to anticipate the growing payments thereof; and after her death then in trust for such of her children as, whether in her lifetime or after her decease, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, equally between them, and in default of such issue then in trust for my three daughters, Beatrice Caroline Letitia, and Ada Mabel, and Julia Wiggett, and their issue respectively, as a part of their respective shares of my residuary estate under my said will with the like powers in all respects; I empower my trustees or trustee, but without responsibility for any omission so to do, to repair and insure against loss by fire my said messuage and hereditaments at Bursledon aforesaid out of the rents or corpus thereof, or the income or corpus of the share of my said granddaughter under my will. . . . revoke the trusts of the share in my residuary estate effected by my will to be held in trust for my said granddaughter and her issue, and I declare that such share shall be held upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions hereinbefore declared concerning my said messuage and hereditaments at Bursledon, known as 'Highfield.'"

Neither the will nor the codicil contained any maintenance or accumulation clause applicable to residue.

The testator died on the 17th of October, 1883. His three daughters attained the age of twenty-one years during his lifetime. His granddaughter, Mrs. Levett, was married on the 27th of April, 1887, with the consent of her guardian, being still an infant. From the testator's death down to the date of Mrs. Levett's marriage the trustees allowed an annual sum out of the net income of the Highfield estate and out of her share of the residuary estate for her maintenance and education, and accumulated the balance. An originating summons was taken out before North, J., for the determination of the question whether Mrs. Levett was entitled to payment to her of the accumulations of income of her share in the residuary estate of the testator accrued prior to her marriage, or whether such accumulations should be retained by the trustees as capital or corpus, or whether they should be paid to the testator's three daughters. North, J., held that the accumulations of income belonged to Mrs. Levett, and that she took a vested interest for life in the fourth share of the residue. The testator's three daughters appealed as to the residue, and the infant child of Mrs. Levett appealed as to the accumulations.

Charles Brown, for the testator's daughters, argued that Mrs. Levett took a contingent interest only.

Jessel, for the infant, contended that the accumulations of income should be capitalized, and, subject to Mrs. Levett's life interest, go to her children.—The accumulation clause was inserted by virtue of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and the result was, that the accumulations ought to be capitalized. North, J., was bound to follow his own decision in In re Wells, 38 W. R. 327, 43 Ch. D. 281. He asked the court to overrule that decision. "Property," in section 43, meant capital from which the income had arisen, and not the income from which the accumulations had arisen. The tenant for life was not entitled to the "property": Key & Elphinstone, 3rd ed., vol. 2, p. 465 (note).

He referred to In re Buckley's Trusts, 31 W. R. 376, 22 Ch. D. 583.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Leverson, for Mrs. Levett.—Mrs. Levett took a vested interest from the death of the testator. The object of section 43 was to benefit the person entitled to the income, and not to alter the devolution of property: In re Dickson, 33 W. R. 511, 29 Ch. D. 331.

They also referred to Davidson's Common Forms, p. 186.

Dare, for the trustees.

Jessel, in reply, referred to Davidson's Precedents, 3rd ed., vol. 4, p. 456; In re Thatcher's Trusts, 32 W. R. 679, 26 Ch. D. 426; and In re Buckley's Trusts.

Cur. adv. vult.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by North, J., declaring that the accumulations of the income arising from certain property given to Mrs. Levett by her grandfather, William Charles Humphrys, were payable to her as tenant for life. Two points were discussed on the appeal: (1) It was contended on behalf of her three aunts that part of the accumulations in question ought to be paid to them. (2) It was contended on behalf of her own children that the accumulations claimed by the aunts ought to be treated not as income payable to Mrs.

(a) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Levett, but as capital to be invested for the benefit of herself for life and afterwards for her children. Both points turn on the true construction of the testator's will and codicil; but on the second point reliance was mainly placed on the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43. I will take the first point first. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] It was contended for the appellants, the three daughters of the testator, (1) that under the will the gift of the residue was so worded as to entitle them to the income of the granddaughter's contingent share, and that the codicil did not revoke or affect the trusts of the residue, but was confined in its operation to the trusts afterwards declared by the provision in the will for the settlement of the granddaughter's share, if any, when ascertained and vested. I am myself quite unable so to read the codicil. Bearing in mind that when the will was made the testator's daughters as well as his granddaughter were under age, but that when his codicil was made all his daughters had attained twenty-one, it is plain to my mind that his object in making his codicil was to revoke the provision he had made for his granddaughter and to make an entirely new disposition in her favour. With this object in view he gives her the house called Highfield for life, whether she attains twenty-one or not; and after her death to her children. He then, as I read the codicil, revokes the trusts of the residue of his estate, so far as they relate to the share contingently given to her, and gives her the same proportion of another and different residue as before, but on totally different trusts, viz., on the trusts declared of Highfield. He gave her by his codicil an immediate vested life interest in her share of residue instead of a contingent interest. I cannot read the codicil as confined to the trusts contained in the proviso in the will relating to her share when ascertained and vested. That proviso does not refer to her share only, but to the shares of the daughters also. The trusts revoked are "the trusts of her share in the residue directed by the will to be held in trust for her and her issue." I read this as a revocation of all the trusts of her share, and not as a revocation of some of them only.

This was the construction put on the codicil by North, J., and is certainly strengthened by the clause as to repairs and insurance. Although I see the possibility of adopting the rival construction contended for by the appellants, I am myself convinced that that construction would defeat and not give effect to the intention of the testator. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to consider to whom the accumulations in question would have belonged if the gift of the residue had been unaltered by the codicil.

I pass now to the second point. This, in my opinion, turns also upon the true construction of the codicil. If we look at that it is plain that the income of the granddaughter's share of the residue is given to her from the death of the testator. The whole income is given to her; any of it not required to be expended on her whilst she is under age and unmarried does not cease to be hers: it remains hers, and hers as income. There is nothing in the codicil which gives it to anyone else, or which qualifies the gift of it to her.

The 43rd section of the Conveyancing Act has, no doubt, to be applied; but the 2nd sub-section of that section is in this case excluded by the 3rd. The true construction of the section was pointed out by Fry, L.J., in In re Dickson, Hill v. Grant. [His lordship read the passage, and continued:—] The codicil in this case is inconsistent with any accumulation of income for the benefit of the children of the granddaughter. The codicil gives the whole income to her. This brings the case within sub-section 3, and excludes sub-section 2. With respect to the case of In re Wells, Wells v. Wells, which we were asked to overrule, I am of opinion that the decision in that was correct having regard to the terms of the will and to sub-section 3 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which in that case, as well as in this, excluded sub-section 2. It may be that the result which I think it safer to arrive at by aid of sub-section 3 can be reached without the aid of that sub-section by construing sub-section 2 as suggested by North, J., when that sub-section has to be applied to the case of a tenant for life becoming absolutely entitled to the income in possession. I have some doubt about this, but I desire to leave the point open until the necessity for deciding it arises.

Both appeals must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

KAY, L.J.—The important fact in this case, in my opinion, is that at the time when the codicil was made the testator's three daughters had all attained twenty-one, and would therefore be entitled on the testator's death to vested interests in at least one-fourth share each of his residuary estate. The only contingency remaining was as to the share intended for his granddaughter. She was still an infant, and unless she attained twenty-one or married with consent she would take no share, but the whole residue would be divisible among the three daughters of the testator and their issue, as it was settled. In these circumstances the codicil was made. By it the testator revokes "the trusts of my shares in my residuary estate directed by my will to be held in trust for my granddaughter and her issue." The argument is that this left the question what that share might be, or, rather, whether the granddaughter would ever become entitled to a share, to be determined by the will, and that the succeeding words in the codicil, only declare new and different trusts of that share, if she did become entitled to any. On the other hand, it may be urged the only gift by the will in favour of the granddaughter and her issue of a share in the testator's residuary estate was by a trust in her favour, and, taking the words of the codicil literally, that that is revoked. The codicil, it may be said, makes a new gift to her by the declaration that the share, the trusts of which are revoked, shall be held upon the trusts declared of the Highfield property. These trusts gave to the granddaughter a vested interest in the Highfield property. The meaning, therefore, may be that the granddaughter is to take a vested instead of a contingent interest in the share of residue directed by the will to be held in trust for her. That may compel the court to come to the conclusion that by the word "share" is meant the share to which this granddaughter was by the will contingently entitled under the circumstances existing at the date of the codicil, the object being to give a vested instead of a contingent interest in such share. The language of the codicil is imperfect whichever view is adopted; on the former of these two constructions the codicil should have been worded "the share, if any, directed by my will to be held in trust," &c. But the codicil certainly treats the share to which it refers as a subject in which a vested interest may be given, and this can only be done by reading "share" as the share to which, under existing circumstances, the granddaughter would be contingently entitled, and this shows that the actual words do not properly express the second construction contended for; but, upon the whole, I agree with North, J., that this is the better construction of the codicil.

As to the question who is entitled to the interest, there can be no doubt if the granddaughter, as I hold, became entitled on the testator's death to a vested interest for life in one-fourth share of the residue, she must be entitled to the income of that fourth, notwithstanding her infancy. It is argued that section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, must be read as though it were part of the codicil, and that it directs an accumulation of all the income not actually applied for the benefit of the granddaughter during her minority, and that such accumulations shall be held "for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property from which the same arose." This form is borrowed from the usual form, which applied generally when the infant's estate was not for life, but absolute. It is made, by section 43, sub-sections (1) and (2), to apply where the infant's estate is for life as well as where it is absolute. But I think that the 3rd sub-section of the section removes the difficulty. It provides, in effect, that section 43 is to apply only if and so far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument under which the interest of the infant arises. I agree that the object of this statutory provision was not to alter the rights of the infant. It was not intended to take away from the infant the income of a vested life estate which had actually accrued, and I am of opinion that when the instrument confers such a vested life interest an intention not to convert the income of that life estate into capital does sufficiently appear, and that, notwithstanding the language of section 43 sub-sections (1) and (2), the arrears of income still belong to the infant.

Solicitors for the three daughters, Clowes, Hickley, & Seward.

Solicitors for the infant, Upton, Atkey, & Upton.

Solicitor for Mrs. Levett, J. A. Levett.

Solicitor for the trustees, G. Rastrick.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 8, 9, 24.
Chitty, J. }

In re ENGLISH BANK OF THE RIVER PLATE (LIMITED). Ex parte BANCO DE BRAZIL. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Foreign bill—Protest for non-payment—Protest for better security—Acceptance suprà protest for honour of drawer—Commission—Measure of damages—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 51 (2) (5), 57 (1), 65-68, 97 (2).

The drawer who has been compelled to pay a bill may recover from the acceptor the expenses of a necessary protest under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Secus, with the expenses of an unnecessary protest.

The B. Bank claimed to prove against the E. Bank, in liquidation, for the expenses of protest for non-payment of bills drawn by B. in Brazil and accepted by E. in England, and also for the expenses of protest for better security in the case of bills that had been so protested, and for the amount of a commission paid by the B. Bank to their bankers in London for the acceptance of the bills for honour, and for providing the money required to meet that acceptance.

Held, that the B. Bank might prove for the expenses of protest for non-payment, but not for the expenses of protest for better security or the amount of the commission.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ex parte Robarts, In re Gillespie, 34 W. R. 258, 35 Ibid. 128, 16 Q. B. D. 702, 18 Ibid. 286, and Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool, 18 W. R. 463, L. R. 5 Ex. 92, explained and distinguished.

Summons.

The English Bank of the River Plate were acceptors of bills of exchange for a large amount drawn by the applicants, the Banco de Brazil, in Brazil, but stopped payment before the bills matured. The holders of some of these bills thereupon caused the bills to be protested for better security against the drawers. The bankers of the drawers in London then intervened and accepted the bills suprà protest for the honour of the drawers; and, on the bills having matured and being protested for non-payment by the same acceptors, the bankers, as acceptors for honour, paid to the holders the amount of the bills and also the expenses of both the protests, which had been paid by the holders. The bankers charged, and were paid by, the applicants, in addition to the amount of the bills and the expenses of the protests, commission at the rate of ¼ per cent. for the acceptance of the bills for honour and for providing the money required to meet that acceptance. The applicants having only been admitted to prove for the amount of the bills in the liquidation of the English Bank of the River Plate, this summons was taken out by the Banco de Brazil for the allowance of the notarial charges in respect of the protests and this commission by the liquidator.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Beven, for the applicants.—First, protest for non-payment was necessary (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 51 (2)), and we are therefore entitled by the Act to recover the expenses of such protest: section 57 (1) (c). Secondly, protest for better security being specially allowed by the Act (section 51 (5)), the expenses are given by section 57. They are at any rate not excluded by the Act; so that we should be entitled to recover these expenses as damages under the common law doctrine of re-exchange under section 97 (2): see Ex parte Robarts, In re Gillespie, 34 W. R. 258, 16 Q. B. D. 702, and, on appeal, 35 W. R. 128, 18 Q. B. D. 286. Thirdly, the drawer may recover from the acceptor all expenses properly and reasonably flowing from the breach of contract, and the commission is of this nature: see Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool, 18 W. R. 463, L. R. 5 Ex. 92.

They also referred to Walker v. Hamilton, 1 De G. F. & J. 602, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 10; In re General South American Co., 26 W. R. 232, 7 Ch. D. 637; Byles on Bills, 14th ed., p. 444, p. 3; and Daniel (U.S.A.) on Negotiable Instruments, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 468.

Latham, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the respondents.—Section 51 (5), unlike section 51 (2), is permissive only. Section 57 shows the measure of damages, which are to be deemed liquidated damages, and are the only damages given. This is the first time expenses of protest for better security have been asked, and being expenses incurred before any breach of the contract they ought not, apart from authority for allowing them, to be allowed, and there is no such authority. The applicants cannot use the cases on re-exchange to assist them here. The principle of In re Gillespie ought to be strictly confined to similar circumstances after Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers, 39 W. R. 657, [1891] A. C. 107, at p. 144. This case is clearly included in section 57, and section 97 does not apply. Then as to the commission, that was not paid to the holders of the bills at all. Prehn's case was a case of a special contract, but for which the payment there would not have been made, and has no application here.

They also referred to section 68 (5), (6) of the Act of 1882; Byles on Bills, 14th ed., p. 448, p. 214; Chitty on Bills, 10th ed., p. 337; and Maine on Damages, 4th ed., p. 9.

Whitehorne, Q.C., in reply, referred to Chalmers on Bills of Exchange, 4th ed., p. 194.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—CHITTY, J.—The applicants, the Banco de Brazil, who are the drawers of bills of exchange for upwards of £218,000, have been admitted to prove for the amount of the bills against the estate of the acceptors, the English Bank of the River Plate, a company now in liquidation. The bills were drawn in Brazil and accepted payable in London. The applicants seek to prove also for certain notarial expenses which they have paid to the holders of the bills, and also for a commission which they (the drawers) have paid to their own bankers. The questions are, whether they are entitled to prove for these additional sums.

The notarial expenses claimed consist, first, of a sum of £108 10s. 4d., and, secondly, of a sum of £59 6s. The first sum represents the expenses of the protest for non-payment by the acceptors, which were paid by the holders and repaid to them by the drawers. These expenses fall within section 51, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which renders protest for non-payment necessary, and within section 57, sub-section 1, of the same Act, which enacts that the holder may recover from any party liable on the bill, and that the drawer who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from the acceptor the expenses of protest, "when protest is necessary." It is clear, then, that the applicants are entitled to prove for the £108 10s. 4d., and it was so admitted by the respondents' counsel.

The second sum, claimed for expenses, is for the expenses of protest for better security against the drawers. [His lordship stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—] The general rules for dealing with the Bills of Exchange Act are laid down by Lord Herschell in his speech in Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers. It was intended to be a code of the law relating to negotiable instruments, and the proper course is, in the first instance, to examine the language of the statute, and to ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law; no appeal ought to be made to the previous law except upon some special ground. Examples of special grounds are given by Lord Herschell—such, for instance, as a provision in the statute being of doubtful impert, or words being found in the statute which had previously acquired a technical or special meaning. In re Gillespie was decided before the judgment was given in the House of Lords in the Vagliano case. It was submitted for the respondents that the decision was inconsistent with the rules laid down by Lord Herschell, but it was at the same time admitted that the decision in In re Gillespie must be accepted by me as binding, and I must not be understood as in any way questioning the authority of that decision. It turned principally on the 57th and 97th sections of the Act. The point decided was that, notwithstanding the 57th section, the drawer of a foreign bill of exchange upon an acceptor in England is entitled, upon the bill being dishonoured and protested, to recover from the acceptor damages in the nature of re-exchange, which the drawer is by the foreign law liable to pay to the holder of the bill. In dealing with the words "where a bill of exchange is dishonoured the measure of damages, which shall be deemed to be liquidated, shall be as follows," which occur at the beginning of the 57th section, Cave, J., appears to have been of opinion that these words were inserted for the purpose of a specially-indorsed writ; and, although some of the damages mentioned in the section would before the Act have been deemed unliquidated damages, yet that the section was not intended to take away the right which the drawer previously had by the common law to recover from the acceptor any special damages of an unliquidated character which he can prove that he has sustained. Accordingly he held that the drawer was entitled to recover as unliquidated damages by way of re-exchange the amount fixed by the law of Tobago, where the bills had been drawn. The Court of Appeal affirmed his decision with a reduction of the amount; they neither accepted or rejected his opinion on the general question of the right to recover unliquidated damages having been left unaffected by the statute. The grounds of their decision appear particularly at 18 Q. B. D., p. 292. Stated shortly, they are that the case of bills drawn abroad and dishonoured in this country is not dealt with by the 57th section, and that, being a casus omissus, it fell within the 97th section, which must be read with the 57th section. They confined the operation of the general terms of the 1st sub-section of section 57 to bills dishonoured at home.

In the case before me the argument in support of the claim for the expenses of the protest for better security were—first, that such expenses were given by the Act; secondly, that if not given they were not excluded; and, thirdly, that they fell within the 97th section and were recoverable under the head of damages under the common law doctrine of re-exchange. For the respondents, all these propositions were denied, and it was argued that these expenses were excluded by the terms of the Act.

In dealing with the claim for expenses, the first and second points may conveniently be taken together. The material sections of the Act are the 51st, sub-sections 2 and 5, section 57, sub-section 1 (c), and the fasciculus of sections 65 to 68, both inclusive, under the head of acceptance and payment for honour. Now, it is plain, on a comparison of the 51st and 57th sections, that a distinction is drawn between protests which are necessary and those which are not necessary, but are merely permissive. Where the bill is dishonoured by non-payment it "must" be duly protested for non-payment (section 51, sub-section 2); where the acceptor (as here) suspends payment before the bill matures, the holder "may" cause the bill to be protested for better security (section 51, sub-section 5); and the 57th section makes the expenses of protest recoverable against the acceptor only when the protest is necessary. It appears to me that the language of these sections is definite and precise, and that the expenses of an unnecessary protest are not recoverable. I cannot see my way to deal with the case of expenses of protest on the principle adopted by the Court of Appeal in In re Gillespie in reference to the question of damages for re-exchange which they had to decide, or to treat it as a casus omissus letting in the 97th section. Lindley, L.J., said, 18 Q. B. D., at p. 292, that sub-section 1 of the 57th section was not addressed to the case of a bill, the drawer of which is liable for damages for re-exchange. It appears to me that the same sub-section is addressed to the case of the expenses of protest, and that the case is there specifically dealt with, and that the expenses recoverable are limited to those of a necessary protest.

Further, the object of the protest is, as its name imports, to enable the holder to obtain better security. It is a condition precedent to the acceptance supra protest for the honour of the drawer or other party liable on the bill (section 65, sub-section 1). The acceptance for honour of the drawer is for his benefit, operating to sustain his credit. The protest and the acceptance are both voluntary acts; and it may well be that the Legislature did not think fit to throw the expenses of such acts on the acceptor. The payer for honour, on paying to the holder the amount and "the notarial expenses incident to its dishonour, is entitled to receive both the bill itself and the protest" (section 68, sub-section 6). "The protest" here means the protest for non-payment by the acceptor, which is necessary in order to charge the acceptor for honour. By the 97th section, sub-section 2, the rules of common law, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, are to continue to apply to bills of exchange. Finding, as I do, express provisions on the subject inconsistent with the supposed rules of common law, I think that the 97th section has no application. For the above reasons I think that the Act not only does not give, but excludes the expenses of the protest for better security. The payment of these expenses by the drawers through their London bankers to the holder was, therefore, a payment which they were not compellable to make, and the amount cannot be recovered by them from the acceptors.

But, assuming that the right to these expenses is not excluded by the other parts of the Act, and that the 97th section is let in so as to apply to these expenses as a casus omissus in the other parts of the Act, the applicants are in no better position. They claim the expenses, according to the third head of the argument, as damages for re-exchange. All the well-known treatises on bills of exchange, such as Byles, Chitty, Chalmers, and Daniel (U.S.A.), have been examined, and the decided cases have been searched through, and the result is that no trace or suggestion can be found of the expenses of a protest for better security being allowed as part of the damages for re-exchange (see Byles, 14th ed., p. 449; Chitty, 10th ed., p. 337; Chalmers, 4th ed., pp. 193-195; and 2 Daniel, 4th ed., p. 468). No evidence has been adduced of any mercantile custom justifying the claim. It must, then, be rejected.

The remaining question relates to the commission. It consists of a sum of £533 10s., being at the rate of ¼ per cent. paid by the applicants to their bankers for the acceptance of the bills for honour and for providing the money required to meet that acceptance. It is, then, the sum paid by the drawers for borrowing or obtaining an advance of money to meet the bills for their honour. The 57th section includes in the damages recoverable from the acceptor interest on the bill—see sub-section 1 (c)—and the applicants will be entitled to be paid this interest from the maturity of the bills out of the surplus of the acceptor's estate, in accordance with the decisions on the 26th order of the General Order of November, 1862 (see Buckley on the Companies Acts, 6th ed., p. 368, and p. 686). My observations on the claim for the expenses of the protest for better security apply generally to the claim for commission. The claim was supported principally on the 97th section and the doctrine of damages for re-exchange. Here also the text-books and the authorities have been searched, with the same result as above mentioned, and no evidence has been adduced of any mercantile custom. One authority only was relied on—viz., Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool. But the action there was brought not on the bill of exchange, but on a special contract, which justified the court in allowing the claim for commission as special damages. The decision, therefore, is not in point. To this I add that the normal measure of damages for non-payment of money is interest where interest is allowable by contract or by law. The claim for commission cannot, therefore, be sustained.

Solicitors for the applicants, Merriman, Pike, & Merriman.

Solicitors for the respondents, Freshfields & Williams.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Lawrance, JJ.) May 3, 4.

WOOD v. MCCARTHY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Persons having the same interest in one cause—Order authorizing one or more to defend on behalf of all—Ord. 16, r. 9.

By one of the rules of a labour protection league it was provided that any member who became permanently disabled by an accident was entitled to have a levy made for his benefit on all the members of the league.

The plaintiff brought an action against the president and secretary of the league for the purpose of enforcing his rights under the rule, and applied to the judge in chambers for an order authorizing the defendants to defend the action on behalf of all the other members of the league, who numbered about 4,000. The application was opposed by the defendants, but the judge made the order.

Held, that the order was rightly made.

Appeal of the defendants from an order of Bruce, J., in chambers, that the two defendants be authorized to defend the action on behalf of all the members of the Amalgamated Stevedores' Labour Protection League.

The plaintiff, who was a member of the league, met with an accident, while following his employment as a stevedore, and thereby became incapacitated for the remainder of his life from following his employment. Rule 27 of the league's rules provided that "in the event of any member meeting with an accident while following his employment, and thereby being incapacitated from following his employment for the remainder of his life, a levy of 6d. each shall be made on every member of the society for his benefit." The action was brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of enforcing his rights under that rule. The defendants were respectively the president and the secretary of the league, of which they were also members, and were sued personally and as representing the league and all the branches and members of the league.

The plaintiff claimed that the league, and the officers and members of the league, should be ordered by mandamus or otherwise to make the levy of 6d. under the above-mentioned rule, or to pay to the plaintiff an amount equal to the sum which would be raised by such levy, and that all judgments, declarations, and orders made in the action should be as binding on the league, and the officers and members of the league, and its branches, as if they were parties to the action.

The league consisted of about 4,000 members.

Crispe, for the defendants.—The defendants cannot be compelled against their will to defend on behalf of all the members of the league. The old practice of the Court of Chancery has been altered by ord. 16, r. 9, which only applies to cases where the plaintiff claims some beneficial proprietary right: Temperton v.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Russell, ante, p. 321, [1893] 1 Q. B. 435. There is no such claim made by the plaintiff in this action. [He also contended that the action would not lie because of the provisions of section 4 of the Trades Union Act, 1871, but the court held that that question could not be dealt with on this motion.]

Poulter, for the plaintiff.—The order can be made without the consent of the defendants, because the rule is intended for the benefit of plaintiffs. The practice is laid down in Daniell's Chancery Practice, 6th ed., vol. 1, p. 253, and there is no authority for saying that the old practice of the Court of Chancery has been in any way altered by ord. 16, r. 9.

He cited Lloyd v. Loaring, 6 Ves. 773; Adair v. New River Co., 11 Ves. 429; Cullen v. Duke of Queensbury 1 Bro. C. C. 101; Pare v. Clegg, 9 W. R. 795, 29 Beav. 589; Bromley v. Williams, 11 W. R. 392, 32 Beav. 177; May v. Newton, 35 W. R. 363, 34 Ch. D. 347; Andrews v. Salmon, W. N., 1888, pp. 102, 176.

Crispe replied.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the order appealed from was right. The action is brought to enforce a contractual obligation, which is one of the objects for which courts of law exist. The Court of Chancery has for a long time past been in the habit of allowing defendants to be sued as representatives of a class which could not be joined. In Bromley v. Williams, Sir John Romilly, M.R., said: "If that be so, provided all the members of the association were made parties, then this rule is well established: that if they are so numerous that they cannot be made parties to the cause with any chance of bringing it to a hearing in consequence of abatements and the like difficulties, then you may make two or three of a class defendants to represent the interest of all that class. Formerly that was not the practice of this court, but the rules have been modified and altered so as to suit the exigencies of modern practice, as was done by Lord Cottenham in separate instances. But if there be three or four classes who have separate and conflicting interest, then you may select two or three from each class to represent that interest, in the same way as if the whole class had been brought before the court." That was a case in which a suit was brought against seven persons as representing a large class who had agreed to contribute in the case of the loss of a ship belonging to a member of the insurance club. There is no difference in principle between that case and this one, and the judgment of the Master of the Rolls is a direct authority. But then it is said that ord. 16, r. 9, has altered the old practice. I do not think that it has. I think that rule was simply intended to apply the old practice of the Court of Chancery to all the divisions of the High Court. I cannot imagine that there was any intention to narrow the very sensible doctrine that formerly prevailed. It is said, however, that there are some expressions in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Temperton v. Russell which support the contention of the defendant. I am satisfied that that was not the intention of Lindley, L.J., and it is clear from his language that he was not narrowing the practice that has always prevailed, but was simply drawing a distinction between actions of contract and actions of tort, and showing that the old practice of the Court of Chancery was never applied to actions of tort, but was confined to cases in which persons had or claimed some beneficial proprietary right. In the present case, the plaintiff claims a right to be paid 6d. by every member of the league, and in my opinion that is a beneficial proprietary right of a very tangible character. The order appealed from must be affirmed.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Finch & Turner.

Solicitor for the defendants, J. Turner.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Charles, JJ.) April 27.

In re HOWELL THOMAS. (a.)

Solicitor—Practice—Agreement with client as to costs—Application to set aside such agreement—Summons at chambers—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), s. 8.

Since the Judicature Act, 1873, an application to set aside an agreement between a solicitor and his client as to costs may be made by a summons in chambers, notwithstanding section 8 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, which provides that such agreement may be enforced or set aside "on motion or petition" by the court in which the business was done, or a judge thereof.

Appeal from an order of Kennedy, J., at chambers, affirming an order of Master Archibald.

An application was made at chambers asking that Mr. Howell Thomas, formerly a solicitor of the Supreme Court, might be ordered to deliver certain accounts, and also asking that, if any agreement was at any time entered into by the applicant with the said Howell Thomas as his solicitor in connection with certain claims and actions, the same might be set aside or cancelled, and that the costs in respect of the business done by the said Howell Thomas might be taxed in the same manner as if no such agreement had been made.

Mr. Howell Thomas had acted as the solicitor for the applicant in connection with certain claims, and as it appeared that there had been an agreement made by the solicitor with the applicant as to the costs in the matter, the present summons at chambers was taken out by the applicant to set aside the agreement as to costs, and have the costs taxed.

When this summons came before the master objection was taken on behalf of Mr. Howell Thomas that the master had no jurisdiction to hear an application to set aside such an agreement. The master overruled this objection, and on appeal Kennedy, J., at chambers, affirmed the master's order that there was jurisdiction to deal with the matter upon a summons at chambers.

Mr. Howell Thomas appealed.

Section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, enables a solicitor to make an agreement in writing with his client as to costs, and section 8 provides that "no action or suit shall be brought or instituted upon any such agreement, but . . . the agreement may be enforced or set aside, without suit or action, on motion or petition . . . by the court in which the business was done, or a judge thereof, or, if the business was not done in any court, . . . by any superior court of law or equity or a judge thereof," &c.

Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The application here ought to have been made by motion before the court, and not in chambers, and the master had no jurisdiction to hear the application. By section 8 of the Act of 1870 the jurisdiction to set aside such an agreement was expressly given to the court; and section 39 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides as to the jurisdiction of a judge in court or in chambers. A construction was placed on this section in the case of Baker v. Oakes, 25 W. R. 220, 2 Q. B. D. 171, and Brett, L.J., there said: "It was further argued that section 39 of the Judicature Act, 1873, applied; but that section does not enable a judge of the High Court to do anything that a judge could not have done before the passing of the Act." That applies here, for undoubtedly before the Judicature Act, 1873, a judge of the High Court in chambers could not have made an order setting this agreement aside, and since the Judicature Act no judge of the Queen's Bench Division sits to hear motions. [CHARLES, J.—That is not in accordance with the practice, and Lindley, J., seems to have exercised this jurisdiction in chambers in the case of In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro, 24 W. R. 1017, 1 Q. B. D. 724, and at p. 128 (note) of Chitty's Archbold, 14th ed., it is said: "The application may be made by summons at chambers, so held by Cave, J., at chambers, March 20, 1881."] No objection was made to the jurisdiction in that case. [WILLS, J.—In Clover v. Adams, 6 Q. B. D. 622, 29 W. R. Dig. 207, Grove, J., said: "By the operation of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 39, a judge at chambers has the jurisdiction of the High Court generally, and represents all the courts," and Lindley, J., is to the same effect.] That may be so where jurisdiction is given by the rules, but it has no reference to cases where jurisdiction is given by an Act of Parliament, and here by the express terms of the Act of 1870 the power is to be exercised on motion or petition, and therefore it can be exercised only in open court.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

He referred to Smeeton v. Collier, 1 Ex. 457.

Rolland, for the respondent, was not heard.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. With regard to the objection that an application to set aside an agreement of this kind must be made to the court, it is true that the statute says that the agreement may be enforced or set aside "on motion or petition" to the court in which the business was done; and the section goes on to say that this jurisdiction may be exercised "by the court or a judge thereof." It is clear, therefore, that the intention of the statute was that a judge should have jurisdiction in the matter; but it is said that since the Judicature Act that jurisdiction is gone, because there is now no such thing as a single judge sitting in open court in the Queen's Bench Division to hear motions. I think that section 39 of the Judicature Act, 1873, was expressly intended to preserve that jurisdiction. I am clearly of opinion that the decision in this case was right, and that the universal practice which has prevailed of making these applications at chambers is not wrong.

CHARLES, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Wontner & Sons.

Solicitor for the respondent, F. Rolt.

C. C. R.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.)

Jan. 21; Feb. 4; April 29.

REG. v. MARCELLUS THOMPSON. (a.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Confession—Admissibility of.

At the trial of a prisoner for the embezzlement of moneys of his master evidence was received of a confession made by the prisoner to his master. It was proved that shortly before this confession was made the master had said to the prisoner's brother, under circumstances from which it was to be inferred that his words would be conveyed to the prisoner, "It will be the right thing for Marcellus" (the prisoner) "to make a clean breast of it." The prisoner was convicted.

Held, by the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Cave, Day, and Collins, JJ.), that the confession was not admissible in evidence, and that the conviction must be quashed.

Case stated by the acting chairman of the Westmoreland Quarter Sessions, as follows:—

At the Westmoreland Quarter Sessions of the Peace, holden at Kendal on October 21, 1892, Marcellus Thompson was tried before me and other magistrates of the county for embezzling certain moneys belonging to the Kendal Union Gas and Water Co., his masters.

William Dillworth Crewdson, the chairman of the company, at whose instance the warrant for the prisoner's apprehension had been issued, was called as a witness by the prosecution to prove, amongst other things, a confession of the prisoner.

As soon as this confession was sought to be put in evidence, objection was taken to its admissibility, and we thereupon, before receiving further proof, allowed the witness to be cross-examined by prisoner's counsel. In answer to the latter's questions the witness stated that prior to the confession being made the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law had sought an interview with him and had come to see him, and that at this interview witness said to the prisoner's brother in course of conversation: "It will be the right thing for Marcellus" (the prisoner) "to make a clean breast of it." The witness added: "I won't swear I didn't say it would be better for him to make a clean breast of it. I may have done so. I don't think I did. I expected what I said would be communicated to the prisoner. I won't swear I did not intend it should be conveyed to the prisoner. I should expect it would. I made no threat or promise to induce the prisoner to make a confession. I held out no hope that criminal proceedings would not be taken."

No evidence was produced to the court tending to prove that the details of the interview had been communicated to the prisoner, nor to rebut the evidence of Mr. Crewdson as to what took place at the interview.

It was then contended by the prisoner's counsel, who relied on R. v. Warringham, 2 Den. C. C. 447; R. v. Bate, 11 Cox. C. C. 686; R. v. Fennell, 29 W. R. 742, 7 Q. B. D. 147, and other authorities, that the above statements to the brother were inducements held out to the prisoner to confess by a person in authority which rendered the evidence tendered of the confession inadmissible.

We found that the witness Crewdson was a person in authority, and we inferred that the details of the interview would be communicated to the prisoner. We found as a fact that the statements made by the witness were calculated to elicit the truth, and that the confession was voluntary, and we accordingly admitted the evidence.

The said witness then proved that after the interview before referred to he charged the prisoner with embezzling the company's moneys, and one of the directors told the prisoner he was in a very embarrassing position. The prisoner replied, "I know that. I will give the company all the help I can." He said, in answer to witness's charge, "Yes, I took it, but I do not think it is more than £1,000. It might be a few pounds more." No statement was made to the prisoner that the confession would save him from prosecution; no threat and no promise given.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Subsequently the prisoner made out a list of moneys which he admitted had not been accounted for by him, which list we also admitted in evidence.

The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the evidence of the confession was properly admitted. If the court should be of that opinion the conviction is to be affirmed; if the court should be of opinion that such evidence ought not to have been admitted the conviction is to be quashed.

Jan. 21.—Shee, Q.C. (Cavanagh with him), for the prisoner.—The evidence of the confession was inadmissible. The cross-examination of Crewdson established a primâ facie case that the confession was not free and voluntary, but was induced by the statement made by Crewdson (who was a person in authority) to the prisoner's brother, which statement was no doubt communicated to the prisoner. It was incumbent on the prosecution to rebut this primâ facie case before evidence of the confession could be received.

They cited, in addition to the authorities mentioned in the case, Russell on Crimes, 5th ed., vol. 3, p. 491; R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. C. C. 430, 21 L. J. M. C. 130; R. v. Garner, 1 Den. C. C. 329, 2 C. & K. 920.

Segar (C. M. Wilson with him), for the prosecution.—The evidence was rightly received. The words used by Crewdson contained no threat or promise nor anything calculated to induce the prisoner to make an untrue statement, and that is the true test: R. v. Reeve, 20 W. R. 631, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 362; R. v. Jarvis, 16 W. R. 111, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 96; R. v. Moore, 2 Den. C. C. 522.

Shee replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—The COURT intimated that they required the case to be amended by setting out the whole of the evidence given at the trial, and especially stating what (if any) money was paid by the prisoner or his relatives to the prosecutor on behalf of the water company either before or after the time of the confession.

The magistrates added two paragraphs to the case and set out the notes of the evidence; it appeared that after the prisoner had made the confession £90 was paid to the company by the prisoner and £250 by his brother by way of restitution; suggestions were also made that the prisoner's brother should give a bill of sale to cover the prisoner's defalcations, but there never was any agreement that if the money were paid or security given criminal proceedings would not be taken.

The case came again before the court upon the 29th of April.

Shee, Q.C., and Cavanagh, for the prisoner, were not called upon to argue.

Segar (C. M. Wilson with him), for the prosecution.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we are all agreed that the conviction cannot be supported, and my brother Cave will read a judgment which we have all seen and which embodies the decision of the court.

CAVE, J., then read the following judgment:—

The question in this case is whether a particular admission made by the prisoner was admissible in evidence against him. This is a question which must necessarily arise for decision in a number of cases both at petty and quarter sessions, and to my mind it is very unsatisfactory that the principle which must guide the decision of magistrates in these cases should be loosely or confusedly interpreted. Many reasons may be urged in favour of the admissibility of all confessions, subject, of course, to their being tested by the cross-examination of those who heard and testify of them. Bentham seems to have been of this opinion: Rationale of Judicial Evidence, bk. V., ch. vi., s. 3. But this is not the law of England. By this law, to be admissible, a confession must be free and voluntary. If it proceeds from remorse and a desire to make reparation for the crime, it is admissible. If it flows from hope or fear excited by a person in authority it is inadmissible. On this point the authorities are unanimous. As Mr. Taylor says in his Law of Evidence, part 2, ch. xv., s. 872:—"Before any confession can be received in evidence in a criminal case it must be shown have been voluntarily made; for, to adopt the somewhat inflated language of Eyre, C.B., "a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or by the torture of fear comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; and therefore it is rejected." The material question consequently is whether the confession has been obtained by the influence of hope or fear; and the evidence to this point, being in its nature preliminary, is, as we have seen, addressed to the judge, who will require the prosecutor to show affirmatively, to his satisfaction, that the statement was not made under the influence of an improper inducement, and who, in the event of any doubt subsisting on this head, will reject the confession." The case cited for this position is R. v. Warringham, where Parke, B., says to the counsel for the prosecution, "You are bound to satisfy me that the confession which you seek to use against the prisoner was not obtained from him by improper means. I am not satisfied of that; for it is impossible to collect from the answers of this witness whether such was the case or not." Parke, B., adds, "I reject the evidence of this witness, not being satisfied that it was voluntary."

In Reg. v. Baldry it is said by Pollock, C.B., that the true ground of exclusion is not that there is any presumption of the law that a confession not free and voluntary is false; but that it would not be safe to receive a statement made under any influence of fear. He also explains that the objection to telling the prisoner that it would be better to speak the truth is that the words import that it would be better for him to say something. With this view the statutory caution agrees, which commences with the words, "You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so." These principles are re-stated and affirmed by the present Lord Chief Justice in Reg. v. Fennell in the following words; "The rule laid down in Russell on Crimes is that a confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence. It is well known that the chapter of Russell on Crimes containing that passage was written by Sir R. Williams, a great authority upon these matters." These principles and the reasons for them are, as it seems impossible to doubt, well founded, they afford to magistrates a simple test by which the admissibility of a confession may be decided. They have to ask, Is it proved affirmatively that the confession was free and voluntary—that is, was it preceded by any inducement held out by a person in authority to make a statement? If so, and the inducement has not clearly been removed before the statement was made, evidence of the statement is inadmissible. In the present case the magistrates appear to have intended to state the evidence which was before them, and to ask our opinion whether on that they did right in admitting the confession. Now there was obviously some ground for suspecting that the confession might have not been free and voluntary; and the question is whether the evidence was such as ought to have satisfied their minds that it was free and voluntary. Unfortunately, in my judgment, the magistrates do not seem to have understood what the precise point to be determined was, or what evidence was necessary to elicit it. The new evidence now before us throws a strong light on what was the object of the interview between Mr. Crewdson and the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law, why he made any communication to them, and why he expected what he said would be communicated to the prisoner. There is, indeed, no evidence that any communication was made to the prisoner at all; but it seems to me that, after Mr. Crewdson's statement that he had spoken to the prisoner's brother and brother-in-law about the desirability of the prisoner's making a clean breast of it, with the expectation that what he had said would be communicated to the prisoner, it was incumbent on the prosecution to prove whether any, and, if so, what, communication was actually made to the prisoner before the magistrates could properly be satisfied that the confession was free and voluntary. The magistrates go on to say that they inferred that the details of the interview would be (by which, I suppose, they intend to say that they inferred they were) communicated to the prisoner, which seems to have been the right inference to draw under the circumstances. They add that they found as a fact that the statements made by Crewdson were calculated to elicit the truth, and that the confession was voluntary.

The first of these findings, if the ruling of Pollock, C.B., in Reg. v. Baldry is (as I take it to be) correct, is entirely immaterial. The second finding, if it is a corollary from the first, does not follow from it, and if it is an independent finding is not warranted by the evidence; and as the question for us is whether this finding was warranted by the evidence, I feel compelled to say that in my judgment it was not. Taking the statement of Mr. Crewdson to have been "It will be the right thing for Marcellus to make a statement," and that the statement was communicated to the prisoner, I should say that that communication was calculated, in the language of Pollock, C.B., to lead the prisoner to believe that it would be better for him to say something. All this, however, is matter of conjecture; and I prefer to put my judgment on the ground that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove, in case of doubt, that the prisoner's statement was free and voluntary, and that they did not discharge themselves of this obligation. I would add that for my part I always suspect these confessions, which are supposed to be the offspring of penitence and remorse, and which, nevertheless, are repudiated by the prisoner at the trial. It is remarkable that it is of very rare occurrence for evidence of a confession to be given when the proof of the prisoner's guilt is otherwise clear and satisfactory; the prisoner is not infrequently alleged to have been seized with the desire, born of penitence and remorse, to supplement it with a confession, and this desire itself again vanishes as soon as he appears in a court of justice. In this particular case there is no reason to suppose that Mr. Crewdson's evidence was not perfectly true and accurate, but on the broad plain ground that it was not proved satisfactorily that the confession was free and voluntary I think it ought not to have been received. No other principle can in my judgment be safely worked by magistrates.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitor for the prisoner, G. B. Wheeler, for R. F. Thompson, Kendal.

Solicitor for the prosecution, John Bolton, Kendal.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Feb. 14.

"THE ALPS." (a.)

Insurance — Marine insurance — Policy on chartered freight—Cessation of hire in consequence of working of vessel being delayed for more than twenty-four hours owing to damage occasioned by perils insured against —Injure non remota sed causa proxima spectatur.

By the charter-party of a vessel, the chartered freight of which, was insured against (inter alia) "fire," it was provided that the vessel should be hired by the charterer at a stipulated sum per month, and that, in the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner, preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the payment of hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the ship should be again in a sufficient state to resume her service.

During the continuation of the charter-party, and at a time when the chartered freight was covered by the policy, the vessel was damaged by fire to such an extent as necessitated her being repaired. During the time the repairs were being done—for more than twenty-four hours—the hire of the vessel "ceased" within the meaning of the charter-party, and a loss of chartered freight, amounting to £179 6s. 6d., thereby accrued to the shipowner. In an action by the shipowner on the policy to recover from the underwriters the portion of this amount for which they were liable,

Held, that there had been a loss of chartered freight by the perils assured against, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

This was an action in personam instituted on behalf of the owners of The Alps against The Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. (Limited) to recover the sum of £35 3s. 1d. alleged to be due from the defendants on a time policy upon the chartered freight of The Alps.

After the issue of the writ of summons in the action the parties agreed that the case should be heard on joint admissions of fact, and an order was made by consent that the question of law, whether, upon the facts stated in the average statement drawn up on behalf of the underwriters and the plaintiffs, and in the policy of insurance and other documents therein referred to, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover any, and what, sum in the action should be heard without a special case being stated.

Pickford and Maurice Hill, for the plaintiffs.—There has been obviously in this case a loss of chartered freight directly caused by "fire," one of the perils insured against by this policy. The efficiency of the ship was a condition precedent to earning the freight at risk, and directly the fire occurred the ship became inefficient. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover in respect of the freight lost during the time the vessel was inefficient. The observations of Lord Watson in the Inman Steamship

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Co. v. Bischoff, 31 W. R. 141, 7 App. Cas. 670, 690, show that this was his opinion of what would be the law in the case of a charter-party framed as the charter-party in the present case. It is true that in the appeal then before the House of Lords their lordships held that there had been no loss of freight under a policy on outstanding freight where, the ship insured having become inefficient, the freight had not been paid under the charter-party during her inefficiency, but the reason of the decision then come to was that the payment of freight had not ceased by reason of the inefficiency caused by the perils insured against, but by reason of the charterers exercising an option given them by the charter-party to make an abatement in the amount paid as freight on the vessel becoming inefficient.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., for the defendants. — The defendants rely on The Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff as showing that the loss here was not immediately caused by the perils of the seas. The intention of the assured and the underwriters was only that freight lost under the ordinary contract of affreightment should be covered by the policy in this case, and not freight which, but for the operation of a special clause in the charter-party, would have been caused by the shipowner. [BARNES, J., referred to Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Co., 22 W. R. 79, 23, Ibid. 169, L. R. 8 C. P. 572, 10 Ibid. 125, and The Mercantile Steamship Co. v. Tyser, 29 W. R. 790, 7 Q. B. D. 73.]

BARNES, J.—The question in this case arises under a policy of marine insurance, and is one of some interest, which I will presently deal with. But I desire at the outset to notice a remarkable feature about the case to which it is extremely desirable that attention should be drawn, involving as it does a new and decidedly beneficial step in legal procedure. The proceedings in the action were commenced only about ten days ago, and are of the utmost simplicity, consisting only of the writ, and an application in chambers to dispose of the matter in dispute under ord. 34, r. 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and an order which I considered it right to make in order that the matter might be promptly disposed of. The order is to the effect that the question of law, whether upon the facts stated in an average statement and certain documents therein referred to the plaintiffs are entitled to recover any, and what, sum from the defendants, be tried without a special case to-day. Both parties, being desirous of obtaining a speedy decision of the court upon the point raised, have availed themselves of the facilities which exist, though not ordinarily used, for this purpose. So far as my experience goes, I cannot recall any case where this method of procedure has been adopted, but it is obvious that where both parties to a commercial case such as this are anxious to have their dispute determined at once, and do not insist upon the ordinary formalities, and particularly where there is little or no dispute of fact, this procedure affords the means of enabling the parties to have their case argued and decided in open court with rapidity and economy sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the commercial world. In my judgment the parties and their solicitors have taken a most businesslike course, which is worthy of every encouragement, and might be frequently followed with advantage in similar cases. I should add that, although actions of this kind have not usually been brought in this division, yet such actions, if brought here, may be retained in the division if the court considers it expedient so to do; and, in my opinion, it is expedient that this action should be disposed of here under the circumstances, and very desirable and convenient that the wish of the parties to have it so dealt with should be acceded to.

To come now to the point in dispute. The action is upon a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants for £1,000 upon chartered freight, including all liberties, as per bill of lading, on the plaintiffs' ship or vessel, The Alps, for twelve months from the 9th of June, 1891, to the 8th of June, 1892, and the plaintiffs claim £35 3s. 1d. for a particular average loss under the said policy. It appears that the vessel was chartered by the plaintiffs to certain charterers by a charter-party, which provided that the vessel was let to the charterers and hired by them at the rate of £425 per calendar month, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month, payment to be made in cash at New York monthly in advance at current rates of exchange. The charter-party provided that in the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repair, breakdown of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner, preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the payment of hire should cease from the hour when detention began until the ship would be again in a sufficient state to resume her service. On the 18th of August, 1891, at about 3.30 a.m., the vessel, while lying at the Union Stores, Brooklyn, taking in cargo, was discovered to be on fire. By pouring water on the fire the fire was extinguished. On examination it was found that the forepeak was completely burnt out, the upper deck was also badly burnt as well as the sails and stores belonging to the vessel, including a towing hawser, and the skin of the vessel was injured by the heat. The vessel was repaired, and the repairs occupied thirteen days, and the hire for the vessel for these days was repaid to the charterers. The loss of freight to the shipowners was thus £179 5s. 6d. Insurances to the extent of £2,500 had been effected, and it was for the proportion applicable to the defendants' policy that this action was brought.

The question arises whether or not the loss was caused by the perils insured against, or one of them, or, as counsel for the defendants contend, is to be treated as a loss not due to the perils insured against proximately, but to the effect of the clause in the charter.

The case which both parties agree is decisive of this, according to the way it is looked at, is that of The Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff, reported in the Court of Appeal (6 Q. B. D. 648) and in the House of Lords ubi suprà. The plaintiffs there sought to recover, under a policy upon "freight outstanding," for loss of hire which had been caused by the Commissioners of the Admiralty putting the ship off pay under a special clause in the charter-party which had been effected for the vessel.

It is unnecessary to criticize that case with any great accuracy so far as its own terms are concerned, because it is obvious, and Lord Bramwell, the Bramwell, L.J., in dealing with that case in the Court of Appeal said that the Commissioners, acting under the clause, put the ship out of pay, and that as his lordship proceeds to say, that no doubt in that case the loss of hire was not to be treated as having been a loss due to the perils of the sea; because he considered in that particular case it was not proximately so caused. In the House of Lords Lord Selborne says: "The result is, in my opinion, a right to the freight in question must be deemed to have accrued under the terms of the charter-party, but to have been subsequently in July, 1879, defeated, under the power of abatement by way of mulct reserved by the contract to the Board of Admiralty. It has not been without doubt, or (I must add) without reluctance, that I have come to the conclusion that this is not a loss so directly, proximately, and immediately resulting from the perils of the seas insured against, as to make it payable under the terms of the policy by the insurers." Then he goes on to say: "The general principle of causa proxima, non remota, spectatur is intelligible enough, and easy of application in many cases; but that there are cases in which a too literal application of it would work injustice, and would not really be justified by the principle itself, is apparent. . . ." Then he proceeds, a little later on in his judgment: "If in the present case, the other terms of the charter-party being the same, a power had been reserved to the charterers or their agents to determine the contract, and their liability to further freight, on the occurrence of any such damage to the ship by the perils of the sea as might render her inefficient for the service which she had undertaken, and if such power had been exercised before any further freight was earned, I should have been of opinion that this was a loss of freight by perils of the sea for which the insurers were liable. Nor would it, in my opinion, have made any difference although provision might have been made by the contract for the continuance of the troops and stores in the ship, after the exercise of the power to determine the contract, until such time as they could be conveniently landed or transferred to other vessels. But between such a case and that of a subsequent mulct under a special power, such as that contained in this charter-party, after freight had been earned which (unless the power of mulct were exercised) would be payable under the contract, there seems to me to be an important difference. The principle of such cases as Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 B. & P. 388, Taylor v. Dunbar, 17 W. R. 382, L. R. 4 C. P. 206, and McSwiney v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, 14 Q. B. 634, seems to be here and applicable, obliges me to conclude that the risk of loss by the exercise, under such circumstances, of such a special power is different from the risk of loss by perils of the seas, and ought to have been insured against in some more special manner if it was the intention of the parties that it should be covered by the policy. I do not dissemble that there appears to me to be something of refinement in the distinction, which the rule laid down by the authorities as applied to the particular facts of this case oblige me to make, but though refined it seems to me to be a real distinction, and to justify the judgment of the court below." Then Lord Blackburn said, after commenting upon the way in which the charter-party must be looked at:—"But as soon as it is ascertained that the policy attached on the hire under a particular charter-party, the charter-party must be read in order to see how the subject-matter was affected by the misfortune which happened. Under one charter-party a temporary disablement of the ship might occasion a loss for which the underwriters on ship would be responsible, but which would not have any effect at all on the assured's right to recover the hire of the vessel whilst she was disabled. Under another, such a temporary disablement might deprive the shipowner of all claim for hire during the time she was disabled. In the first of these cases there could be no claim against the underwriters on freight, for there was no loss of freight. In the second I do not see how it could properly be denied that there was such a loss." And then he comments upon the doctrine of causa proxima, non causa remota, spectatur, and says: "I must own that I have always sympathized with Lord Colonsay in Rankin v. Potter, L. R. 6 H. L., p. 160, where he says, 'Something is said about proximate and remote causes, and these are matters that are very apt to lead us into philosophical mazes.' . . . I think, as he did, that when we get a clear view of the fact it is best to keep clear of such philosophical mazes. . . . And, as I think, the question here is not what was the proximate cause of a loss of freight, but whether there was any loss of freight."

Now I do not say that the counsel for the defendants has led me off into a philosophical maze, but he has, with great ingenuity, endeavoured to point out how, under certain circumstances, a claim can be made under this policy for a partial loss, so that, as he contended, full effect might be given to the policy without allowing such a claim as the claim now in question. But that does not seem sufficient to conclude this particular case. Lord Watson says, in The Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff, putting it shortly: "If I am right in my construction of the charter-party, the case turns upon a very narrow point. The inefficiency of the vessel was admittedly due to perils of the sea which were within the risks insured by the policy; and if it had been expressly stipulated in the charter-party that freight should cease to be payable so long as the ship was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her contract, I do not doubt that the insurers would have been liable. That would have been a plain case of cesser or loss of freight by the perils insured against. But that is not the present case." I apply the language of Lord Watson to the case before me. The inefficiency of this vessel was admittedly due to the fire, one of the perils insured against. It has been expressly stipulated in the charter-party that, in the event of loss of time from want of repairs, the hire should cease to be payable so long as the vessel was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her service. It is a case of cesser, or loss of freight, through a peril insured against.

The counsel for the defendants urges that many other causes might produce want of repairs. Yes; but only certain perils are insured against, one of which is fire, and it seems to me that, having regard to the judgments I have referred to, and the principles they seem to indicate, and also to the case of Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Co., the true view to take of an insurance such as this, applied to a very ordinary form of charter-party containing a very ordinary and usual clause, is that it casts upon the underwriters the risk of loss of freight when that clause is put into operation through the immediate action of the perils insured against.

I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and my judgment will be for them for the sum of £35 3s. 1d. I do not suppose interest is asked for; but, this being a test case, I certify that it is a proper one to have been tried in the High Court.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Court of Appeal.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — May 5.

Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER.
In re FLATAU. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Rescission—Consent of petitioning creditor.

A receiving order having been made against a debtor, he paid the petitioning creditor's debt and applied to the registrar to rescind the receiving order. The only fact proved before the registrar was that the petitioning creditor consented to the rescission. The registrar rescinded the receiving order.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the registrar had not sufficient evidence before him on which he could rescind the receiving order.

Appeal of the official receiver against an order made by the registrar rescinding a receiving order which he had previously made against the debtor.

The receiving order was made in due course after judgment recovered against the debtor and non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice. The debtor stated that he intended to appeal against the receiving order, and the registrar made an order staying the proceedings under the receiving order for seven days in order to allow the debtor to appeal. Subsequently the debtor abandoned his appeal, and paid the petitioning creditor's debt and costs. The debtor then applied to the registrar to set aside the receiving order; he gave no notice of his application to the official receiver, and filed no affidavit in support of it. The petitioning creditor consented to the application, and the registrar made an order rescinding the receiving order.

Sir John Rigby, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—A receiving order having been made, it cannot be rescinded merely because the petitioning creditor consents. It is necessary to give notice to the official receiver, which was not done in this case, and all the circumstances of the case must be looked at: see In re Hester, 22 Q. B D. 632, 37 W. R. Dig. 20. The registrar thought the case was governed by In re Brigstocke, 25 W. R. 262, 4 Ch. D. 348, but in that case the petitioning creditor's debt was paid before the receiving order was made.

Debtor in person.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the registrar made a receiving order against the debtor, and the debtor at first intended to appeal against that receiving order, but he afterwards gave up that idea, and, therefore, there was a receiving order in existence which had not been appealed against All that could then be done was for the debtor to move to have the order rescinded, and the case would be governed by the rules which have been laid down with regard to the rescinding of receiving orders. The debtor went before the registrar, he produced no affidavit, but satisfied the registrar that the petitioning creditor consented, and the case must be decided on the footing that that was the only fact which was proved before the registrar.

The question is whether the registrar, having only that fact before him, had power to rescind the receiving order. In In re Hester the court laid down certain rules with regard to the rescinding of receiving orders, and that case shows that before the order could be rescinded there must be a very careful examination into all the circumstances of the case, and that even where there are many creditors and they all consent, still the court will not act on that fact alone, but will make inquiries of the widest kind in order to protect creditors against their own carelessness, and also to ascertain whether it would be in the interests of the public at large for the receiving order to be rescinded. In the present case, the consent of the petitioning creditor has been obtained, but there are other creditors in existence and nothing is known about the previous conduct of the debtor, and under those circumstances it is not right that the receiving order should be rescinded.

The registrar thought this was an exceptional case, and treated it as if the money had been paid before the receiving order was made. But he had no power to do so. The receiving order having been made the registrar was functus officio; and with regard to rescinding was bound by the rules which I have enumerated. The appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The registrar acted on the authority of In re Brigstock. That case is distinguishable from this because there the payment of the creditors took place before the receiving order was made. The case must be decided on the principles laid down in In re Hester, which shows that the consent of the creditors to the rescinding of the receiving order is an element to be considered, but is not conclusive.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the official receiver, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Solicitor for the debtor, A. J. Benjamin.

From Durham Palatine Court of Chancery. (Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ.) — May 4.

In re MACKENZIE.
Ex parte SHORT. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Costs—Taxation—Allowance by solicitor of part of bill—More than one-sixth taxed off—Special circumstances—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

A firm of solicitors sent in to their clients, who were two surviving trustees, a detailed bill of their charges in respect of business connected with the trust for which they had been employed. The bill was for £44 2s. 8d., and there was added at the foot, "By allowance, £7 2s. 8d." The taxing master disallowed £10 19s. 4d. from the bill (of £44 2s. 8d.), but stated in his certificate that he treated the bill as one for £37, as he considered the £7 2s. 8d. allowance to be unconditional; many of the charges were disallowed on the ground that the trustees themselves ought to have performed the work in respect of which the disallowed charges were made, but it appeared that the solicitors had been expressly instructed by the acting trustee (since deceased) to perform it; and the taxing master considered the solicitors entitled to the costs of taxation.

Held (affirming the decision of the Chancellor of the Durham Palatine Court of Chancery) that the bill was properly taxable on £44 2s. 8d.

Held, also, that the facts were sufficient to justify the Chancellor in allowing, in the exercise of his discretion, the solicitors the costs of the taxation.

In re Carthew, In re Paull, 32 W. R. 940, 27 Ch. D. 485, followed.

Appeal from a decision of the Chancellor of the Durham Palatine Court of Chancery.

In November, 1892, the respondents, who were solicitors, delivered to the appellants, who were the surviving trustees of one George Short, a detailed bill of their charges and disbursements in relation to certain business connected with the trust. The bill amounted to £44 2s. 8d., at the foot of which was added "By allowance £7 2s. 8d.," thus reducing the amount to £37.

On the 6th of January, 1893, upon the petition of the solicitors an order for taxing the bill was made, and upon the taxation the taxing master disallowed from the bill as delivered the sum of £10 19s. 4d., which, being more than one-sixth of the whole, the clients claimed the costs of the taxation, contending that the circumstances of the present case were similar to those of In re Carthew, In re Paull, 32 W. R. 940, 27 Ch. D. 485.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The taxing master disallowed the clients' contention, and gave the solicitors their costs of taxation. In his certificate, made pursuant to section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, which he issued after taking time to consider his decision, the taxing master said, "On taxation I disallowed the sum of £10 19s. 4d., which, being more than one-sixth of the amount of the bill as delivered, . . . the clients claimed to be entitled to the costs of the taxation. It was contended on their behalf that the circumstances of the present case were similar to those of the cases of In re Carthew and In re Paull. I held, however, that there were circumstances in the present case which distinguished it from In re Carthew and In re Paull. . . . In the present instance the solicitors actually deducted £7 2s. 8d. from the total of their bill, thus reducing the amount of it to £37, and I therefore treated it as one for £37. There was, in my opinion, no implied condition attached that £37 would only be accepted in case taxation was dispensed with. . . . Many of the charges which I felt it my duty to disallow were disallowed on the ground that the work in respect of which such charges were made appeared to be work which in strictness the trustees themselves (the clients) ought to have performed. It should, however, be borne in mind in considering by whom the costs of taxation should be paid that it was pointed out to me on behalf of the solicitors, and the fact appeared to be, that, owing to considerable friction existing between the three trustees, Thomas Short, the acting trustee (since deceased), for whom the solicitors acted, declined on several occasions to meet his co-trustees, and had expressly instructed the solicitors to perform the work in respect of which the disallowed items were charged. After giving a careful consideration to all the circumstances of the case, I have now, in the exercise of the discretion vested in me under section 37 of the Act, to certify that in my opinion the solicitors should be allowed the costs of taxation of their said bill."

On the 29th of March, on motion by the solicitors asking for the costs in accordance with the taxing master's certificate, the Chancellor was of opinion that, on the authority of In re Carthew and In re Paull, more than one-sixth of the bill had been taxed off, but he held the solicitors to be entitled to the costs of the taxation as the registrar had certified "specially certain circumstances."

The clients appealed. [They also, on the appeal, proposed to question the solicitors' retainer, but the point had not been raised before the Chancellor, though it had been dealt with by the taxing master, and the court refused to entertain it.]

Bramwell Davis, for the appellants.—The bill must be an item bill, and the taxation must be upon the footing of this bill being one for £44 2s. 8d.: In re Carthew; therefore more than one-sixth has been taxed off, and the solicitors ought primâ facie not to have the costs of taxation. Then there is nothing here sufficient to constitute "special circumstances" so as to entitle them to have them: In re Paull.

Warrington, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal which ought never to have been brought. A common order to tax a solicitors' bill of costs was obtained as against two surviving trustees. The bill was for £44 2s. 8d., and £7 2s. 8d. was deducted, making it £37. Then the taxation proceeded as if the bill was for £44 2s. 8d. which, on the authority of In re Carthew, was quite right. The taxing master taxed off £10 19s. 4d.—practically £4 more than the solicitors had allowed—and certified "special circumstances," making that certificate under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, which provides that the proper officer "shall in all cases be at liberty to certify specially any circumstances relating to" the "bill or taxation, and the court or judge shall be at liberty to make thereupon any such order as such court or judge may think right respecting the payment of the costs of such taxation." The Chancellor exercised his discretion, and said he would not order the solicitors to pay the costs. We think the facts are quite sufficient to justify him in so deciding. In the exercise of his discretion he did what he did, and it would take a very strong case to induce us to interfere with a case of that sort. The appeal must be dismissed. The trustees must pay the costs of the appeal.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree.

KAY, L.J.—I also.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, J. E. & H. Scott, for Graham & Shepherd, Sunderland.

Solicitors for the respondents, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — April 26, 27.

HAMLYN v. CROWN ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance—Accident—"Injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means"—Dislocation of knee.

By a policy of insurance against accident the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff compensation if he should sustain "any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." The policy contained a proviso that the insurance should not cover injury arising from natural disease or weakness. The plaintiff sustained injury by breaking a ligament in his knee while he was in the act of stooping.

Held, that such injury was covered by the policy.

Application by the defendants for a new trial or for judgment.

The action was brought on a policy of insurance against accidents by which the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff compensation if, at any time within one year from the date or during the continuance of the policy, he should sustain "any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." There was a proviso that the policy should not extend to or cover the death or injury of the insured arising from natural disease, or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease, or any surgical operation rendered necessary thereby or arising from such disease or weakness. The plaintiff, who was a shopkeeper, was standing in his shop near the counter, when a boy, who had come into the shop with a customer, dropped a marble, which rolled along a sloping part of the shop floor. The plaintiff, in order to stop the marble and pick it up, bent down and stooped, having his knees turned outwards and far apart. When he resumed an upright position he found that one of his knees was injured. He had not slipped, nor hit his leg or knee against anything.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The medical evidence showed that the ligament which joined the two cartilages which separated the upper and lower bones of the leg had broken, and the cartilages had been forced out of their place, and the knee had become stiff. The knee remained stiff till the cartilages were put back into their place. The medical evidence also showed that what had happened was a natural thing to happen if a man stooped down in the particular way in which the plaintiff appeared to have stooped.

By a reference to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the policy the amount of compensation, if any was recoverable, had been fixed at £60.

The action was tried by Lawrance, J., and a jury, at Bodmin. The learned judge was of opinion that the facts proved brought the case within the terms of the policy, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and entered judgment accordingly.

The defendants moved for a new trial or judgment.

Bompas, Q.C., and Blake Odgers, for the defendants.—The injury which the plaintiff sustained does not come within the terms of the policy, which applies to injuries "caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." The means which caused the injury which the plaintiff sustained was his stooping, his putting his body into the position into which he did put it. This was not violent, accidental, nor external; nor, so far as it was not external, was it visible. "Violent" means caused by unusual physical force; "accidental" means unintentional; "external" means caused by something outside the body of the person injured; "visible" means something which can be seen, and of which evidence can be given by any person who is present, in contradistinction to such a thing as a sunstroke. The plaintiff's stooping was not caused by unusual physical force. Neither was it unintentional. The plaintiff placed his body in the position in which he intended to place it; it was only the result that was unintentional. Sinclair v. Maritime Passengers' Assurance Co., 9 W. R. 342, shows that this was not "accidental" in the sense in which that word is used in a policy of insurance. Neither was it something ab extra, as in the cases where the assured was suffocated by drowning: Trew v. Railway Passengers' Assurance Co., 9 W. R. 671, 6 H. & N. 839; Reynolds v. Accidental Insurance Co., 18 W. R. 1141; Winspear v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 116, 6 Q. B. D. 42. It does not follow that, because the case does not come within the terms of the proviso, therefore liability must attach under the operative words of the policy. An injury sustained apart from external cause, even though not arising from natural disease, is excluded from the policy. Neither was the means here visible. No doubt the outward motion of the plaintiff's body was visible; but the whole of the means which caused the injury was not visible. If, however, it was external it must be admitted it was also visible.

S. J. Fraser Macleod (Bullen with him), for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the real question in contest at the trial of this action was as to the meaning of the policy. It must be taken to have been admitted that, if the policy bore one meaning, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed, and, if it bore another, the defendants were entitled to succeed. The question, therefore, here is whether on the true construction of the policy the facts proved bring the case within it. The words which we have to construe are the words which impose a liability on the defendants in case of the plaintiff sustaining "any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." It seems to me clear that "caused by" is equivalent to "the result of"; and "means" is equivalent to "cause." Therefore the sentence may be read thus—"any bodily injury being the result of any violent, accidental, external, and visible cause."

Now, what happened was that the plaintiff, seeing a little boy's marble rolling along the sloping floor of his shop, tried to stop it in order to give it back to the child. He opened his knees, as he describes it, bent them, and stooped down, and grasped at the marble. But he did it awkwardly, and wrenched his leg. It was the wrench that did the mischief; that was the cause of the injury which he sustained. That this wrench was accidental I cannot doubt; he certainly did not mean to wrench his leg. The cause of which the injury was the result was therefore accidental. Neither can it be denied that it was violent. The question whether it was an external cause requires consideration. I feel certain that the word "external" in this policy ought to be construed with reference to the proviso at the end of the policy, and that it is here used as the antithesis of "internal," it being intended that what may be called internal causes should be dealt with by the proviso. If an injury were sustained which was the result of some internal cause, that is, if it arose from "natural disease or weakness consequent upon disease," as, for instance, a clot of blood arising in the system or some inherent weakness in the constitution, that would not be within the policy. I think that an external cause is the opposite of such internal cause. In this sense it is clear that the wrenching of the plaintiff's leg was an external cause. It is also plain that it was a visible cause. Therefore what happened in this case is within the terms of the policy, and the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. I think that the judgment of Lawrance, J., is right, and the application must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Reading the policy as a person of ordinary intelligence would read it, I find words in the proviso which say that the policy is not to extend to or cover injury arising from natural disease or weakness; those words deal with injury caused by internal matters. Then in the earlier part of the policy I find the words now in question; and they seem to me to deal with injury caused by external matters, that is, by matters different from and intended to be contradistinguished from those internal matters which are dealt with in the proviso. In my opinion the words mean any bodily injury arising from any violent, accidental, external, and visible cause. If that is the meaning of the words, the admitted facts seem to me to show that the case is within the policy. What the plaintiff did when he wrenched himself in the way described was certainly "violent"; he used extra exertion, extra physical force, and in so doing he overreached himself. It was also "accidental," which means something unexpected, unforeseen, casual; it might be said to have been an unexpected casualty. Then as to whether it was "external," it is most important in answering this question to refer to the other part of the policy, in order to see whether this was an injury caused by any such internal matter as is dealt with in the proviso. It is clear that the stooping and reaching after the marble and the wrenching of the plaintiff's leg did not arise from any disease or inherent weakness in the plaintiff, and, therefore, what happened was not an internal matter within the proviso. It follows that it was "external" within the meaning of that word in the earlier part of the policy. There can be no question that it was also "visible."

I think, therefore, that the judgment was correct.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Bolton & Co., for Wellington Dale, Penzance.

Solicitors for the defendants, Burton, Yeates, & Hart, for Trythall & Bodilly, Penzance.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. [Divisional Court.] (Lindley, Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — March 27.

THE SHIP "CRESCENT."

GREAT NORTHERN STEAMSHIP FISHING CO. (LIMITED) v. OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP "CRESCENT." (a.)

Practice—Appeal from City of London Court—No note of proceedings in court below—Order of Divisional Court for production and examination of witnesses examined at the trial—Jurisdiction—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 59, r. 8.

When no note of what occurred in the county court has been taken, a Divisional Court has, upon appeal, jurisdiction to order that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the court below should be produced and examined on the hearing of the appeal; but care ought to be taken by the court to prevent fresh evidence being given, so that such appeal should not become practically a new trial.

Order of the Divisional Court (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of a divisional court of the Admiralty Division (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.).

The action was brought in the City of London Court on the admiralty side by the Great Northern Steamship Fishing Co. (Limited) against the owners of the steamship Crescent to recover £100 and costs for damage by collision between The Crescent and a ship belonging to the plaintiff company. The trial took place before Mr. Commissioner Kerr on the 1st of March, 1893. Neither party took any note of the evidence given at the trial or of what took place there. The learned judge, who did not take any note, and was not asked to do so, gave judgment for the plaintiffs with £70 damages.

The defendants gave notice of appeal, and moved before the Divisional Court for an order, under ord. 59, r. 8, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, that upon the hearing of the appeal the witnesses called and examined at the trial of the action in the court below, both by the plaintiffs and defendants, might be examined vivâ voce before the Divisional Court as to what they had said in the court below, upon the ground that the learned judge in the court below had taken no note of the evidence, and that otherwise the appellants would be deprived of their right to appeal. Ord. 59, r. 8, is as follows: "On any motion by way of appeal from an inferior court, the court to which any such appeal may be brought shall have power, if the notes of the judge of such inferior court are not produced, to hear and determine such appeals upon any other evidence or statement of what occurred before such judge which the court may deem sufficient."

The Divisional Court, on the 6th of March, 1893, decided that the appeal ought to be heard, and ordered that the witnesses of both parties called and examined in the court below must be produced and examined at the hearing of the appeal.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Walton, Q.C., and Butler Aspinall, for the appellants.—The court has no power under ord. 59, r. 8, to make such an order as was made in this case, for the hearing would amount practically to a new trial, and not to an appeal, which is the proper remedy. There is a right of appeal from a final judgment in an admiralty action in the county court: County Courts Act, 1868, s. 26; County Courts Act, 1888, s. 120; The Eden, 40 W. R. 415, [1892] P. 67. Under section 120 of the Act of 1888 a note by the judge of what took place at the trial in the county court is a condition precedent to the hearing of any appeal: Cook v. Gordon, 61 L. J. Q. B. 445, 40 W. R. Dig. 63. In the absence of special circumstances an order of this kind ought not to be made: The Busy Bee, 20 W. R. 803, L. R. 3 A. & E. 527; The Confidence, 40 L. T. N. S. 201, 27 W. R. Dig. 65.

F. N. Laing, for the respondents, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think that we can go to the length of discharging this order. It is a somewhat unusual one. [His lordship read the order.] The action was brought in the City of London Court. The matter not being a very important one as regards the amount of money involved, no one took any note of what was said by the witnesses or of what took place at the trial. The learned commissioner, as is known, is so overburdened by his work that he is unable to take notes of the evidence. It is unfortunate that there are no means of having notes taken of what takes place in the court, but perhaps there may be hereafter. In the meantime matters are at a deadlock. The decision was against the defendants. They have a right to appeal, but there are no materials upon which the Divisional Court can hear the appeal. The defendants accordingly applied to that court to make an order under ord. 59, r. 8, of the Rules of Court for the examination before that court of the witnesses examined at the trial of the action in the court below. The court had power to make such an order, and has, in the exercise of its discretion, made the order which I have read. Can we say that it is wrong? I think that the defendants are not entitled under the rule to have a new trial, but only to have the evidence given in the court below reproduced. I admit that there may be some difficulty in preventing fresh evidence being given, and the appeal so becoming practically a new trial, but the Divisional Court must be trusted to deal with that as they think best. I cannot say that the Divisional Court was wrong in making the order in question, and I think we should be doing more harm than good if we were to reverse their decision. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rule 8 of order 59 does not authorize a new trial, but, there being nothing in the present case to show the Divisional Court what took place in the City of London Court, it has power to hear the appeal upon any evidence of what occurred in the court below which it thinks fit. What evidence can be obtained except by calling the witnesses and asking them what evidence they gave at the trial? There is, I admit, a great difficulty in drawing a distinction between that and a new trial, but this court has not to deal with that. I cannot say that it was not within the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court under the rule to make the order in question if there are no other means of finding out what took place at the trial. They may say that they will have the witnesses before them and ask them to repeat all that they said. That is within the very letter of the rule. That means of ascertaining the evidence must be used in such a way, if possible, as to prevent the appeal taking the form of a new trial; but we must leave the Divisional Court to deal with that. All that we say now is that the Divisional Court was not going beyond its jurisdiction in making the order appealed from.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I quite agree. I only add that this case does not either agree or disagree with Cook v. Gordon, which was a case under section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888. If that case ever comes up again for discussion the court which has to deal with it will not, in my opinion, be fettered by anything which has happened to-day.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, J. A. & H. E. Farnfield.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. March 23.

BENNO JAFFÉ AND DARMSTAEDTER LANOLIN FABRIK v. JOHN RICHARDSON & CO. (LIMITED).

Patent — Action for infringement — Interrogatories — Refusal to answer — Validity of patent denied — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, r. 20.

In an action for infringement of a patent the plaintiffs administered interrogatories to the defendants, based on the statements in the plaintiffs' specification, asking the defendants if they used the processes therein described. The defendants denied the validity of the patent, and refused to answer certain of the interrogatories, on the ground (inter alia) that the discovery sought depended on the determination of a question in dispute—namely, the validity of the patent.

Held, that the discovery sought could not be postponed until after the validity of the patent had been established, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to specific answers to the interrogatories.

Adjourned summons.

In 1892 the Benno Jaffé and Darmstaedter Co., a company incorporated in Prussia, who were assignees of a patent, No. 4,992 of 1882, granted to F. C. Glaser for the new and improved manufacture of fatty matter from wool fat, called "lanolin," commenced an action against John Richardson & Co. for an injunction to restrain them from infringing the said patent. The defendants, who were the manufacturers of a substance called "anaspaline," denied infringement, and alleged that the invention was not new or useful, and was not proper subject-matter, and did not admit that the plaintiffs were assignees, or that Glaser was the first and true inventor or importer.

On the 27th of October, 1892, the plaintiffs, having obtained leave, administered, inter alia, the following interrogatories:—(5) Do the defendants, or did they ever, in the manufacture of "anaspaline," treat wool fat with water, and whether or not by kneading the wool fat with water, or in what manner do the defendants, or did they ever, in and for the manufacture aforesaid, treat wool fat with water? (8) Do the defendants, or did they ever, in and for the manufacture aforesaid, treat wool fat which has been obtained by—certain processes set out in the interrogatories—or from the waste liquors of wool washing works with water, and whether or not, by kneading with water, or in what manner, do the defendants, or did they ever, in or for the manufacture aforesaid, treat the last-mentioned wool fat with water?

The defendants objected to answer the above interrogatories, on the ground that the discovery sought depended on the determination of the question in dispute—namely, the validity of the plaintiffs' patent, that the matters inquired into were not sufficiently material at this stage, and constituted a trade secret of the defendants' business. This was a summons to obtain, inter alia, further answers to the above interrogatories.

Lawson, for the plaintiffs, referred to Rawes v. Chance, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 281; Renard v. Levinstein, 10 L. T. N. S. 94, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 68; Badische Anilin v. Levinstein, 31 W. R. 913, 24 Ch. D. 156; Ashworth v. Roberts, 39 W. R. 170, 45 Ch. D. 623; De la Rue v. Dickenson, 3 K. & J. 388; Foxwell v. Webster, 12 W. R. 94, 2 Dr. & Sm. 250.

Dove, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs ought to establish the validity of their patent before they can be entitled to the discovery sought. I rely on ord. 31, r. 20, which provides that the court may, if satisfied that the right to the discovery sought depends on the determination of any issue in dispute, order such issue to be determined first, and reserve the question as to discovery.

He referred to Rawes v. Chance; Renard v. Levinstein; Badische Anilin v. Levinstein; Leitch v. Abbott, 34 W. R. 506, 31 Ch. D. 374; Fennessy v. Clark, 37 Ch. D. 184, 36 W. R. Dig. 159; Parker v. Wells, 39 W. R. 392, 18 Ch. D. 477.

NORTH, J.—Before the rules of 1883 and the preceding rules under the Judicature Act on the same lines, no doubt discovery was enforced more than has been done since, and sometimes in such a way as to cause unnecessary expense and unnecessary disclosure of facts that in the result turned out to be immaterial. There were evils arising from that in two ways, both from pressure on a defendant and also from costs incurred, and a very salutary alteration has been made by giving the court a discretion now which it used not to have, both as to saying whether discovery should be given at a particular stage or postponed to a later stage, as well as that of refusing it altogether. But if that means what it is contended it does mean, that in every patent action in which invalidity is set up—that is to say, in every patent action ever launched—there is first to be a deliberate trial before the judge and jury, if necessary, of the validity of the patent, and only after that has been settled are issues to be raised and discovery obtained by interrogatories and otherwise with regard to the question of infringement, the benefit gained by getting rid of the waste of time and money in answering interrogatories will be far more than made up for by the increased waste of time and money involved in having two trials of every patent action in which the plaintiff succeeds in establishing his patent instead of one. In my opinion that is not the meaning of the rules, and it would have a very bad effect if that were so. The rule is intended to give the court the opportunity of saying that discovery should not be given before the trial of the action unless it is wanted for the purposes of the trial; for example, if a mortgagor wants to redeem an estate, and it is denied that he has a right to redeem at all, it is quite useless going into any questions of accounts until it is known whether there is such a right or not, and then if that right is established at the trial the taking the accounts afterwards is a matter of course. So in the case of a action by a principal against an agent; agency denied. If the agency does not exist, or the relation of principal and agent does not exist, there no accounts to be taken; and it is unnecessary to put the parties to the trouble and expense of going into statements of accounts, which, unless the agency is established, would never be necessary at all.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But in the case of a patent it is different. No doubt validity is one thing, and infringement another; but they both have to come on to be tried at the same time, and the parties must come before the court ready to deal with both cases at one trial. If the present contention was right, that discovery was to be postponed until the validity of the patent was tried, discovery by interrogatories would be refused altogether, because it would not practically be given there. The plaintiff's right to discovery would be taken away, and he would only have the opportunity of getting out what he could on cross-examination, without having the materials to lead up to it, and without having the evidence there that he would have had if the interrogatories had been answered at an earlier stage. Now in the present case the plaintiffs put forward particular things claimed by their patent. If the defendants' excuse for not answering were allowed, the result would be either the plaintiffs would have no discovery about these matters, and would not know what the defendants were doing, and would have to try the question of infringement in the dark, or their case would fail.

In my opinion they are clearly entitled to have specific answers to the specific interrogatories (Nos. 5 and 8) put here as to what the defendants are doing, following the interrogatories framed upon the lines of the allegations in the specification.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Johnson, Son, & Ellis.

Solicitors for the defendants, Crowders & Vizard, for Owston, Dickenson, & Simpson, Leicester.

Chan. Div. } Stirling, J. } March 11, 29.

In re BOWEN.

LLOYD PHILLIPS v. DAVIS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequest to charity for ever—Gift over to individuals if general system of education established—Rule against perpetuities.

A testator bequeathed certain moneys to trustees upon trust to invest the same, and to establish and continue for ever certain day-schools in Wales, and he declared that, if at any time thereafter the Government should establish a general system of education, the trusts should determine and the moneys should go to the residuary legatees under his will. Under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870-90, a general system of education was established.

Held, that, upon the true construction of the will, there was an immediate disposition in favour of charity a perpetuity, followed by a gift over, under which the residuary legatees took a future interest, to arise upon an event which need not necessarily occur within perpetuity limits; and that, therefore, the gift over was void.

Adjourned summons.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Rev. Daniel Bowen, by his will, dated the 3rd of September, 1846, made two charitable bequests of £1,700 and £500 to trustees upon trust to invest the same, and to establish Welsh day-schools in certain parishes in Wales, and to continue the same schools for ever thereafter, and he declared "that if at any time hereafter the Government of this kingdom shall establish a general system of education, the several trusts of the said several sums of £1,700 and £500 shall cease and determine, and I bequeath the said several sums in the same manner as I have bequeathed the residue of my personal estate." He appointed his sisters, Jane Lloyd, Annie W. Phillips, and Rachel Rees, executrixes and residuary legatees of his will.

The testator died on the 9th of October, 1847, and his will was duly proved on the 31st of December, 1847.

The Elementary Education Acts, 1870-90, have established a general system of education.

This summons was taken out by the persons interested in the residuary estate of the testator against the Attorney-General and the trustees of the respective sums of money for the determination of the question whether, in the events that had happened, the trusts of such moneys had determined, and whether the moneys had fallen into the residue.

Hastings, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiffs.—The gift over to the residuary legatees has come into effect, inasmuch as a general system of education has been established by the Elementary Education Acts. The rule against perpetuities does not apply, because here the gift over follows a gift to a charity: Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 1 Mac. & G. 460, 464.

They also referred to In re Randell, Randell v. Dixon, 36 W. R. 543, 38 Ch. D. 213, and Walsh v. Secretary of State for India, 11 W. R. 823, 10 H. L. Cas. 367.

Cruickshank, for the trustees of the respective funds.

Sir J. Rigby, S.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—The gift over is bad, for it depends upon a future event which may not happen within the limit of the rules against perpetuities: London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562. The general rule does not apply to a gift to a charity followed by a gift to another charity, but a gift over to individuals after a gift to a charity is within the rule: Gray on the Rule against Perpetuities, pp. 192, 363. In re Randell, Randell v. Dixon does not apply, for in that case the gift to the charity was a terminable gift, and not, as in this case, a gift in perpetuity.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said: According to the law as stated by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, if the gift in favour of the residuary legatees is one which is not to vest until after the expiration of, or will not necessarily vest within, the period fixed and prescribed by law for the creation of future estates and interests, then the gift is bad, unless the circumstance that the prior gift is in favour of a charity makes a difference. It has been decided that the rule against perpetuities has no application to the transfer in a certain event of property from one charity to another: Christ's Hospital v. Grainger; In re Tyler, Tyler v. Tyler, 40 W. R. 7, [1891] 3 Ch. 252. The principle of those decisions, however, does not extend, in my opinion, to cases where (1) an immediate gift in favour of private individuals is followed by an executory gift in favour of charity, or (2) an immediate gift in favour of charity is followed by an executory gift in favour of private individuals. Of the former class of cases, Lord Selborne, L.C., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Chamberlayne v. Brockett, 21 W. R. 299, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 206, 211, says: "If the gift in trust for charity is itself conditional upon a future and uncertain event, it is subject, in our judgment, to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If the condition is never fulfilled, the estate never arises; if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities the gift fails ab initio."

The second class of cases does not seem to have fallen under the consideration of any court in this country; but the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has in Brattle-square Church v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142, and Theological Education Society v. Attorney-General, 21 Lathrop, 285, held that the rule against perpetuities applies to them. For the knowledge of these decisions I am indebted to the very learned and able treatise of Professor J. C. Gray, on "The Rule against Perpetuities" (see section 593), to which I was referred in argument. On the other hand, as property may be given to a charity in perpetuity, it may be given for any shorter period, however long; and the interest undisposed of, even if it cannot be the subject of a direct executory gift, may be left to devolve as the law prescribes. Of this an example is to be found in In re Randell, Randell v. Dixon, in which the head-note is as follows:—"A testatrix bequeathed £14,000 on trust to pay the income to the incumbent of the church at H. for the time being so long as he permitted the sittings to be occupied free; in case payment for sittings was ever demanded she directed the £14,000 to fall into her residue. Held, first, that the testatrix had not expressed a general intention to devote the £14,000 to charitable purposes, so that in case of failure of the trust for the benefit of the incumbent the fund would be applied cy-près; secondly, that the direction that the fund should fall into the residue, being a direction that the fund should go as the law would otherwise carry it, did not offend the rule against perpetuities."

The question which I have to decide, therefore, appears to me to reduce itself to one of the construction of the testator's will—i.e., whether the testator has given the property to charity in perpetuity, subject to an executory gift in favour of the residuary legatee, or one for a limited period, leaving the undisposed of interest to fall into residue. In construing the will the rule to be applied is that stated by Lord Selborne in Pearks v. Moseley, 29 W. R. 1, 5 App. Cas. 714, 719:—"You are not to import the law of remoteness into the construction of the instrument by which you investigate the expressed intention of the testator. You take his words and endeavour to arrive at their meaning exactly in the same manner as if there had been no such law, and as if the whole intention expressed by the words could lawfully take effect." Now, the sums of £1,700 and £500 are bequeathed to trustees who are obviously selected with a view to the efficient administration of the charitable trusts created by the will, and were not intended by the testator to be charged with any duties as regards any other portion of his property. He directs the trustees named in the will, by means of the funds paid in to them by his executors, to establish certain schools, "and to continue the same schools for ever thereafter." He contemplates a perpetual succession of trustees in whom the execution of the trusts is to be vested. I think that on the true construction of the will there is an immediate disposition in favour of charity in perpetuity, and not for any shorter period. That is followed by a gift over if at any time the Government should establish a general system of education; and under that gift over the residuary legatees take not an immediate but a future interest. As the event on which that future interest is to arise is one which need not necessarily occur within perpetuity limits, it follows that the gift over is bad; and, consequently, the summons must be dismissed.

Summons dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Sharon Grote Turner.

Solicitors for the Attorney-General, Hare & Co.

Solicitors for the trustees, Helder, Roberts, Son, & Walton, for W. Morgan Griffiths, Carmarthen.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } March 8, 9, 14; April 12.

In re SOMERSET.

SOMERSET v. EARL POULETT AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Investment on mortgage—Valuation — Statute of Limitations — Measure of liability—Consent of beneficiary—Impounding interest —Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), ss. 4-6, 8.

The trustees of a marriage settlement, in contemplating an investment of the trust funds on mortgage, through their solicitor instructed an experienced valuer to report on the property and advise them what sum could be safely advanced upon it. With the instructions was sent a letter containing the following words: "It is desired by both mortgagor and mortgagees that as much money shall be advanced as you can advise will be properly secured."

The solicitor who so instructed the valuer on behalf of the trustees was also the solicitor of the proposed mortgagor. The valuer, in his report, valued the property at £42,750, and estimated the net rental at £1,070. He at the same time wrote a letter to the solicitor advising that £30,000 might be safely advanced. The proposed mortgagor being dissatisfied with this sum, the solicitor had an interview with the valuer, and subsequently the latter advised that £35,000 might safely be advanced upon the property, giving as the ground of this opinion the fact that he thought increased rents might be obtained. The trustees thereupon, in 1878, advanced the whole of the trust fund, consisting of a sum of £34,612, upon security of the property. The investment was made with the written consent of the tenant for life, and at his instigation and request. Interest on the mortgage was duly paid down to 1890, when it was found that the security was insufficient.

In an action brought against the surviving trustees by the tenant for life and his infant children entitled in remainder,

Held, as between the infant plaintiffs and the defendants, that the investment of the £34,612 was a breach of trust, and that the defendants were jointly and severally liable to make good the same.

Held, that £26,000 was the largest sum which might properly have been advanced, within the meaning of section 5 of the Trustee Act, 1888; but

Held, as between the tenant for life and the defendants, that his right of action was barred by section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, and that his life interest in the whole trust estate must be impounded by way of indemnity to the defendants.

Trial of action.

The plaintiffs in this action were Vere Francis John

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Somerset and his infant children; and the defendants were Earl Poulett, Lord Dorchester, and Sir T. Meyrick, the surviving trustees of his marriage settlement.

By the settlement, dated in 1875, it was declared that the defendants and Granville R. H. Somerset (since deceased) should stand possessed of certain stocks and securities upon trust, after the marriage, with the consent in writing of the husband and wife during their joint lives, to sell and invest the same on real and other securities, and to pay the income to the husband for life, then to the wife for life, and, after the death of the survivor, to hold the trust estate on trusts for the children of the marriage. There were five children of the marriage, who with their father, Vere Somerset, were the plaintiffs in the action.

In 1878 Vere Somerset was desirous that the trust funds should be invested upon mortgage of the Hawkstone estate in Shropshire belonging to Lord Hill. With a view to this investment, Mr. Berger, a member of the firm of Wild, Berger, & Co., the solicitor of Lord Hill was employed to instruct a firm of valuers to value the estate on behalf of the trustees. A mortgage already existed on the estate, and it was proposed to transfer this to the trustees and to advance such further sum as might be advised. The instructions were sent to Farebrother, Ellis, & Co., who were thereby requested "to inspect the farms and report, and also to advise the trustees what additional sum can be safely advanced to Viscount Hill on the security of the property."

With the instructions was sent a letter containing the following words:—"It is desired by both mortgagor and mortgagees that as much money shall be advanced as you can advise will be properly secured."

The property was accordingly valued by Sir J. Ellis, a member of the firm of Farebrother, Ellis, & Co., who valued it at £42,750, and estimated the net rental at £1,070. He, at the same time, advised that £30,000 might be advanced on the property.

Lord Hill was dissatisfied with this figure, and Mr. Berger interviewed Sir J. Ellis upon the subject. Two days after the interview Sir J. Ellis wrote a letter advising the trustees that £35,000 might be safely advanced, the ground of his opinion being that he thought the rents might be increased if Lord Hill were willing to take that course.

The trust funds were thereupon sold and the proceeds, amounting to a sum of £34,612, were advanced to Lord Hill upon the security of the Hawkstone estate. The investment was made with the written consent of Mr. and Mrs. Vere Somerset, and at the request of Vere Somerset, although there was no direct evidence that he knew the advance to be improper.

Granville R. H. Somerset, who was a member of the bar and experienced in dealing with landed estates, and upon whose judgment his co-trustees stated that they relied, died in 1881. Mrs. Vere Somerset died in 1889. Mr. Jenkins, referred to in the judgment, was solicitor to Colonel Hill, Vere Somerset's father-in-law.

Warmington, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the plaintiffs.—No proper valuation of the property was made. The valuer was not employed independently of the owner of the property: Learoyd v. Whiteley, 36 W. R. 721, 12 App. Cas. 727; In re Salmon, Priest v. Uppleby, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351; Rae v. Meek, 14 App. Cas. 558, 38 W. R. Dig. 179. The case does not come within section 6 of the Trustee Act, 1888. Vere Somerset did not consent to a breach of trust, but merely to an investment in Lord Hill's real estate.

Marten, Q.C., and T. H. Carson, for the defendants.—The valuer was instructed independently of the owner within the meaning of section 4 of the Trustee Act, 1888. The interests of the mortgagor and mortgagees were not so necessarily inconsistent that one person could not represent them both. The trustees reasonably belived that an able practical surveyor or valuer was instructed and employed independently of the owner of the property, and we submit that that is the true construction of the section. The plaintiff Vere Somerset is barred by section 8 of the Act: In re Bowden, Andrew v. Cooper, 39 W. R. 219, 45 Ch. D. 444; Want v. Campain, 9 Times L. R. 254. The life interest of the same plaintiff must be impounded under section 6 to indemnify the trustees if they are liable: Griffith v. Hughes, 40 W. R. 524, [1892] 3 Ch. 105. In any case we are liable only for the excess of the amount advanced over the amount which might properly have been advanced.

They referred also to In re Godfrey, Godfrey v. Faulkner, 32 W. R. 23, 23 Ch. D. 483; In re Pearson, Oxley v. Scarth, 51 L. T. N. S. 692, 33 W. R. Dig. 224; Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259; Smith v. Fox, 6 Hare, 386; Ricketts v. Ricketts, 64 L. T. N. S. 263, 39 W. R. Dig. 243; and Bradley v. Riches, 26 W. R. 910, 9 Ch. D. 189.

Warmington, Q.C., in reply.—The net rental was insufficient to pay the interest on the mortgage, and it was a mere speculation that increased rents might be obtained.

He referred to Fry v. Tapson, 33 W. R. 113, 28 Ch. D. 268; In re Page, Jones v. Morgan, 41 W. R. 357, [1893] 1 Ch. 304; In re Walker, Walker v. Walker, 62 L. T. N. S. 449, 38 W. R. Dig. 203; Hughes v. Twisden, 34 W. R. 498; and In re Swain, Swain v. Bringeman, [1891] 3 Ch. 233, 40 W. R. Dig. 269.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 12.—KEKEWICH, J.—At the conclusion of the arguments I observed that this was one of the most difficult, and probably the most important, of pure chancery cases that had come before me as judge. Reflection has confirmed that impression. The general law, perhaps, is not now so difficult as formerly, because it has been fully expounded in several authorities, to some of which I must presently refer, and particularly by one emanating from the highest court in the realm, but, notwithstanding the Trustee Act, 1888, it is of vast importance, and the ever-changing scenes of life constantly present it under new aspects and raise new points of interest. This case itself is an illustration of such varieties. Further difficulties are introduced by the statute, and I can conceive no subject of deeper interest to trustees, or to those who have to advise them or conduct their cases, than the proper construction and application of its provisions. I have therefore reflected on the arguments in this case, and studied the facts, documents, and authorities with the utmost devotion of which I am capable, and with earnest anxiety to arrive, if possible, at a right conclusion on all and every the main points requiring consideration. In my judgment, which will run to some, perhaps, too great length, I shall have occasion to mention some of these facts, documents, and authorities. I could not mention all without even greater prolixity, and it is possible that some may be omitted which ought to be noticed, but they have been studied and weighed, and if some have failed to influence me as they ought, it is not because the opportunity has not been afforded.

Before determining, and in order to determine, the main points arising under the Trustee Act, 1888, it is necessary to consider to what extent, and on what grounds, the defendants can be held liable independently of that statute—that is, under the law previously existing. And for this purpose it will be convenient to state shortly what I conceive to be that law, so far as it is applicable to the case in hand. It may be taken to be settled (see Speight v. Gaunt, 32 W. R. 435, 9 App. Cas. 1; and Learoyd v. Whiteley) that trustees must exercise in the discharge of their duties ordinary care and prudence, by which is meant such care and prudence as a reasonable man would exercise in the management of his own private affairs, and that so long as they do this, and act within the limits of their legal powers, they cannot be made liable for loss, even though incurred by what turns out to be a failure in discretion. Further, generally speaking, but subject, possibly, to some limitation, it may be taken to be settled that the liability of trustees as regards any particular transaction is not increased by reason of the fact that one of their number is skilled in the business with which that transaction is concerned.

As regards investments on mortgage, it is the duty of trustees to conclude for themselves, and by the exercise of their own judgment, whether any given security is sufficient for the amount which they propose to advance against it, and this holds good notwithstanding that the surveyor, solicitor, or other trusted agent expressed an opinion on the subject. There is no absolute rule respecting the choice of security falling within the strict limits of authorized investments, or the amount proper to be advanced against any particular security, but Learoyd v. Whiteley is a warning to trustees that land devoted to trade may not be regarded as a proper security at all, and the same case combined with others (see, for instance, Fry v. Tapson) shows that there are undefined, but fairly well understood, limits beyond which advances ought not to be made. Lord Watson says (12 App. Cas., at p. 734) that these limits must be understood as indicating the lowest margins which, under ordinary circumstances, a careful investor of trust funds ought to accept; and if, on the one hand, that implies that under special circumstances those margins need not be observed, it equally implies that it may not be safe to be content with them. In order to fix the limit of advance in any particular case it is necessary for trustees to be advised respecting the value of the property, and, unless they themselves are personally acquainted with it, they must also be advised respecting the character of the property and the probability of its continuing to be a proper trust security. The object of trustees must ever be to make a permanent investment—that is, one which will be maintained for a considerable period, and which will not only during that period yield the stipulated income, but will ultimately and whenever required realize the full sum advanced.

In Learoyd v. Whiteley (12 App. Cas., at p. 732), the Lord Chancellor dwells on the importance of securing the capital sum, but did not, I am convinced, intend to place in the background the importance of also securing the income, which may be, and often is, as essential to the welfare of the remainderman as it is to that of the tenant for life. Trustees, therefore, must regard any advice given to them respecting value from this double point of view, and cannot be absolved from liability for loss arising on a particular transaction by showing that their advance was within the allowed limits as regards capital if they were exceeded as regards income, and the income was insufficient to pay the stipulated interest.

I express myself thus because the limits stated with reference to capital have not been specifically applied to income, and I am not sure that, as regards income, some larger latitude might not safely be permitted. On the question how far, if at all, trustees may properly rely on the position of the borrower, there is, so far as I am aware, no authority. Men of ordinary care and prudence managing their own affairs, would no doubt take this into consideration, and in the mercantile world it is frequently treated as equally important with the value of the security. It is impossible, I think, to exclude it from the consideration of trustees, who are bound to have regard to all the circumstances connected with any proposed advance on security, and it would not be difficult to put cases in which the solvency or insolvency of the borrower would probably influence them in making an advance somewhat in excess of the limits generally allowed, or declining the transaction altogether; but where the object is to make a permanent investment of trust money on mortgage of real estate, it seems to me wrong to advance a sum largely in excess of what is otherwise right because it is believed that the borrower is now, and it is anticipated that he will remain, capable of paying the principal and interest, or such part thereof as cannot be realized from the security. The mortgages of May, August, and September, 1878, impeached in this action, and which for practical purposes may be treated as one transaction, must be examined on these principles.

When, how, and by whom this disastrous mortgage was first suggested does not clearly appear, and is perhaps immaterial. Suffice it to say that in the autumn of 1876 the plaintiff, Mr. Vere Somerset, who was tenant for life of the funds comprised in his marriage settlement, wished to have those investments realized and the proceeds advanced on the security of Lord Hill's Hawkstone estate. It is clear that from the first he desired thus to invest the whole of the trust funds, calculated to be £35,000 sterling, and that in this he was at one with his father-in-law, Colonel Hill, and the intended mortgagor, Lord Hill.

There are expressions in some of the early letters, such as Mr. Jenkins's letter of the 23rd of November, 1876, pointing in this direction, and to the same effect are Colonel Hill's two letters of some days in 1878, and Mr. Haste's two letters of the 4th of February, 1878. This is important, because it explains a passage in Messrs. Wild & Co.'s instructions to Sir John Ellis, which must be mentioned presently. There is no direct evidence of any communication of this to the trustees. It might or might not be right to infer that it was made, but, at any rate, Messrs. Wild & Co., who acted both for mortgagor and mortgagees, knew what was intended, and I must impute to the trustees the information which they possessed. It is not unusual, it is indeed very usual, for the same solicitor to act on behalf of mortgagor and mortgagee, and, where the investment is of trust money, to act also for the tenant for life, who has an immediate interest in the investment, and whose consent is generally, as here, required. It is only fair to solicitors to say that this difficult and delicate duty of acting impartially to clients with conflicting interests is generally discharged with perfect fairness and seldom gives rise to any complaint, but the position is, nevertheless, an embarrassing one, and when complaint is made, necessarily renders scrutiny of conduct more suspicious. I am particularly anxious to be careful in what I say respecting Mr. Berger, who managed the business in the present case, not so much because he is a member of a well-known firm of solicitors as because he has not had an opportunity in this action of explaining his conduct. I have already said, and I desire to repeat, that I have not a word to say against the discretion of the defendants' counsel in not calling Mr. Berger as their witness. This was a matter entirely for the determination of counsel, and I wish to uphold counsel in the exercise of their discretion. I am quite satisfied that Mr. Marten exercised his in the best interest of his client, and experience tells me that some risk of observation must be incurred in the discreet selection or rejection of witnesses. But Mr. Berger was not called, and I cannot altogether avoid making remarks which may be disagreeable to him, and to which he possibly has a complete answer. Mr. Berger knew that it was a condition of the proposed mortgage on Lord Hill's part that his firm should act both for mortgagor and mortgagees. He knew, further, that Mr. Haste, Lord Hill's agent, was in communication with Mr. Vere Somerset, who over much assumed the position of mortgagee, though his trustees really filled that character, and that Mr. Haste apparently acted, as according to Mr. Vere Somerset's admission he in truth acted, as agent quite as much for that gentleman as for Lord Hill. He also knew that the intended mortgage was to be for as much as £35,000, and that this would be as advantageous to Lord Hill as to Mr. Vere Somerset. For all this, I need only refer to the correspondence, which contains abundant proof without quoting particular passages. He seemed to have assumed that the trustees concurred with Mr. Vere Somerset in wishing that the whole trust moneys should be advanced to Lord Hill on the security of the Hawkstone estate. At least I find in the correspondence no inquiry by him from them and no statement by them to him contradicting this view. Mr. Vere Somerset knew the Hawkstone estate. That he was acquainted with the details of the property or the rentals of the several farms is not shown by the evidence, and I do not think was the fact, but he had some knowledge of it, whereas his trustees appear to have had none. This also, I think, must have been known to Mr. Berger. It is only fair to the trustees to say that though in the event they were guided, perhaps foolishly, yet not unnaturally, by Mr. Berger, and although the other three also not unnaturally relied on their colleague, Mr. Granville Somerset, who, besides being a member of the bar, is said to have had large experience in landed estates, yet they were by no means eager to embark on this transaction or to advance the trust money without proper precaution, or on other than good security. I cannot but think that if Mr. Berger had stood firm, or if he had pointed out to them the objections to the course pursued and the risks which they were incurring, they would have drawn back and would have avoided this litigation. The transaction was, nevertheless, theirs, and they cannot be heard to say that the instructions given to Sir John Ellis were not given on their behalf, or that his advice was not given to them and did not form the basis of thier action. On those instructions and on that advice it is now my duty to comment.

On the instructions strictly so called I have only two remarks (neither of them of great importance) to make. The statement that the property was then in mortgage to clients of Messrs. Wild & Co. for £12,700 not explained by the documents or evidence, but it can hardly be material from any point of view, and I pass it by. The request that Sir John Ellis would advise the trustees what additional sum they might properly advance to Lord Hill on the security offered is so common and has received such sanction from the Legislature (Trustee Act, 1888, s. 4) that, though in my opinion improper, I will not comment on it. But with the instructions was sent a letter which cannot be thus lightly dealt with. In this letter is the statement: "It is desired by both mortgagor and mortgagees that as much money shall be advanced as you can advise will be properly secured." Wish to give all due weight to the word "properly," and I will take it to have been intended to have been of the essence of the passage in which it occurs. Nevertheless I deem that passage to have been wholly wrong. In the first place there is not a tittle of evidence to show that the mortgagees did desire to advance as much as could properly be secured. Lord Hill did and Mr. Vere Somerset did. But the trustees were the mortgagees, and their desire, if it existed, has not been expressed. Apart from that the passage starts the valuation on a wrong basis, and suggests to the valuer that he shall at least not err on the side of caution. Sir John Ellis's report is contained in two documents: one a valuation and the other a letter of July 8, 1878. Of the valuation, having seen Sir John Ellis in the witness box and heard his explanation, I need only say that it is a strange instance of the sanguine view of the value of land frequently adopted some years ago and bitterly negatived by present facts.

The letter deals with the amount to be advanced. Sir John Ellis practically admitted that three-fourths of any value was a large proportion to advance on real security, and of course it was in excess of what trustees could properly advance under, say, ordinary circumstances, but in the letter he guarded himself by referring to the position of the borrower as possibly influencing the prudence of a large advance. The question is not whether he ought to have said this, but whether the trustees ought to have given any weight to it. If the principles above laid down are as sound as I believe them to be there is no room for doubt on this point. I conclude from the evidence of the trustees that they all had an opportunity of seeing, and that some of them certainly did see, the valuations. I am not sure that they saw the letter, but they were told (see Messrs. Wild & Co.'s letter of the 10th of July, 1878) that according to the report £30,000 might be advanced, and this is really a trifle less than three-fourths of the value put on the property. If the matter had stopped there—that is, if they had advanced £30,000 and no more—they might possibly have saved themselves. It was more, as will be presently seen, than they, in my opinion, ought to have advanced, but it might not have been held such an imprudence as imposed liability. Unfortunately it did not stop there. It appears that Lord Hill was not satisfied. He had always intended to raise £35,000, and knowing that it was Mr. Vere Somerset's intention he was naturally disappointed to find that £30,000 only would be forthcoming. This must have been communicated to Mr. Berger, who thereupon saw Sir John Ellis. I know from that gentleman, but unfortunately without Mr. Berger's correction, what passed at the interview. Sir John Ellis considered himself as no longer occupying the position of valuer, but as called in to advise the parties in a friendly manner what might be done, and if the desire mentioned in the letter of the 18th of June, 1878, was not then repeated, as I should infer it was, the letter itself must have been present to his mind. Acting as the friend of the parties, amicus curiæ he styled it, he advised that £35,000 might be advanced. This advice is contained in a letter of 17th July, 1878, and is there based, not so much on the present value, which, be it observed, is not stated to be greater than that fixed by the report, as on the increased rents which, if Lord Hill would but sanction it, might, in his opinion, be obtained. The trustees were informed of this. Whether they all were told how the rise from £30,000 to £35,000 was justified I do not know, but in the letter of the 17th of July, 1878, addressed to Mr. Granville Somerset, it was explained in the best possible manner—namely, by enclosing a copy of that received from Sir John Ellis. On this the trustees advanced, not £35,000, because that full amount was not forthcoming, but £34,612, which I understand to have been all that the trust fund could produce. The impropriety of it is, in my judgment, beyond question. The amount was far in excess of what, according to any rule applied with any latitude or laxity, ought to have been advanced, and it was arrived at by a process unsound in itself, and especially objectionable when applied to the investment of trust funds. The liability of the defendants according to law, standing independently of the Trustee Act, 1888, being thus established, it remains to consider the several questions arising under that Act. They must be treated separately, and it will be convenient first to take those sections which are said to negative the liability wholly or partially, and afterwards those which are invoked to show that the liability cannot be enforced by, or is compensated by, counter-claim against one of the plaintiffs, Mr. Vere Somerset.

I will not read any section at length, the language being before me as well as before all interested in the case, but particular words and expressions must be noticed and receive some comment.

A question of grammar arises on section 4, which is the first to be considered. Mr. Marten, who argued this case with even more than his usual industry and ability, almost persuaded me that the words "believed to be" governed "instructed and employed independently of any owner of property," so that on the assumption that the trustees were ignorant, and not culpably ignorant, of any instructions to, or employment of, Sir John Ellis, on behalf of Lord Hill, they would be entitled to rely on that gentleman's report as to the value of the property, because made by an able practical surveyor or valuer, whom they believed to have been instructed and employed independently of any owner of the property. The point has become immaterial, and I need not pursue it further than to say that I remain of the opinion expressed in Walker v. Walker, that this is not the grammatical or right construction of the section. Such a construction, however, would not avail the defendants, because there was only one report as to the value of the property, and the sum advanced exceeded two equal third parts of that value. This excess is fatal to the defendants' plea of the 4th section. As regards the 5th section the puzzle is not how to construe it, but how properly to apply its provisions to the facts of this case. It seems to suppose that whenever a mortgage security is found to have been a proper investment in all respects there is a possibility of determining what less sum than was actually advanced thereon might have been safely advanced. I entertain a strong opinion that if the trustees had acted prudently with reference to Sir John Ellis' report (I set aside for this purpose his advice respecting the amount which might be advanced) they would have said that it did not afford materials sufficient to enable them to arrive at a conclusion. They would have observed that the high value placed on the property could not well have been calculated, and Sir John Ellis admitted that it ought not to have been, and really was not, calculated with reference to the then rental, and, further, that the rental certainly did not, and that the value possibly did not, make any allowance for deductions in respect of tithe and land tax, notwithstanding that they were mentioned in the body of the report as falling on the landlord. If, however, they had set themselves to consider, as trustees, that is, as men of ordinary prudence, to determine what sum might safely be advanced on mortgage, they would, as I have already endeavoured to explain, have considered the receivable income as much as the capital value, and they would have made an advance calculated on the basis that they might depend on the receipt of interest at, say, four per cent. from the actual rental. Seeing that the capital value was large, they might have been justified in not insisting on more than a small margin of rent; but this would have been the extreme limit of prudence. Some margin there must be to provide against contingencies, including possession and collection. The actual rental was £1,180, from which had to be deducted for tithe and land tax £110 odd, leaving, say, a net rental of £1,070.

If, recognizing the investment as a proper one in all respects, I am compelled by the language of the section to say what less sum than that actually advanced might have been advanced thereon, I fix the utmost limit at £26,000. In this I am giving a large interpretation to a remedial statute, and treating the trustees with a generosity barely warranted by the materials which the trustees have placed at my disposal. According to the actual and prospective realization of the security stated to me in the course of the argument, this figure will not be of great practical advantage to them, but they shall have it for what it is worth. Passing by for the moment section 6, I proceed to consider the question suggested by section 8, sub-section (b). The investment was made in 1878, the writ in this action was issued in 1892, so that if this provision means that the right of action against trustees under such circumstances as here exist shall be barred as against a beneficiary whose interest is in possession at the expiration of six years from the date of investment, Mr. Vere Somerset's right to sue is gone, though the trustees remain liable to his infant children. The plaintiff's argument was that the principle of Howell v. Young has no application to such a case as this, and that according to the words of the statute itself the action must be treated as one for money had and received, and that so treating it the plea cannot be maintained. The meaning of the provision, that is of the particular language in which the provision is expressed, is not, to my mind, by any means clear, but I do not think that it means what was contended by the plaintiff. It would have been easy, and possibly better, to provide, if that had been the intention, that an action against trustees to recover money or other property to which no existing statute of limitations applied should be brought within six years from the time when the right of recovery accrued, but notwithstanding that it has not been so plainly provided, that must, I think, be the meaning of the section. I suppose that the words "money had and received" were used because in that particular form of action for debt there was more analogy to pleadings and procedure in Chancery than in any other like action, and in truth an action of that character might have been brought, and sometimes was brought, against trustees in what we now call the Queen's Bench Division before the Judicature Acts. The controlling words for the purposes of construction are, I think, an action of debt, and in such an action a plea that the right accrued six years before writ issued is good and can only be defeated by acknowledgment or some other act taking the case out of the statute.

This apparently was the view of other judges before whom the section has come, although the precise point either did not arise or was not argued before them. I am referring to In re Bowden, Andrew v. Cooper, before Fry, L.J.; In re Swain, Swain v. Bringeman, In re Page, Jones v. Morgan, before North, J.; and Want v. Campain, before Wright, J. The attempted answer is that there has been what has been equivalent to acknowledgment, namely, that from the date of investment until some time in 1890 the mortgage was treated as good, and interest at the stipulated rate was paid, and the plaintiff calls in aid of the argument a passage in the judgment of Fry, L.J., in the case above noticed. His language is this: "If this had been an action for debt for money had and received, and the debt had arisen more than six years ago, and no acknowledgment had taken place in the meanwhile, the lapse of time would have furnished a defence." I desire humbly to express my entire concurrence with the view of Fry, L.J., that an acknowledgment suffices to defeat a plea of the statute as much in an action against a trustee as in any other action for money had and received, but I fail to see how what has occurred here can be regarded as an acknowledgment for this purpose. There has been no concealment, no disclosure of new facts, no payment of interest except on the basis of a mortgage the character of which was as well known to Mr. Somerset as to the trustees themselves. According to the short report in the Times, Wright, J., deals with this precise point in Want v. Campain. He is there reported to have held that a tenant for life was barred by the provision of section 8 now under consideration, notwithstanding the receipt of interest by her until shortly before the issue of the writ, and I follow his decision, not merely because he has decided the point (for with so recent a case not fully reported before me I might not be justified in doing that), but because it entirely commends itself to my judgment. As against Mr. Vere Somerset I must hold that the statute affords a complete answer on the part of the defendants.

On the application of the 6th section there is little, I may venture to say no, authority. The point, although new and important, and by no means free from difficulty, can be simply stated. Mr. Vere Somerset consented in writing to the mortgage made, and it was made at his instigation and request. If that were all required he would certainly be liable to have his life interest impounded to indemnify the trustees against the loss which they are bound to make good to his children. But the statute contemplates a breach of trust committed by the trustee, and it is of the essence of the section that such breach of trust, nothing more or less, was committed at the instigation or request or with the consent in writing of the beneficiary sought to be charged. It is urged that Mr. Vere Somerset never intended to be a party, and was not in fact a party, to a breach of trust. No doubt he intended that the funds subject to the trusts of his marriage settlement should be advanced on the security of this property, and that he wished the whole of it to be advanced on that security, but he intended his trustees only to advance safely and prudently, and that he trusted them, their solicitors, and the valuer employed to see that all proper precautions were taken to this end.

It may be conceeded that Mr. Vere Somerset did not wish any advance to be made in excess of what would be properly secured. His object was to have the trust funds permanently invested on a good security yielding 4 per cent. interest. And if he had appreciated the risk which was being run in making so large an advance on such a security he would have hesitated to give, and I conclude he would not have given, his consent. But he was a party to all that occurred. He conducted the negociations to some extent himself, and more largely through Mr. Haste, who was his agent as much as that of Lord Hill, and if he did not actually know as much as was communicated to Mr. Granville Somerset respecting the interview between Mr. Berger and Sir John Ellis, and the friendly advice of the latter which followed that interview, he at least knew that £35,000, or in the event £34,612, was intended to be advanced on the security of property which was yielding only £1,070 net income, and that the high value, I will call it no more, of £42,750 left but a trifling margin. If this provision of the statute, which is based on the highest principles of equity long administered by the Court of Chancery, is to be allowed to have any operation at all, it must, I think, be applied to such a case as the present.

My judgment will be to the following effect:—There will be a declaration, as between the infant plaintiffs and the defendants, that the investment by the defendants and Mr. Granville Somerset of the £34,612 was a breach of trust, and that the defendants are jointly and severally liable to make good to the trust estate the difference between the sum actually advanced on the security of the property and £28,000, which is the largest sum which might properly have been advanced by the trustees on the security thereof. The same plaintiffs will be declared entitled to a lien on the proceeds of sale of the property already sold and on the property remaining unsold for the payment of this amount. There will be directions for the sale of what property remains unsold, and an inquiry to bring out the ultimate loss for which the defendants are liable. As between Mr. Vere Somerset and the defendants there will be a declaration that his right to sue is barred by the statute, and, further, that the defendants are entitled to have his life interest in the whole trust estate, whatever it be, impounded by way of indemnity to them against the liability before declared, and proper directions must be given to this end. The defendants must pay the infant plaintiffs' costs of action, and the order should provide for the payment of these costs directly to the plaintiffs' solicitors. This seems necessary because Mr. Vere Somerset is the next friend of the infants as well as personally plaintiff, and there can be no set off of costs due to and from him. He must pay the defendants' costs of the action so far as they have been increased by his joining as plaintiff and seeking relief against the defendants. These costs must be separately ascertained. There will probably be some other consequential directions, and I gather that it may be as well to appoint new trustees. Mr. Clare will be good enough to prepare minutes according to the above judgment, with such amplifications and additions as circumstances require.

Solicitors, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for E. Bygott, Wem, Salop; Hulberts & Hussey.

Chan. Div.
Romer, J. } Feb. 2-4.

THORNLEY v. THORNLEY. (a.)

Husband and wife—Joint tenancy—Tenancy by entireties—Divorce—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1, 5.

A husband and wife purchased real property, some of which was conveyed to them jointly before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and some after it. The husband and wife were subsequently divorced.

Held, that the decree absolute in the divorce proceedings rendered them joint tenants as regards property conveyed to them before the said Act, even though before it they were tenants by entireties; that, as regards property conveyed to them as joint tenants since the Act, the wife's share belonged to her for her separate use; and that she was entitled to an account of the rents and profits.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by Caroline Ruth

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thornley against Joseph Thornley, her late husband, who had obtained a divorce from her. The action related to various plots of land purchased in the joint names of the husband and wife, with moneys the proceeds of a business of pedlars and furniture dealers carried on by them.

The parties were married in the year 1860, and in 1889 they separated. The husband subsequently presented a petition for dissolution of the marriage, which was granted, and on the 25th of October, 1892, the decree absolute was made.

By an indenture dated the 15th of January, 1876, and made between H. C. Best of the one part, and Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, of the other part, H. C. Best, for the consideration therein mentioned and expressed to be paid to her by J. Thornley, conveyed to J. Thornley and his heirs a piece of land at Southsea, to hold the same unto J. Thornley and his heirs "to such uses, for such estates, and in such manner as the said Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, shall by any deed or deeds jointly appoint; and in default of such appointment and so far as any such appointment shall not extend to the use of the said Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, during their joint lives without impeachment of waste, and from and immediately after the decease of such one of them as shall first die to such uses, for such estates, and in such manner as the survivor should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such last-mentioned appointment, and so far as any such appointment should not extend to the use of the survivor of the said Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, his or her heirs or assigns, for ever."

By an indenture dated the 13th of January, 1883, and made between Thomas Maidment of the one part and Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, of the other part, in consideration of £515 expressed to be paid by Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, Thomas Maidment conveyed to Joseph Thornley and his heirs a piece of land and two messuages at Southsea, to hold the same to Joseph Thornley and his heirs to uses which were similar to those contained in the deed of 1876.

By an indenture dated the 27th of February, 1884, in consideration of £2,090 paid by Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, Mark Morgan and George Dimmer conveyed to Joseph Thornley and his heirs certain lands and messuages in Portsea, to hold the same unto Joseph Thornley and his heirs to such uses, upon such trusts, and for such purposes, and generally in such manner as Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, should by deed jointly appoint, and in default thereof and subject thereto to the use of Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, during their joint lives, and after the determination of that estate to the use of the survivor in fee simple.

By an indenture dated the 9th of May, 1888, in consideration of £625 paid by Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, certain lands and hereditaments in Southsea were conveyed by J. H. Page to Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, in fee simple to such uses as they should by deed jointly appoint, and in default thereof to the use of Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, and the survivor of them in fee simple.

By an indenture dated the 9th of August, 1888, and made between A. L. Owen and W. H. Underhill (thereinafter called the vendors) of the first part, Caroline Ruth Thornley, the wife of Joseph Thornley, of the second part, Joseph Thornley of the third part, and F. Bevis of the fourth part, in consideration of £400 expressed to be paid by C. R. Thornley out of money belonging to her for her separate use, the vendors conveyed a piece of land at Southsea to C. R. Thornley in fee simple as and for part of her separate estate. And by an indenture indorsed on the last-mentioned deed, and dated the 18th of August, 1888, C. R. Thornley, as beneficial owner, conveyed the same land to J. Thornley in fee simple to the use of the said Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife, in fee simple as joint tenants.

By an indenture, dated the 29th of September, 1888, E. A. Sanders, W. Barnes, and E. J. Sanders, in consideration of £700 expressed to be paid to them by Joseph Thornley and Caroline Ruth, his wife (therein called the purchasers), out of moneys belonging to them on a joint account, conveyed a piece of land and certain messuages at Southsea, to hold the same unto and to the use of the purchasers in fee simple after the separation.

After the separation the husband received the rents and profits of these various properties.

The claim asked a declaration that C. R. Thornley was beneficially entitled for her separate use to the freehold properties purchased as aforesaid, and absolutely entitled to the businesses and certain furniture and for accounts of rents and profits from the date of the separation in 1889.

Alexander, Q.C., and P. B. Abraham, for the plaintiff.—Land conveyed to the use of the husband and wife before the Married Women's Property Act of 1882 became vested in them as tenants by entireties, that is to say, whilst the husband may do what he pleases with the rents and profits during the coverture, he cannot dispose of any part of the inheritance without his wife's concurrence: Williams on Real Property, 12th ed., p. 226. The divorce made them in law separate persons and entitled to the property as joint tenants. The property conveyed after the Act was held by them as joint tenants, the wife's interest belonging to her for her separate use: In re Jupp, 36 W. R. 712, 39 Ch. D. 148. The plaintiff is entitled to an account of the rents and profits of the property from the dates respectively from which she was excluded from the receipt.

Neville, Q.C., and W. B. Heath, for the defendant.—The meaning of the deeds is that the wife shall take after the husband's death. There is a resulting trust in favour of the husband.

Alexander, Q.C., replied.

ROMER, J. [after deciding that the business belonged to the husband].—With regard to such portion of the plaintiff's case as depends upon the deeds which have been executed, I will first deal with the deeds which were executed before the coming into operation of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and which purport to give estates to the husband and wife in terms which would have made them joint tenants if they had not been married. Now in the eye of the law they were during coverture one person, and they held by entireties, the husband being entitled to receive the rents during coverture, though neither could deal with the estate apart from the other so as to affect the rights of the survivor. What happened then, on the divorce taking place? They ceased to be husband and wife, they ceased to be one person, and in my judgment they held the estate as ordinary joint tenants, and the husband's right to receive the rents, which existed during coverture, came to an end. From the time of the divorce the wife, being feme sole, became entitled under 4 & 5 Anne, c. 3, s. 27, to an account as a joint tenant against her late husband. It has been agreed before me without argument, and without it being necessary to decide the point, that the account asked for runs as from the date of the decree absolute, and not from the decree sini. I have now to deal with the estates conveyed after the Act of 1882 to the husband and wife in terms which would have given them, if not married, a joint estate. The presumption is that where a husband's property is conveyed by his directions in such a form as to give the wife an interest, the wife's interest is intended by the husband as an advancement by him, and the presumption is that there is not a resulting trust as between the wife and the husband. In the case before me that presumption is not only not rebutted, but is strengthened, and such interest as the wife obtained from the conveyances I am now dealing with became her own, and she certainly did not hold those interests in trust for her husband. What is the effect of the Act of 1882 upon the interests so given to the wife? In my judgment the wife's interest, such as it was, clearly became her's for her separate estate, and to hold, not in entireties, but as joint tenant with her husband, her interest as joint tenant being for her separate use. She can accordingly maintain an action for an account against her husband so far as she has not assented to his receiving her share of the income—that is to say, in the case before me, from the date of the separation in 1889. There is no dispute, I think, between the parties as to that date being the proper date to be considered for the purpose. Of course, so far as the husband has since that date made payment to the wife on account of her separate estate he will get credit for that in the account, and where the wife's interests with the husband's are jointly covered by a mortgage the husband will take credit for the interest he has paid on the mortgage debt and for all outgoings generally which were a charge upon the interest. That settles the principle on which the plaintiff is entitled to recover as against the husband in the action.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Emanuel & Simmonds.

Solicitor for the defendant, Edwin Wood.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) — Jan. 17; May 19.

NEWBOLD FRIENDLY SOCIETY (Appellants) v. BARLOW (Respondent). (a.)

Friendly society—Sum paid for funeral expenses of child under ten years of age—Production of certificate of death—Industrial assurance company—Persons "who issue, or are liable upon, policies of assurance upon human life"—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), ss. 4, 28—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 2.

By section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, it is made an offence for any "society" to pay any sum on the death of a child under ten years of age, except upon the production by the parent of the child of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths; and (sub-section 7) "society" is defined to include "industrial assurance companies assuring the payment of money on the death of children under the age of ten years."

By section 4, "industrial assurance company" is defined to mean (if not inconsistent with the context) "any company as defined by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than twenty pounds, and which receives contributions . . . by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months."

By section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, "company" is defined to mean "any person or persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue, or are liable under, policies of assurance upon human life."

A society, whose registration under the Friendly Societies Acts had been cancelled, and which was registered under the Companies Acts, did not issue policies of assurance, but collected and entered upon a contribution card fortnightly contributions from its members, and was liable to pay sums of money upon the death of a member for funeral expenses. The society was convicted under section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, for having paid such a sum on the death of a child under the age of ten years without the production of a certificate of death.

Held, that the words in section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, "who issue, or are liable under, policies of assurance upon human life," must be excluded from the definition of "society" in section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, as being inconsistent with the context; and that the society fell within that definition, and the conviction was right.

Special case stated by justices of the borough of Rochdale. The material parts of the case were as follows:—

At a petty sessions holden at Rochdale on the 17th of August, 1892, an information was preferred by the respondent on behalf of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies against the appellants for that they did unlawfully commit a breach of section 28, sub-section 2, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, by paying a sum of money, to wit, £4, on the death of a child named John James Kay, under ten years of age, to Alice Kay, the parent of such child without the production by such parent of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths containing the particulars required by the said section. The magistrates convicted the appellants and adjudged them to pay a penalty of £2 and £3 10s. 4d. costs.

Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted by both parties that the registration of the appellants under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), was cancelled by the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies on the 22nd of January, 1885, and that the appellants subsequently carried on their business as an unregistered society, and were afterwards registered as a company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890.

The objects of the company were stated in the memorandum of association to be "to take over and carry on the business of the friendly society called The Newbold Friendly Society, and to provide by subscriptions, with or without the aid of donations, for the relief or maintenance of members of the society during sickness or other infirmity not being mental, and for insuring money to be paid for the funeral expenses of members and for all other purposes incident to the carrying into effect the above-named objects," and it was thereby declared that "the society does not intend nor shall it be empowered to issue policies of assurance on human life or to grant annuities on human life within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870."

It was provided by the articles of association that members of the society should pay an entrance fee and a fortnightly subscription, which varied according to the age of the member, and should be entitled to sick pay and funeral gifts upon a scale based upon the amount of the contribution. Each member received a subscription card, upon which the appellants' collectors entered the contributions received.

Article 71 was as follows:—"In the event of the death of any member immediate notice shall be given to the collectors of the district, who shall receive a certificate of the death from the parents or guardians of the deceased member and forward the same to the president, vice-president or secretary, or the committee of management may at their discretion dispense with any such certificate. The collector of the district shall view the corpse," but if the corpse should be outside the district and over six miles from the registered office of the society, a certificate from the registrar should be deemed sufficient.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Friendly Societies Act, 1875, provides as follows:—Section 28—"With respect to payments on the death of children under ten years of age the following provisions shall have effect:—(2) No society shall pay any sum on the death of a child under ten years of age except to the parent of such child or to the personal representative of such parent, and upon the production by such parent, or his personal representative, of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths or other person having the care of the register of deaths containing the particulars aftermentioned. (6) It shall be an offence under this Act (a) if any society pays money on the death of a child under ten years of age otherwise than is provided by this Act. (7) The word 'society' in the present section shall include all industrial assurance companies assuring the payment of money on the death of children under the age of ten years."

By section 4 of the same Act "industrial assurance company" is defined to mean "any company as defined by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than £20, and which receives premiums or contributions in Great Britain or Ireland by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months."

By section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), the term "company" is defined to mean "any person or persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue, or are liable under, policies of assurance upon human life within the United Kingdom, or who grant annuities upon human life within the United Kingdom."

The following facts were admitted by both parties, viz.:—That Alice Kay was a member of the said society, and had paid contributions which entitled her to the sum of £5 in the event of the death of her son, John James Kay, for funeral expenses; that the said John James Kay died on the 20th of April, 1892, aged six years; that on the 21st of April, 1892, the sum of £5, being the amount of the funeral expenses insured to the said Alice Kay upon the death of the said John James Kay as aforesaid was paid to the said Alice Kay by a collector on behalf of the appellants without the production of a certificate of death, but in other respects according to the provisions of article 71 of the articles of association.

It was contended by the respondent at the hearing before the magistrates that the appellants were a society as defined by section 28, sub-section 7, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and that the declaration in the memorandum of association that the appellants should not issue policies on human life within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, did not prevent the application of section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875; that the appellants did issue policies on human life within the meaning of section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, and that the appellant society was an industrial assurance company as defined by section 4 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875.

The respondent, while contending that the appellants were a "company" as defined by section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, admitted in argument that they were not a life assurance company for the purposes of that Act.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the clause in the memorandum of association which declares that the society does not intend nor shall it be empowered to issue policies of assurance on human life or grant annuities on human life within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, showed conclusively the objects of the society, and that the society was not subject to any of the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and, in particular, was not subject to section 28 of the Act; that the society was not a life assurance company within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870; that 'funeral gifts' were not life assurances; that the card given to the member was only an acknowledgment of the contributions paid, and was not a policy of assurance within the meaning of section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870; and that by article 71 of the articles of association ample provision was made to prevent the mischief aimed at by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, in respect of insurances on infant life.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the appellant society was a society as defined in section 28, sub-section (7), of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and subject to sub-section (2) of the same section.

If the opinion of the court should be in the affirmative the conviction was to stand, but if the court be of a contrary opinion then the conviction was to be quashed.

Jan. 17.—Arnold Herbert (Pankhurst with him), for the appellants.

Sir Charles Russell, A.G. (Henry Sutton with him), for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the foregoing statement of the case by the justices.

As to the meaning of the word "policy" the judgments in Good v. Elliott, 3 T. R. 693, were referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and CAVE, J.), was delivered by CAVE, J.—The question in this case is whether the appellants were liable to be convicted under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, s. 28, sub-section 2, which enacts, "No society shall pay any sum on the death of a child under ten years of age, except to the parent of such child, or to the personal representative of such parent, and upon the production by such parent or his personal representative of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths or other person having the care of the register of deaths containing the particulars after mentioned."

The appellants were admittedly guilty of the offence if they were a society within the meaning of the section. As to that sub-section 7 enacts that "the word 'society' in the present section shall include all industrial assurance companies assuring the payment of money on the death of children under the age of ten years."

Section 4 of the same Act enacts that "if not inconsistent with the context, 'industrial assurance company' means any company as defined by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, which grants assurances on any one life for a less sum than twenty pounds, and which receives premiums or contributions in Great Britain or Ireland by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months."

The Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, by section 2, enacts that "the term 'company' means any person or persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue or are liable under policies of assurance upon human life within the United Kingdom, or who grant annuities upon human life within the United Kingdom.

Putting all these enactments together, sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Friendly Societies Act of 1875 will read as follows:—"No society (which word includes, if not inconsistent with the context, any person or persons, corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue or are liable upon policies of assurance upon human life within the United Kingdom, or who grant annuities upon human life within the United Kingdom, and who grant assurances on any one life for a less sum than £20, and who receive premiums or contributions in Great Britain or Ireland by means of collectors at less periodical intervals than two months, and who assure the payment of money on the death of children under the age of ten years) shall pay any sum on the death of a child under ten years of age, except to the parent of such child, or to the personal representative of such parent, and upon the production by such parent or his personal representive of a certificate of death issued by the registrar of deaths or other person having the care of the register of deaths containing the particulars after mentioned."

It is contended for the appellants that they do not fall within this enactment, on the ground that, although they come within the rest of the definition, they do not issue and are not liable upon policies of assurance.

Now, we cannot perceive any ordinary sense of the words "policies of assurance" under which it can be said that the appellants issue such policies, and if they do not issue such policies we do not see how it can be said that they are liable under policies of assurance without using the words "policies of assurance" in two senses—one when they are read with the word "issue," and another when they are read with the words "liable upon," which in our judgment is inadmissible.

On the other hand, to hold that the appellants are not within section 28, sub-section 2, would be to deprive sub-section 7 of all meaning, and that where it is most important that it should have a meaning. If such bodies as the appellants are not within the section, the lives of children under ten are deprived of the protection intended to be thrown around them by the section in question.

In our judgment, the words "who issue or are liable under policies of assurance" are to be rejected altogether as inconsistent with the context, which sufficiently limits these companies by requiring that they shall be companies assuring the payment of sums of less than £20 on the death of children under ten, the premiums on which are collected at less periodical intervals than two months.

In our judgment the magistrates were right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Woodcock, Rylands, & Parker, for Taylor & Co., Rochdale.

Solicitor for the respondent, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ.) — May 4.

POWELL v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANK. (a.)

Company—Stock—Trustee—Deposit of certificate—Blank transfer—Subsequent filling up by transferee—Delivery—Execution—Purchase for value without notice—Legal title—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), ss. 14, 15, 18.

M. E., the executor of a sole surviving trustee of a marriage settlement, held on behalf of the trust a sum of stock of a company which was governed by the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; his name was indorsed as executor on the certificate, and the certificate bore on the face of it that "no interest in this stock can be acquired by the deposit of this certificate." He deposited the certificate with a bank to secure an overdraft, stating that the stock belonged to him absolutely; he also signed and deposited a loan note, undertaking when called upon to execute a proper assignment or transfer; and he further deposited a blank transfer, signed and sealed by him, purporting to transfer the stock. The period of credit having run out, the bank, after giving notice to him that they proposed to register the stock in their name, filled in the blank transfer, with their own name as transferees, and got themselves registered as owners of the stock. The transfer, at the time of and after being filled up, was never seen by M. E., but the bank afterwards wrote and told him that they had received the dividend on the stock, and that they proposed to credit him with the amount, and they were subsequently authorized by him to sell the stock, but it was not, in fact, sold.

Held, that there had been nothing amounting to a redelivery of the transfer by the transferor after the blanks had been filled in by the bank, and that the bank had no legal title to the stock.

Decision of Wright, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J.

The plaintiffs were two trustees under a marriage settlement and a beneficiary thereunder. The defendant bank was registered as owners of a sum of £1,000 stock of the Penarth Harbour Co. This sum was claimed by the plaintiffs and was the subject of the present action.

Prior to 1885 certain shares or stock, subsequently represented by the stock in question, stood in the company's books in the name of a sole surviving trustee without any entry showing a trust. The trustee held the certificate, which bore on the face of it that "no interest in this stock can be acquired by the deposit of this certificate." He died in 1884, leaving a will by which, after a specific legacy, he gave his whole estate to his son Martin Edwards, and appointed him executor with another person who never proved. The will did not mention the stock or refer in any way to the settlement or to any trust. Martin Edwards, in December, 1885, sent to the harbour company the probate of the will and the certificate, and the proper entries of the probate and of the name of Martin Edwards as the executor were made in the register and indorsed on the certificate. In May, 1886, Martin Edwards applied to the bank for leave to overdraw temporarily on the security of the deposit of the stock certificate. In view of the indorsement thereon the bank inquired from him whether the stock belonged to him, and was told that it belonged to him absolutely. Either then or at some previous time the bank manager had seen the will, and he was aware of its contents. He asked Edwards to procure and deposit a new certificate in the name of Edwards, and in June, 1886, Edwards deposited the old certificate with a letter from the harbour company's secretary to the effect that it was not in accordance with their practice to issue a new certificate under the circumstances. Edwards also signed and deposited a loan note in the usual form, undertaking when called upon to execute a proper assignment or transfer of the stock. He also deposited a blank transfer signed and sealed by him purporting to transfer in consideration of five shillings £1,000 stock of the Harbour Co. It was not dated nor then executed by the bank, nor stamped, nor did it contain the name of the bank or of any person as transferee. Large advances were made by the bank on this security, and as they were not reduced when the period of credit had run out, the bank, after writing to Edwards that unless the requirements for payment were attended to "the Penarth Harbour, Dock, and Railway Stock held as security would be registered in the name of the bank," in September, 1887, filled up and executed the blank transfer and sent it in for registration, and they became and remained registered as owners of it. The blank transfer when filled up was never redelivered or re-executed by Edwards, nor was there evidence of any authority under seal from him to the bank to act upon the blank transfer, nor was it filled in or executed by the bank in his presence. In 1888 the bank wrote to Edwards that they had received a dividend on the stock "for your credit." In 1889 Edwards authorized the bank to sell the stock upon conditions which the bank did not, however, agree to, and it was not sold. Edwards had paid the interest on the stock to the plaintiff beneficiary by his own cheque during all this time, thus preventing inquiry. At length he absconded and the facts became fully known in 1891. In May, 1891, the two plaintiff trustees were appointed trustees of the settlement, and this action was commenced against the bank and Edwards, and on his being adjudicated a bankrupt in November, 1891, his trustee in bankruptcy was made a defendant.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wright, J., held that the bank had never had the legal title in the shares, the transfer which they sent in for registration not being Edwards' deed at all.

The defendant bank appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the appellants.—The real question is whether the legal estate passed to the bank, and our main contention is that really there was a redelivery of the transfer by Edwards after it was filled in by the bank, and so the legal estate passed. There is no magic in the form of words in delivery; all that is wanted is that the delivering party should indicate that the altered deed is his act. Here there is ample acknowledgment by Edwards to make the transfer as filled up effectual.

They referred to Goodright d. Carter v. Straphan, Cowp. 201; Tupper v. Foulkes, 9 W. R. 349, 9 C. B. N. S. 809; Hudson v. Revett, 5 Bing. 368; and Shep. Touch. 57.

Giffard, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The stock in question is governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and section 14 of that Act of Parliament is the one which relates to the transfers. It provides that, subject as therein mentioned, every shareholder may transfer all or any part of his interest in the stock of the company, and "every such transfer shall be by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration shall be duly stated." Then section 15 provides that the deed of transfer (when duly executed) shall be delivered to the secretary and kept by him, and it is to be entered in the register of transfers. Then by section 18 there is provision made for the transmission of shares by other means than by a transfer, that is to say, to executors, and so on, but there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which enables an executor to transfer otherwise than by a deed duly executed. I do not dwell upon the point of the stamp nor on that part of the Act which says that the consideration is to be duly stated. No case that I know of can be cited to show that that part of the Act is otherwise than directory. No case that I know of can be cited to show that a misstated consideration or an erroneous stamp would invalidate the deed. But a deed is by the Act of Parliament essential, and in order to acquire the legal title to stock or shares in companies governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act you must have a deed executed by the transferor, and you must have that transfer registered. Until you have got both, you have not got the legal title in the transferee.

Mr. Martin Edwards gave to the bank a transfer sealed by him, and so far as form goes probably delivered by him to the bank, but with blanks. It was not in a complete form. It was never in that form in which such an instrument, however much wax there might be at the bottom, could amount to a deed by the transferor. We all know that both at common law and under these statutes if you execute a transfer in blank that instrument with the blanks is not a deed. It is done constantly, but they are not deeds. That document so executed by Edwards in blank was filled up afterwards by the bank, probably as was intended, and the bank itself was put in as the transferee, and the bank got itself registered.

Now, what was the effect of that? It was not that the bank had got a good title. The registration of the stock in the name of the bank, unless preceded by a valid deed transferring the stock from the owner of it, does not give the transferee a good title at all. We have not to consider the effect of documents executed in blank as agreements enforceable in equity. We have nothing to do with that, but we are considering the legal title of the bank. The bank had no legal title at all. That is as plain upon the authorities as any proposition of law can be. If so, how did they get it afterwards? They say, Mr. Martin Edwards was afterwards informed that this transfer had been made to the bank, and he was told that it would be sent in for registration, and he knew later on that he had credit for a dividend, and he knew what had been done. So the appellants ask us to infer that he had executed the deed before it was registered. Can we do so? On what principle are we asked to draw such an inference in the teeth of the acts of the parties?

It is said there is a doctrine about redelivery; if a man executes a deed, that is to say, seals it, and then afterwards acknowledges it as his own, it is said that will amount to a delivery. That may be true; and in the case of Goodright v. Straphan that doctrine was carried to a considerable length, but in that case there was no alteration at all. The first authority which has been cited in which there was an alteration, is the case of Hudson v. Revett. There the person who had sealed the deed knew what the alteration was. It was altered in his presence, and he knew exactly the state in which it was. Knowing the condition in which it was he assented to it as his deed, and it was held that that amounted to a redelivery. I follow that, but there is nothing of the sort here. There is not a particle of evidence to show that Mr. M. Edwards ever knew how these blanks were filled up. He never saw the document, and it was never brought to his attention further than that he was told the document was sent in for registration. To ask us to infer that he acknowledged that deed, which he never saw, as his deed, is asking us to do that which I, for one, cannot possibly do.

Wright, J., has come to the conclusion that there was no redelivery. I not only cannot differ from him, but I think the inference is correct. I cannot part with the case without calling attention to what the consequence would be if we were to stretch our consciences and decide in favour of the bank. We should be driving a coach and four through this Act of Parliament. Bearing in mind how common these transfers in blank are, we should reduce to a nullity that clause which requires transfers to be by deed, and we should enable transfers to be by any instrument sealed or unsealed, and there would always be a conflict of evidence on the subject. We should, in fact, be repealing the Act of Parliament. To infer redelivery seems to me to be entirely against the evidence, and in my opinion the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The bank seems to me to have no legal title, and that is the short point on which the case turns.

At the time when this deed was registered it had never passed back into the hands of the grantor. He had never seen it again, and it seems to me, therefore, it was not registered within section 15 of the Act. I cannot see how that objection can be got over. As a matter of fact it seems to me that the deed never was, as against the parties to this suit, the deed of the grantor. The transfer was never made under this deed. A deed in order to be a deed ought to be, and must be, sealed and delivered. The sealing and delivery are essential parts of a deed. We all know that you can take the objection that a deed was never delivered. That is a conclusive point. A deed, therefore, must be delivered. When was this deed ever delivered? At the time of its delivery it was in blank. When was it redelivered, if at all? The redelivery must be done by the grantor or by someone who acts for him. The grantor in this case never saw the deed again. He did not redeliver it. He may by his conduct estop himself as between himself and other persons from saying that he did not redeliver it, but this is not a case in which such an estoppel can arise.

Then it is said he may have redelivered it because he may have so conducted himself as to preclude himself from saying he has not redelivered, and so conducted himself as actually to have done that which in law amounts to redelivery. If a deed which has been executed in blank, and is not a deed at the time, comes back into the custody of the person who originally sealed it, he can by his assent complete the delivery. There is no doubt about that. That is the case of Hudson v. Revett, where the grantor of the deed knew of the alterations and the blank was filled up in his presence.

Then it is said that even though the deed does not come back into his presence, the grantor may so conduct himself so that his conduct amounts to a redelivery. I am dealing with the case where the delivery is not through an agent but through the man himself. I should require to examine the cases very closely to see if that had ever been established at law. It is said that the case of Goodright v. Strapham proves it, but I am by no means satisfied that in that case there is anything more than an estoppel which arose between the parties. But at all events, if such an assent can amount to redelivery by a man who is a hundred miles off the deed, one would have thought, it must be an assent which brings home to his knowledge that which has been done to the deed, and the condition in which the deed is at the moment his assent is supposed to have been given. In this case there is nothing of the sort, and without accepting the proposition without further examination it seems to me that the facts do not justify its application.

Then can it be said that if not redelivered by the grantee it has been redelivered by some agent? An agent to deliver a deed must be an agent appointed under seal. I quite agree that here again the doctrine of estoppel may prevent the application of the leading principle. But estoppel here is out of the case. It is not a case in which estoppel can be prayed in aid from the constitution of the suit. But as to the doctrine that an agent can deliver for a principal without authority under seal I can only say it seems to me a novel one. It is quite true that you may deliver a deed on a condition that when the condition is performed the performance of the condition effectuates the delivery, but that is by virtue of the original intention and act of the grantor. But apart from those cases of conditional delivery or delivery to operate on the condition being performed, can it be true that an agent can deliver without any authority under seal? It cannot upon principle. If you arrive at a firm ground upon the basis of the proposition that a deed is a writing that is duly sealed and delivered, it is well-known law that an agent cannot execute the deed or do one part of the execution which makes it a deed unless he is appointed under seal.

Then it is said that under these circumstances, although there are no acts in law which amount to redelivery, yet we ought to say that the learned judge ought to have strained his conscience and found delivery to suit the justice of the case. Two innocent persons are concerned in this case, and the question is upon whose shoulders the injury should fall. It seems to me the case of the appellants utterly fails. I am sorry for them, but the loss must fall on somebody, and it must fall on those who have not the legal title.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The essence of the case is, Have the appellants, or have they not, the legal interest? Being purchasers for value without notice they cannot succeed unless they can make out that, having an inferior equity, they have clothed it with a legal interest. All that depends on whether this deed of transfer has been duly executed by the grantor.

The grounds on which the appellants rely to make out their case are, not that they ever showed the deed in its completed condition to the grantor, who had signed and sealed it in its imperfect condition, for he never saw it at all; not that they told him how they filled in the blanks, for they never did tell him how they filled in the blanks, and he never knew; but they say this: "We told him we were going to register it, and therefore he must be taken to have understood that before we could do that, the blanks would have to be filled in; we told him also we were going to register in the name of the bank, and therefore he must be taken to have understood that the bank intended to fill in their own name as transferees; and then afterwards we informed him we had registered, and we told him that we, the bank, had received dividends and proposed to credit him with the amount so received;" and afterwards, at a later period again, he having had this information, which he seems to have treated with silence all along, he told the bank to sell the shares. Therefore it is said the court must infer—what? It must infer he knew how the deed had been filled up, that he assented to that filling up, that he assented to the registration which took place after the filling up, and that accordingly he, by that assent, put himself into such a position that the proper inference is that he redelivered that deed. Certainly no case has been cited which goes so far as that. It is perfectly idle to say he ever made the bank his agents to redeliver the deed for him. I absolutely dissent from the argument that Mr. Norton was so bold as to argue that such an agent can be appointed without deed. In Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 6 M. & W. 200, Parke, B., was dealing with a similar document, which, when it was sealed and delivered, had the name of the vendee in blank, and therefore, he says, was void. But he says, at p. 214: "Assuming, then, the instrument to be a deed, it was wholly improper if the name of the vendee was left out; and to allow it to be afterwards filled up by an agent appointed by parol, and then delivered in the absence of the principal as a deed, would be a violation of the principle that an attorney to execute and deliver a deed for another must himself be appointed by deed." Therefore the point could not possibly be maintained that the bank had authority to deliver this deed on behalf of the grantor.

But, it is said, even if they had not, it must be inferred from the facts I have stated that the grantor himself assented to that deed in such a form and in such a manner that it amounted to a redelivery. No case has ever decided that because a man knew that people had been acting on a blank deed as if it were a perfect deed, it must, therefore, be inferred that he knew that the deed was filled up, that he knew how it was filled up, and that he must be taken to have redelivered it. That is carrying the doctrine far beyond any case that can possibly be referred to. In the case of France v. Clark, 32 W. R. 466, 26 Ch. D. 257, it was decided most distinctly by Lord Selborne, C., that the registration, where the deed itself is incomplete, does not perfect the title of the transferee at all. He says this: "He cannot by his own subsequent act alter the legal character, or enlarge in his own favour the legal or equitable operation, of the instrument. This, in our opinion, renders it unnecessary to consider whether before the registration was completed the company and the appellant had notice of the plaintiff's claim; for registration in the name of a transferee only gives complete effect to a prior valid transfer: registration does not make effectual a document which was as between the alleged transferor and transferee inoperative and of no effect." Therefore, in order to make out their defence that they are legal owners, the appellants' must show not merely that there was a registration, but that the deed which was registered was a perfect deed at the time it was registered. Otherwise the registration does not help their case. I think the evidence falls short of what would be requisite to enable anyone, jury or judge, honestly to find that this was a completed deed, or that there ever had been anything like redelivery.

Accordingly I think the appeal fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Munns & Longden; White & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. } March 10, 17.

PÉPÉ v. CITY AND SUBURBAN BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society — Member — Notice of withdrawal — Alteration of rules after notice and before payment — Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 16, 18.

By the rules of a building society a member, on giving the prescribed notice, might withdraw his shares, and the rules might be altered by the prescribed majority of members.

The society altered a rule to the detriment of a member, P., after P. had given notice to withdraw, but before P. was repaid.

Held, that, though P. had a vested right to be paid when he gave his notice, that right was liable to be divested by an exercise of the power left in the society, and liable to be exercised against P., of altering the rules; and that P. was, therefore, bound by the altered rule.

Davies v. Second Chatham Building Society, 61 L. T. N. S. 680, 38 W. R. Dig. 24, followed.

Motion.

The plaintiff was the holder of four fully paid-up £50 shares in the defendant society, which he bought in March, 1888.

By rule 5 of the society's rules "upon giving one month's notice in writing . . . any member" might "withdraw his investments at any monthly meeting of the society," and, if several members should give notice to withdraw within any one month, they were to be repaid pro rata.

By rule 33 the rules were not to be altered unless at a general meeting, and with the concurrence of three-fourths of the members then and there present.

In January, 1891, the plaintiff duly gave notice to withdraw his shares, But after such notice and before he was repaid, viz., in May, 1892, the society made an addition to rule 5, giving the directors power in their discretion to make prior payment to any member holding not more than £50 in the society. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, in which he claimed a declaration that the above alteration in rule 5 was not binding upon him and was ultrà vires, and specific performance of the agreement between the plaintiff and the society constituted by rule 5, and he now moved for an injunction to restrain the society from acting on rule 5 as altered to his prejudice.

The motion was taken by consent as the trial of the action.

Morton Daniel, for the plaintiff.—I gave notice of withdrawal long before the new rule. That being so, the society could not alter their contract with me by that rule: Auld v. Glasgow, &c., Building Society, 35 W. R. 632, 12 App. Cas. 197. In virtue of my notice I had a right to withdraw under the rules in force at the time when I gave my notice. Davies v. Second Chatham Building Society, 61 L. T. N. S. 680, 38 W. R. Dig. 24, on which the defendants will rely, was not a decision on this point, but on procedure.

Farwell, Q.C., and A. d'B. Terrell, for the defendant society.—If the plaintiff is a member, he is bound; and he does not cease to be a member by his notice, Davies v. Second Chatham Building Society; which is the only case where a new rule was actually passed after the member's notice of withdrawal. Auld v.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Glasgow, &c., Building Society has no bearing on this case.

They also referred to the Building Societies Act, 1874, ss. 16, 18; Rosenberg v. Northumberland Building Society, 37 W. R. 368, 22 Q. B. D. 373; Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society, 37 W. R. 369 n., 22 Q. B. D. 381 n.; Walker v. General Mutual Building Society, 36 Ch. D. 777, at p. 783, 36 W. R. Dig. 26; and Sibun v. Pearce, 38 W. R. 658, 44 Ch. D. 354.

Morton Daniel, in reply.—The moment my client gave notice he had a vested interest to be paid according to the existing rules: Auld v. Glasgow, &c., Building Society, per Lord Herschell. Davies's case is distinguishable, because the question there was whether he continued to be a member. Moreover, the alterations there were insignificant.

CHITTY, J.—The question is whether the plaintiff is bound by the altered rule. He gave notice to withdraw under the rules in force when he became a member. The rule was altered to his detriment. The alteration confers a discretionary power on the directors to make prior payment to any member having not more than £50 standing to his credit in the books of the society. The effect of the alteration is to postpone payment to the plaintiff. It was part of the contract between the plaintiff and the society that the rules might be altered, and the contract was altered according to the rules, by which the concurrence of three-fourths of the members then and there present at the meeting when the alteration was proposed was required.

I start, therefore, with the proposition that it was part of the contract between the plaintiff and the society that these rules might be altered.

The question may be asked, What is the position of members who have given notice to withdraw? I cannot answer that question better than it is answered by Lindley, L.J., in Sibun v. Pearce, 38 W. R., at p. 660, 44 Ch. D. at p. 371, "Some say he is a member; some say he is a creditor. The true mode of describing him is to describe him as a member who has given notice of withdrawal and is entitled to payment." It is settled by the authorities that a person in this position is still a member. And it seems to me to follow that, as a member of a society like this, which has power to alter its rules, he remains subject to the rules as duly altered. It is not questioned that the new rule was passed in accordance with the terms of the original rule.

Mr. Daniel well said that the plaintiff had a vested right to be paid when he gave his notice. But as the society had power to alter the rules the question is, Was not this vested right liable to be divested in virtue of a substitutionary duly passed rule?

It may seem strange that a society should take such a power of altering its rules, but it is questionable whether it is not on the whole greatly for the benefit of all that there should be such a power. The members rely on the sense of justice of the three-fourths majority, and must be taken to be content, while they remain members, to leave themselves in the hands of the society. Rosenberg v. Northumberland Building Society and Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society do not decide this point; they are cases of mortgage deeds containing covenants which are addressed in terms to alterations of the rules. But in Davies v. Second Chatham Building Society the point appears to me to have arisen directly. The question here was whether alterations in the rules made after the plaintiff had given notice of withdrawal from the society bound her or not, and the court held that she was bound. The gist of the decision is to be found in the judgment of Huddleston, B., where he says: "Did she still continue to be a member of the society after the notice of withdrawal? If she did, the second set of rules was binding upon her. In my judgment she did not cease to be a member." Mr. Daniel says that this case only shows that the altered rules bind in such circumstances when the alterations are slight, but I find no such proposition, nor do I see how on principle I could make the distinction. The court would have in each case to examine the subject-matter to which the alteration applied, and then decide according to its importance or insignificance, which would mean embarking on a very difficult course, and I do not see how the court could draw the line. Mr. Daniel says "at vested rights" anyway, but I have shown that the rights are vested subject to the power still left in the society, and liable to be exercised against the plaintiff, of altering the rules. The alteration in Rosenberg's case was considerable, and operated to the detriment of the mortgagor. The result is that the altered rule operates to bind the plaintiff, and I refuse this motion, but without costs.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Cuddon & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Skipper & Tucker.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 4.
Chitty, J. }

RANELAGH v. RANELAGH. (a.)

Will—Construction—Survivors—Longest liver.

Pecuniary legacies were severally given to four persons during their natural lives, and in case of the demise of any of them without legitimate issue his or her proportion to be divided amongst the survivors. The last surviving legatee died without leaving issue.

Held, that his legacy fell into residue.

The decision of the Privy Council in King v. Frost, 15 App. Cas. 548, 39 W. R. Dig. 264, followed.

Maden v. Taylor, 45 L. J. Ch. 569, 24 W. R. Dig. 325; Davidson v. Kimpton, 29 W. R. 912, 18 Ch. D. 213; and In re Roper's Estate, 37 W. R. 731, 41 Ch. D. 409, not followed.

Petition.

This case is reported as being an adoption by the High Court, of the Privy Council decision in King v. Frost, 15 App. Cas. 548, 39 W. R. Dig. 264, and the consequent rejection of the line of cases following Maden v. Taylor, 45 L. J. Ch. 569, 24 W. R. Dig. 325.

The testator, Lord Ranelagh, by his will, dated the 20th of August, 1814, gave his residuary personal estate in trust for the benefit of his eldest son, the plaintiff, Lord Ranelagh, for life, and, after his decease, for the benefit of his first and other sons, with certain limitations over.

By his first codicil, dated the 18th of December, 1818, he expressed himself as follows:—

"My daughter, Mary Ann Jones, having a fortune of £10,000, which I hold in trust for her, &c., I give her for the present only £200 to buy mourning. I give to my two daughters, Sarah Antonia Jones and Louisa Jones, during their natural lives, £4,000 each. I give to my two sons, Thomas Cowley Jones and Thomas Edward Jones, £2,000 sterling each during their natural lives. Legal interest at £5 per cent. to be paid to all of them, in equal quarterly payments, commencing from the day of my decease, till my son, the Honourable Thomas Jones, or my heir in entail, attains his or her twenty-first year of age. To prevent any mistake or misconception of my directions, I repeat my intentions respecting the above legacies in figures:—

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

To Mary Ann Jones £200 to be paid forthwith.

Sarah Antonia Jones	£4,000	£5 per cent. interest to be paid quarterly till my heir is 21 years of age.
Louisa Jones . .	4,000
Thomas Cowley Jones	2,000
Thomas Edward Jones	2,000

In case of the demise of any of the above parties without legitimate issue, their, his, or her proportions to be divided equally amongst the survivors."

It was decided in Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 2 My. & K. 441, that the above gift over did not contemplate an indefinite failure of issue, and the legacies were ordered to be paid into court to the separate account of each legatee, the dividends to be paid to each legatee for life, with liberty to apply upon the death of each legatee.

Sarah Antonia Jones died on the 21st of October, 1840, a spinster. It was decided in Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 4 Beav. 419, that the surviving legatees were entitled to her legacy absolutely.

Thomas Cowley Jones died on the 13th of March, 1849, leaving three children. It was decided in Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 12 Beav. 200, that the children did not take by implication, but that the legacy fell into residue.

Louisa Jones died on the 16th of November, 1886, a widow. The devolution of her legacy raised no new question.

Thomas Edward Jones died on the 20th of September, 1892, without leaving issue. By his will he left all his property to his wife, the petitioner, and appointed her executrix. The petitioner claimed the fund as part of Thos. E. Jones's estate, on the ground that he was the last survivor.

Byrne, Q.C., and Edward Beaumont, for the petitioner.—Survivor must be read "longest liver": Maden v. Taylor, 45 L. J. Ch. 569, 24 W. R. Dig. 325 (Sir George Jessel); followed by Sir Edward Fry in Davidson v. Kimpton, 29 W. R. 912, 18 Ch. D. 213, and again by your lordship in In re Roper's Estate, 37 W. R. 731, 41 Ch. D. 409.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the residuary legatees, respondents.—The Privy Council have virtually overruled those decisions in King v. Frost. Maden v. Taylor was doubted by Kay, L.J., then Kay, J., in Griffiths v. Mortimer, 33 W. R. 441, and by North, J., in Askew v. Askew, 36 W. R. 620.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—The decisions of the Privy Council, though of great weight, are not binding on this court.

CHITTY, J., held that although the decision of the Privy Council in King v. Frost was not binding on him, yet having regard to the constitution of the particular committee which consisted of such eminent lawyers as Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Richard Couch, and seeing that they had fully considered the former authorities, their decision was one of the greatest weight, and he should follow it in preference to the authorities cited on behalf of the petitioner. There would be a declaration that on the death of Thomas Edward Jones without leaving issue the legacy of £2,000 bequeathed to him fell into residue.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Fladgates.

Solicitors for the respondents, Helder, Roberts, Son, & Walton.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Dec. 13-15; Jan. 12, 17-19, 24, 25.

COLLINGHAM v. SLOPER.

FOREIGN, AMERICAN, AND GENERAL INVESTMENT TRUST CO. v. SLOPER. (a.)

Company—Debenture-holders—Debenture trust—Failure of trust—Return of money to debenture-holders—Minority of debenture-holders.

A company, incorporated under Spanish law, obtained a concession from the Spanish Government to construct and work a railway in Spain. The line was to be constructed in three sections, and was to form part of a through route. The company created by deed first mortgage debentures to bearer, and hypothecated the railway to secure the same. The company entered into contracts with a construction company to make the line and provide rolling stock, and by the contracts engaged to issue certain of the debentures, the proceeds of which were to be paid to three commissioners as trustees for the debenture-holders, to be applied, subject to interest and amortization of bonds, in completing the railway. The company thereupon issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions. £320,000 was raised and paid to Paris bankers, but, owing to litigation in Paris, was only paid to the commissioners after considerable delay, reduced by expenses and the service of the loan. Meanwhile the construction of the railway was impeded for lack of funds. One section only was partially completed, and the other two had not been commenced. The concessson, owing to breaches thereof, was liable to forfeiture. In 1890 the contracts with the construction company were put an end to and the contractors released, whereupon a temporary contract was entered into with another company to keep the works going. Two actions were commenced by a small, but substantial, minority of the bondholders, who desired a return of their money, and a third action by other bondholders, who wished to have the scheme carried out.

Held, that the court must decide whether the company possessed resources in presenti or in prospectu available to complete the line; that, on the evidence, there was no reasonable hope, as a matter of business, that the line could be completed out of such resources; that a portion of the line was comparatively valueless; that the minority of the bondholders were entitled to a return of their money, subject to costs and charges properly incurred, and subject to a sufficient part of the funds being applied to properly realize the property of the company charged in favour of the bondholders; that payment of interest and the amortization of outstanding bonds must cease; and an inquiry directed to ascertain in what way the property charged could best be realized.

The Saragossa and Mediterranean Railway Co. was a company constituted under Spanish law to construct and work a railway in Spain, from La Puebla de Hijar to San Carlos de Rapita on the coast, about 100 miles in length. This railway was to form part of a through route, and was to be constructed in three sections; the first, from La Puebla de Hijar to Alcaniz, the most inland section, of moderate difficulty; the second, from the coast to Chata, easy of construction; and the third, connecting the other two sections, of great difficulty. The capital of the company was £500,000, of which 50 per cent. had been called up. The shares of the company were to bearer. In 1887 the company became the holders of a concession granted by the Spanish Government for the construction and working of the above line. The concession, which stated that the contemplated line was of general utility, required a deposit of £50,000, and granted subventions from the State to the amount of £260,000, payable in instalments as the works progressed. The concession was for ninety-nine years dating from 1882, but was to lapse unless the works progressed and terminated within certain specified times. By a deed of the 6th of October, 1887, in pursuance of certain articles of the company, the company created 75,000 first mortgage debentures to bearer for £20 each, with interest at 3 per cent., to be redeemed at certain dates within ninety-three years, and the proposed railway line was hypothecated to secure the same. Under a deed of the 15th of June, 1888, the company entered into a contract with the Barcelona Construction Co. for the construction of the line and the provision of rolling stock. After reciting that the preliminary expenses of the concession, plans, and works in progress had been provided for by the called-up capital, part of the Government subvention, and the issue of 13,450 debentures, the contract provided that the contractors should construct the line and provide rolling stock fit for traffic, and hand over the same complete to the Saragossa Co., the works to be executed in three sections within stated times, the last to be completed by September, 1890; and that the contractors should provide the company with £50,000 for expenses, and were to receive in payment the whole pecuniary resources of the company, including the Government subvention, the unpaid capital, the moneys to be received on the issue of bonds, and the £50,000 deposited with the Government.

(a.) Reported by C. F. DUNCAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 13th of February, 1889, the company passed certain resolutions to the effect that the remaining debentures were to be issued and that bankers in Great Britain and the Continent were to be employed to offer them for sale, who, after payment of expenses, were to hand over the proceeds to three gentlemen in London, called the London commissioners; that the commissioners were out of the said proceeds, after payment of expenses, &c., to set apart the moneys necessary from time to time for the payment of the interest and the amortization of all the debentures from time to time issued until six months after completion and delivery over of the line and rolling stock; to pay to the company the £50,000 agreed to be paid to it by the contractors in the above contract, to hold and apply the balance of the funds in payments to the contractors of such moneys as might become due to them under the above contract; to have the power of investing the funds in their hands, and to pay any balance of the said funds, after providing for all the above payments, to the contractors. Any modification of the above contract or of the supplemental contract next below stated to be subject to the approval of the commissioners. On the same date a supplemental contract was entered into between the company, the contractors, and the London commissioners, which carried into effect the above resolutions, and provided that the company would permit the intended offer of the debentures for subscription in accordance with the prospectus to be issued, and would for that purpose do and execute all things and documents required by the commissioners; that the company would duly call up the uncalled capital, and in default thereof that the commissioners were entitled to require the company to do all acts to enforce such calls; and that the commissioners might receive the subventions. The contractors guaranteed to the company and the commissioners the uncalled capital, the commissioners being empowered to deduct the contract price if it was not paid up.

In pursuance of these contracts the company issued a prospectus on May 1, 1889, inviting subscriptions for 75,000 debentures of £20 each at 3 per cent. The price of issue was £11. Of these, however, as 13,450 had been already issued, 61,550 only remained to be issued. About 45,000 were issued; 32,000 by the Banque d'Escompte in Paris. The banque, however, refused to hand over the proceeds of these latter debentures to the London commissioners, a point having been raised that there was misrepresentation in the prospectus. After two decisions in Paris and a compromise the residue of the money in the hands of the banque, some £311,000, was paid over to the commissioners on January 2, 1892. In the meantime difficulties arose. The works could not be continued for want of funds. The Government subventions were to some extent discontinued. For a time the works were absolutely stopped, and when not stopped were only partially carried on. The times limited by the concession for the completion of the works, which had been several times extended, were also running out, but in 1889 were again extended, as to the first section until February, 1894, and as to the remaining two sections until February 8, 1894, it being declared that should the company fail to complete the line within the given times the concession should be ipso facto forfeited.

